

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

AFFIRMATIONS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(No. 40) SECOND READING.

LORD CHELMSFORD, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, its object was to extend to criminal courts in Scotland the same practice which already existed in the civil courts—that of allowing persons who had conscientious objections to take an oath to make a solemn affirmation as to the truth of their statements. Some of the inconveniences of the discrepancy at present existing in this respect between the laws of Scotland and those of the rest of the United Kingdom were manifested on a recent occasion, when the sheriffs would not allow a witness to make a declaration in their Court on the ground that no Order in Council had been issued extending the operation of the existing Act to that Court, although Her Majesty had power to do so. The Bill had passed unanimously through the other House of Parliament, and he hoped their Lordships would not offer any opposition to it.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR having pointed out that the language of the 3rd section would need some slight alteration;

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup>, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

MIDDLESEX.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS TOWNSHEND asked, If Her Majesty's Government intended to take any Steps to rectify an Omission in the Regulations made by the Justices of Middlesex, in consequence of which there is no provision made for the Reception of Persons committed to Prison in default of paying Moneys ordered in Civil Process by Police Courts.

EARL GRANVILLE said, there could be no doubt that the present arrangements had been attended with great evils. The point of law which had been raised would come before the Court of Queen's Bench for decision early next term, and the Government therefore did not intend to take any steps in the meantime. They had, however, been in communication with the Middlesex magistrates with a view of inducing them to provide the requisite accommodation pending the decision of the legal question.

CASUAL POOR—METROPOLIS.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS TOWNSHEND asked, Whether the Practice adopted by Guardians of the Poor in the Metropolis of turning out of Workhouses at early Hours in the Morning casual poor Persons who have no Employment or Places of Residence has met with the direct Sanction of the Poor Law Board; and whether, on the contrary, in accordance with the Law for the Relief of the Poor, Guardians ought not to provide Food and Shelter at all Times for all Destitute Persons, irrespective of their Places of Settlement, until they may choose to discontinue receiving it or until they are passed to their respective Parishes. The noble Marquess said that then these temporary resting places for the poor were frequently such as to be altogether unworthy of the civilization of the country, and yet from these places of shelter, miserable as they were, the poor were turned out long before the sun had warmed the streets, and without any possibility of finding shelter elsewhere. Under such circumstances it was not to be wondered at that beggars should infest the streets, or that persons should be tempted to the commission of crime. Only last Sunday he had witnessed pitiable cases of exposure to the harsh and blighting weather of that day. He had been greatly surprised at the statement made in another place by the President of the Poor Law Board to the effect that the Act of last Session had worked satisfactorily.

LORD HOUGHTON said, he wished his noble Friend had brought the subject before the House in a somewhat more formal manner, inasmuch as it related to the success or failure of a measure which had been passed last Session for the relief of the casual poor, and involved the solution of a very difficult question. He had himself moved for Returns on the subject which had been presented to the House; and further Returns had been ordered by the other House. The question was far more difficult and important than the noble Lord imagined. The question of the treatment of the casual poor was one affecting not only the operation of the Poor Law but the habits of the English people. It was, he believed, the fact that while a great many of the workhouse wards, which had been built at considerable expense, were by no means full during the most inclement weather, there were other places of refuge, which had been provided by the charity of some munificent private persons, which were crowded to excess. That being so it was quite clear that the public money was to a great extent thrown away, although there could be no doubt that the excellent ladies by whom those refuges were established were actuated by the purest motives. He had been informed that there was only one night during the past year in which the refuges were full, and that was the night preceding the execution of Müller, when an enormous number of the vagrant class came up from the country. To make these wards too agreeable to those who frequented them would be to attract large numbers of the vagrant poor from the rural districts. Indeed, the impression on his own mind was that there had been during the last three or four years a great increase in the number of vagrant poor wandering through the streets of the metropolis. The matter became, therefore, every day of a more pressing character, and he thought some measure should be adopted to remedy the existing state of things, and to provide in some fitting way for persons in that miserable condition. The authorities at the Poor Law Board were, he believed, most desirous to improve that condition, and how to do so without attracting the poor from the country to the city was the problem to be solved. The question, however, was, as he said before, a very difficult one, and he wished there was some Member of the House who, from his official position, or his practical acquaintance with the evils which existed, would be enabled to submit it to their Lordships' notice with the authority and in the manner which its importance demanded. An occasion had only the other day arisen when the presence of an official connected with the Poor Law Department might be secured in that House; and seeing how desirable it was that there should be somebody to answer any questions which might be put on so important a subject as the administration of the Poor Law, he thought that point was one deserving of consideration—especially when it was borne in mind that both the President and Secretary of the Poor Law Board, and the Secretary and Under Secretary of State for the Home Department sat in the other House.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he was glad his noble Friend (Lord Houghton) had interfered between the noble Marquess and himself, and that he had exhibited so much fairness in dealing with the very difficult question of how it was possible to deal with our casual poor without increasing habits of vagrancy. As to the complaint that there was nobody to represent the Poor Law Board in their Lordships' House, he could only say that the charge which was most frequently made against the Government in that respect was that the public Departments were to too great an extent represented there, and not sufficiently in the other House of Parliament. Be that as it might, he was quite sure that among the official Members of their Lordships' House there were many noble Lords—among others his noble Friend himself—who were perfectly qualified to deal with the question. In reply to the noble Marquess (the Marquess Townshend) he might state that the Poor Law Board was not aware that the casual poor were turned out of the workhouse early in the morning in the manner he had described. The Poor Law authorities had certainly given no order to that effect, and the fact was, he believed, that many of those poor people discharged themselves in the morning of their own accord. If, he might add, any of these poor persons represented themselves as utterly destitute and requiring relief, they were handed over to the relieving officer, or if they stood in need of medical attendance or food, there were regulations providing that they should receive the necessary assistance through the relieving officer. A Minute had been issued by the Department this winter going into great detail as to the duties which those officers would have to perform, and as to the manner in which they should be discharged.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY, admitting the difficulties of the subject, said, he thought it was a matter deserving of consideration whether the vagrant poor of the metropolis should not be placed rather under the control of the police than of the parochial authorities. He also expressed a hope that his noble Friend who had spoken second in the discussion would take upon himself the duty of moving for a Select Committee to inquire into the matter.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, till Thursday next half past Ten o'clock.

UTILIZATION OF SEWAGE AND LAND RECLAMATION (IRELAND) BILL.

COMMITTEE.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he rose to move that this Bill be referred to the Select Committee on the Metropolis Sewage and Essex Reclamation Bill. Similar witnesses would have to be examined in both cases, and therefore it would save a great amount of time and expense to consider the two Bills together.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Utilization of Sewage and Land Reclamation (Ireland) Bill be referred to the Select Committee on the Metropolis Sewage and Essex Reclamation Bill."—(Sir Colman O'Loghlen.)

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, there could have been no objection to referring this Irish Sewage Bill to the English Sewage Select Committee had the Committee been willing to undertake its consideration; but from a communication which he had had with some of the Members of that Committee, he found that they were unwilling to accept the consideration of the Bill, and therefore he would suggest that the Motion now before the House should be withdrawn.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he would consent to accept the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Member.

FIRES IN LONDON.—QUESTION.

MR. HANKEY said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, When he proposes to introduce his Bill for the better protection of Life and Property against Fires in the Metropolis?

MR. T. G. BARING said, in reply, that he hoped the Bill would be introduced very shortly.

WATERWORKS RESERVOIRS.

QUESTION.

MR. FERRAND said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If Mr. Rawlinson, the Government Engineer, has made any other Reports on the state of Waterworks Reservoirs than those already published; and, if so, whether he will lay them upon the table of the House?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that Mr. Rawlinson had made a Report concerning some Reservoirs at Rochdale, the hon. Member for Rochdale having requested that such inquiry should take place, and also a Report in reference to the bursting of a Reservoir near Whitehaven.

MR. FERRAND asked if the Reports were to be laid upon the table.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, they should be laid on the table if they were moved for.

EXECUTION AT DURHAM OF MATTHEW ATKINSON.—QUESTION.

MR. LAWSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the horrible scene which took place at the execution of Matthew

Sir Colman O'Loghlen

Atkinson in Durham; and whether he has made inquiry into the conduct of the authorities who had the management of that execution?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that the day after this unhappy occurrence the Governor of Durham Gaol wrote to him and stated the precautions which had been taken to prevent any such accident. He had thereupon written to the High Sheriff of the county, who was the person directly responsible for carrying out the execution, calling his attention to the statement of the Governor, expressing his opinion that sufficient care had not been taken to test the rope beforehand, and hoping that if unfortunately another execution should take place at Durham, greater precaution would be used to prevent the possibility of the occurrence of so deplorable an event.

CONSULAR REPORTS.—QUESTION.

MR. BAINES said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is intended to issue the Consular Reports and Reports of the Secretaries of Legation, for the information of the mercantile public, at shorter intervals?

MR. LAYARD, in reply, said, he had made arrangements at the Foreign Office for the issue of these Reports as speedily as possible, and he hoped they would be placed on the table at the end of every month, or as soon after the last day of the month as possible.

OFFICE OF WORKS, &c.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH, in moving for a Select Committee to inquire into the Office of Works and the Office of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, said, that in the second Session of the present Parliament Mr. Wise, then Member for Stafford, but now no longer a Member of the House, moved for an inquiry into the whole Civil Service expenditure of the country, specially animadverting upon these two Departments. The inquiry which took place in consequence was directed to the Office of Works, but not to the Office of Woods; and owing to the failure of Mr. Wise's health and other causes it was not so satisfactory as could be wished, though many useful suggestions were made by the Committee. Last Session he endeavoured to bring the subject before the House, but it was too late for the appointment of a Committee, and he then gave notice of his intention to submit certain Resolutions. These were to the effect that the uncertain, intermixed, and undefined authority and rights of the First Commissioner of Works and the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, in reference to portions of the lands, premises, and buildings constituting what were known as the Crown lands, were anomalous and unsatisfactory; that the Commissioner of Works was not justified in ordering or inviting plans for any public building until the destination, site, and cost of the same should have been sanctioned by Parliament; that the receipts of every kind of the Office of Woods and Forests ought to be paid direct into the Exchequer in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee on Public Money, and that no payment should be made until it had been first sanctioned by this House; and lastly, that the Crown lands and buildings ought to be available for the use of public Departments without the payment of rent to the Crown. Works had frequently been undertaken by the Department in anticipation of and even in direct contradiction to the opinion of the House, and the House had been called upon merely to register the pleasure of the Office of Works. Again, the Woods and Forests were the only Department of the State which was allowed to spend public money without the authority of Parliament; while large sums had been charged in the Estimates as rents payable to the Crown, and large sums of money had been voted for the purchase of sites for public offices in Downing Street and elsewhere, when, in point of fact, the land belonged to the public. It was only since 1851, when the offices of Works and Woods were divided, that this principle had been acted upon. This division was effected with the view, it was stated, to more economical management, and to their being rendered more efficient for the purposes for which they existed. But, in the event, it was found far from being an economical arrangement, for the expenses of the two Offices were just double what they had been previously. In 1862 a Report was drawn up, in which a comparison was made between the state of the Departments previous to and subsequent to the change. From this it appeared that for the ten years previous to 1852 the cost of the united offices was only £260,000, and, including some other expenses, the annual cost did not amount to more than £36,000. During the ten years which followed 1852, however, the expense of each of the Offices was nearly as great almost as the expense of the united Offices had been for the previous ten years, and the cost for both was £68,000 a year, as against £36,000 previous to 1852. The accounts for both the Offices had been regularly increasing from year to year. In 1863 the Office of Woods cost £27,000, and in the next year it cost £28,000. In like manner the cost of the Office of Works rose in those two years from £31,000 to £32,000. It must be borne in mind that, besides the expenditure which appeared in the Reports of the Commissioners, a large amount, which appeared in the Estimates voted by that House, was to be taken into account, and that amount must be added to the expense paid by the Commissioners out of the funds before they were paid over to the Exchequer. An unfair inference might be drawn from the Reports of the Commissioners, because the large additions of property acquired by the Department was carefully kept out of view, and therefore it was desirable to notice that the increase of revenue was not owing to any better management, but arose from the acquisition of various properties. Thus rent had been charged to a large amount for public buildings—a practice only introduced recently, and he thought it perfectly absurd that the public should be receiving with one hand money which they paid away with the other. Then again large Votes were passed by that House for the sites of public buildings. Thus, for instance, when the State Paper Office, which had some years before been built at the expense of £40,000, was pulled down to make room for the new Foreign Office, £7,000 were actually demanded and paid by money voted by that House, to the Woods and Forests for the site. He hoped to hear some explanation of the grounds on which such a transaction could be justified. Valuable rights in different parts of the kingdom had been neglected, whereas they ought to have been well looked after, and the revenues received from them rendered available for public purposes. A sort of roving Commission had gone through the country to see what property could be taken possession of by the Department, and there had been contentions in Wales and elsewhere with respect to the foreshores. An immense addition to the capital account had been obtained, and the revenue ought to be much greater than it was. Then, again, great claims had been made in Scotland with regard to the salmon fisheries, and in Hull, property which had been in the possession of the War Office since the time of Charles I., had been added to the property of the Department he was now referring to. Similar claims had been made in other parts of Great Britain and also in Ireland; but there was no justification for appropriating these acquired possessions simply to what was called Crown property. Another source of income to the Department was the disafforestation of several forests; for that process was accompanied by the cutting down of the timber which had been planted at the public expense. He maintained that the money obtained for such timber ought to have gone at once into the Exchequer. The State forests had been despoiled of their timber during the last ten years to the extent in value of £166,000 more than in the previous ten years, evidently for the purpose of unfairly swelling the revenue derived from that Department. It appeared that the outlays for improvements on what was called Crown property in the course of the present reign amounted to very nearly a million and three quarters. If these improvements were effected at the expense of the public upon what was a mere life estate, he asked whether it was justifiable that the cost of them should come out of the public purse? Large sums had been acquired by the sale of foreshores, which in the judgment of the best legal authorities was not property belonging to the Crown personally, but was held by it in trust for the public. Therefore, when that property was parted with, its proceeds ought to be paid into the Exchequer, instead of going to swell the revenues of the Woods and Forests. With regard to foreshores, no less a sum than £230,000 had been realized by the sales of foreshores in the United Kingdom, which ought to have gone into the public Exchequer, instead of forming part of the capital account of the Woods and Forests. Up to the year 1862, the sale of foreshores realized £205,000, and since that time the sales had gone on at the rate of £10,000 per annum. By the Return it appeared that during the last two years the sale of foreshores in Wales amounted to £3,000; in England £15,000. In Scotland, where people were rather more careful, these aggressions had not been so extensive, the sales in three years only amounting to £1,500; while in Ireland again the amount received for fore-

shores in two years was about £2,000. The total sum received, and added to capital account, in two years for that description of property, was £22,000, or at the rate of £11,000 per annum. Again, let them glance at the expenditure of the Department compared with the amount of the revenue. The gross revenue according to the Report of the Commissioners was £425,766 for the year ending 31st of March, 1864. The total payments for that year into the Consolidated Fund were £305,000, leaving a residue of £120,700, or two-sevenths of the whole receipts, which the Commissioners had expended at their own discretion. That, however, did not cover the amount of their expenses, because the actual expenditure of their office to be deducted from the £425,000 was £123,000. Nor was that the entire cost, for to it must be added the charges for stationery, postages, coal, furniture, and various items of that kind, included in the Civil Service Estimates, and which amounted to about £50,000. Thus there was an expenditure of not less than £173,000, out of the £425,766 or two-fifths of the whole gross revenue. What private gentleman with £5,000 a year would like to have £2,000 of it deducted for expenses? Surely he would think the case one calling for an inquiry, and an inquiry was what he was now asking from the House. He next came to the subject of the forests, on which there had on former occasions been frequent animadversions made in that House. The accounts of the Department exhibited such an extraordinary state of things in this respect that so far from those forests being a source of profit to the country they actually caused it to go into debt. The accounts for 1863 showed the receipts from Windsor Forest to be £17,000, and the expenditure £18,000; but if they put Windsor and the other forests together the sum received was £56,400 against £50,700 expended. That showed an apparent gain of between £5,000 and £6,000—a very small sum to go to liquidate the charges borne upon the Estimates for the Office of Woods and Forests. In 1864 Windsor and the other forests produced to the country a revenue of £42,000 against an expenditure of £46,000; and taking the two last years together they had a revenue of £99,000 against an expenditure of £97,000. Instead of keeping up a property which was so unprofitable would it not be better to let it pass into private hands that could make some use of it, and obtain from its proceeds the means of acquiring other land that might be requisite for the public service? The Commissioners, when they wanted unduly to swell the amount of the revenue of the Department, felled a large quantity of timber. [Cries of "Divide!"] The House appeared anxious to divide, but he thought it was essential that the House should be in possession of certain facts before going to a division, and his object in bringing the subject before the House was to show that an inquiry ought to take place into the manner in which the two Departments in question were managed. The misfortune was that no one was responsible for the Woods and Forests Department. When the First Commissioner of Woods and Forests had a seat in that House there was some one to look to for explanation and information upon any given point. Now they were told that the Secretary to the Treasury would answer any inquiry; but when questions were put to him it often turned out that the hon. Gentleman's information was second-hand—that he was misinformed—and he had to make further inquiry. The Woods and Forests Department was the only Department of the State that was allowed to expend public money without a Vote of that House, and the sooner it was altered the better. In 1857 the Public Moneys Committee reported, with reference to this Department, that it was essential to the proper Parliamentary control of public moneys that the whole revenues, after providing for certain charges, should be paid into the Consolidated Fund, from which it could not be drawn without the sanction of Parliament. And with regard to the charges on the land revenue, the Committee reported, in 1857, that, unless some constitutional difficulty were involved, they should be brought under Parliamentary control. Well, was there any constitutional reason why the whole receipts of this Department should not, like every other branch of the revenue, be paid into the Exchequer? As far as he knew there was none. Mr. Huskisson in former times, Lord Monteagle, and others strongly recommended that all receipts should be paid first of all into the Exchequer, and that no expenditure should be incurred by any Department without the sanction of the House. He believed it was quite within the power of the Treasury to establish the alteration for which he contended. These Commissioners were, under the late change, nothing more than the stewards or agents of the public, and they were bound to conduct all their business in such manner as the Treasury should direct. The Treasury, therefore, were perfectly able to enforce on the Commissioners those alterations in the management of the revenues of the Department for which he contended. He now came to the Office of Public Works. That Office had been described by a right hon. Gentleman who now sat on the Treasury Bench in these terms—

"Nothing," he said, "could be more lamentable and deplorable than the state of the whole arrangement with regard to the management of the Public Works. Vacillation, uncertainty, costliness, and all the conflicting vices that could be enumerated were united in our present system. He believed such were the evils of the present system that nothing short of a revolutionary reform would be sufficient to remedy it."

Such was the language of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman had been rather given of late to lay down revolutionary propositions; and he (Mr. Augustus Smith) trusted the right hon. Gentleman would come to his assistance to-night with some such scheme of revolutionary reform. There was a very complex arrangement with regard to the properties placed under the charge of the First Commissioner. Palaces, parks, public gardens, which formed originally part of the Crown lands, were placed under his charge. A variety of other parks and public building acquired and bought by the Consolidated Fund should be kept separate as public property. These were under the Office of Public Works; but then came in the Woods and Forests and claimed what might be called the fringe of these parks—the valuable building ground in connection with them; but then the public got no benefit from the valuable ground so acquired. Richmond Park, for instance, was part under the Woods and part under the Works. The Office of Works was subject to the caprice of the First Commissioner, and there was no person to keep a consecutive management in the different Departments. The separation of the Offices had produced this result and doubled the expenditure. One Department had been taken out of the cognizance of that House, inasmuch as there was no one there to answer for the expenditure. The points upon which he would urge the appointment of a Committee were—first, as to whether the separation of the Offices had really been advantageous or not; also whether the Office of Woods was at all satisfactory, and whether the expenses incurred were not larger than they ought to have been; next, whether the revenue derived from the Woods ought not to be paid directly into the Exchequer? Then, as regarded the Office of Works, was the person who held that office justified in adopting any measures upon his own authority? The next point was, ought the Crown lands and buildings, such as were required for public purposes, to be available to the public without any payment or charge? If the public had no benefit or permanent interest in these properties, were they justified in laying out a large sum of money upon them? Whatever expenditure was incurred it ought to be spread over a long period. If there was to be such a distinction drawn between the public and the Crown property as he had referred to, he could only say that they ought to be put under a distinct and independent management; and, further, that property which had been called Crown property, but which had been really acquired by large payments out of the Consolidated Fund, ought to be separated and the public given the full benefit of it. There ought also to be something done with the forests, because to keep them as they were would be a great disgrace and a national loss.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That a Select Committee be appointed, "to inquire into the Office of Works, and the Office of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues," — (Mr. Augustus Smith.)

MR. NEATE thought it was very desirable this Committee should be appointed, as within the last thirty years the Government, on behalf of the Crown, had been taking upon themselves an entirely new character—that of landed proprietors, and it was well worth consideration how far the Government had acted wisely in that. They had been building houses, and in fact doing everything that enterprising landed proprietors would do. The Government had also put themselves into the hands of London valuers, and exacted extravagant rates. Another very important public question might soon arise, perhaps in the next reign, whether a civil list would be wanted, or whether the revenue of the Crown estates would be sufficient. Was it desirable that the Sovereign should be placed in the position of a great landed proprietor, and made entirely independent of all grants from the State? These were questions which a Committee might well inquire into.

MR. PREL said, the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. A. Smith) had pressed for an inquiry into the Office of Woods and Works, and in his speech had referred to some Resolutions of which he had given notice last Session. The hon. Member also stated that there was much in the business of each of the two Offices which was common to both, and any difference between them was not clearly defined. That was wholly unfounded. The properties managed by these two Offices were perfectly distinct and separate from each other. The property under the management of the Office of Woods was the hereditary possession of the Crown, and administered, subject to the necessary outlay for the maintenance and improvement of the inheritance, for the purpose of the revenue; and the property administered by the Office of Works consisted of buildings and of the parks in London which were held and had been acquired for Government Offices, for national collections, and for the recreation and enjoyment of the public. The hon. Member stated that the Office of Works had certain rights over portions of the Crown property, and had referred to certain buildings which were occupied as Government Offices, such as the Admiralty and Treasury Offices; but he (Mr. Peel) had never heard that any inconvenience had arisen either to the public or the Office of Works in consequence of these buildings being the property of the Crown. The hon. Member had also drawn attention to the fact that while the parks in London which had been set out for the enjoyment of the public were under the management of the Office of Works, the property which was reserved had been placed under the Office of Woods, being the only part which yielded any profit. He (Mr. Peel) would take the two parks—Regent's Park and Victoria Park. These were acquired at the expense of the Crown revenues, and the Crown, having reserved a certain portion of them, planted and laid out the greater part for the use of the public, and entirely at the expense of the Crown revenue. When the partition of the Offices took place in 1851, an Act of Parliament, by which the two Offices were separated, transferred the management of that portion of the parks which had been laid out at the expense of the Crown revenue to the Office of Works, and also directed that all those portions, whether of houses or lands, which had been reserved should remain under the management of the Office of Woods. He conceived that any income that might be derived from the building leases was not more than a fair compensation to the Crown for the expense incurred to the revenue in laying out the parks for the benefit of the public. The hon. Member expressed his regret that these two Offices were ever separated, and stated that that separation had not resulted in that economy which was expected, but on the contrary caused great extravagance, and that it was to be regretted the Chief Commissioner of Woods had no longer a seat in that House, as he had at the time when the two Offices were combined. The two Offices were united in 1832. Up to that time there had been a separate Department for the accounts of public buildings. The experiment of a union was tried for nearly twenty years; but in 1851 the two Departments were again separated, because it was found that the experiment was unattended with success. The experiment partly failed because it was found that many public works were being carried out at the charge of the Land revenue instead of the general revenue, and, no doubt, the latter course would have been adopted but for the necessity of placing the services upon the Estimates, and thus insuring a discussion to which, though inconvenient, they ought to have been submitted. Another cause of failure was the adoption of the very course of which the hon. Gentleman was so enamoured that he desired it to be re-established—namely, the availability of Crown lands for the public service without the demand of any rent. Personally, he was very much averse to the renewal of such a course, because while it was in operation the House was never made fully acquainted with the expense of particular works, inasmuch as the site was supposed to be obtained from the Crown property without any cost. In many cases, too, an actual loss resulted to the public, because sites were selected simply because they could be obtained without any sum being voted by the House. It should also be remembered that this state of things existed when a very liberal view was taken of what constituted public purposes, and in many cases grants of land were made to persons from whom payment might fairly have been expected. He wished, therefore, to ask the House whether there were any grounds for the inquiry demanded by the hon. Gentleman, either jointly with the Office of Works or separately, into the Department of Woods. He would remind the House that there had already been several inquiries into the administration of those Offices. A Committee sat for two Sessions in 1832, and another for a similar period in 1848; and though the latter body made no Report, it was generally understood that the opinion of the Members was in favour of the separation of the two Offices, and Government afterwards brought in a Bill for the purpose of carrying this understanding into effect. In 1855 there was another Committee, which inquired into the management of the Woods and Forests; in addition to which inquiries into the organization of the Department had been instituted by the Treasury, and the general result of those inquiries had been favourable to the Department. The object of the inquiry which the hon. Gentleman had asked for was to ascertain whether the Department of Woods performed its duties in a satisfactory manner. He (Mr. Peel) said that it did; and in proof of that assertion, he would show that a great increase had taken place in the gross revenue of the Crown lands, and in the amount which it annually passed into the Exchequer to the credit of the Consolidated Fund. In the year 1850, before the separation, the annual revenue from lands was £296,000, and from forests nearly £45,000, making a total of £341,000. In the year ended the 31st of March last the gross revenue from lands had increased to £383,000, and the revenue from the forests was £42,000; giving a total revenue of £425,766, being an increase of about £84,000 during the thirteen years since the separation. The lands apart from the forests produced in the year 1850 £296,000, while in the present year the sum had reached £383,000, showing an increase of about 35 per cent. He would admit that, independent of good management, the property must have been an improvable one to allow of its increasing 35 per cent in value in the course of thirteen years. It ought however, in justice to the Department of Woods, to be borne in mind that a large proportion of the income derived from the land was of a fixed and immovable character—at all events, for the present. The Crown had a very large property in London, and the Crown rental in the metropolis alone amounted to £100,000. Those Crown rents were derived from building leases, at present not more than half expired. Of course at the expiration of the leases that property would largely increase in value; but until that time had arrived no improvement could of course be made in the rental. The amount annually received from quit rents in Ireland and feu duties and surplus tithes in Scotland was £80,000 and that again was not an improvable property. So that of the £296,000, which was the income derived from land in the year 1850, £180,000 at least was of a kind in which no immediate improvement had taken place. The hon. Gentleman had pretty correctly stated in what manner the increase of £85,000 had accrued to the Crown from the Crown lands; but far from agreeing with the opinion entertained by the hon. Member, that the careful husbanding of the resources confided to their charge was a matter of reproach to the Office of Woods, he thought that the course which they had adopted entitled them to much credit. It had been the policy of the Department of Woods to give much encouragement of late years to persons desirous of searching for mines. This course had been attended by a profitable result, for in 1850 the Crown mines produced £10,000 a year, while at the present time they yielded a revenue of £25,000 per annum. The hon. Gentleman had blamed the Department for cutting down a large quantity of timber which was standing upon the forests, but it must be recollected that the process of disafforestation was sanctioned by Act of Parliament. Three forests had been cleared in this way. Two had been converted into farms, and the other sold, the proceeds being lodged in the funds. £60,000 had been expended in the conversion of these two forests into farms, and with a very small exception the whole of the outlay for improvements had been covered by the felling of timber upon the forests. The result was that while those three forests previous to their disafforestation produced only £5,000 a year, they were now yielding, partly from the farms and partly from the interest on the proceeds which were invested in the funds, an annual revenue of £15,000. The Commissioners annually expended large sums on the improvement of the property; but the public lost nothing by this course, because in every case the tenant was charged with interest, or an addition was made to his rent. Another great source of profit had been the result of the sales and purchases which had been made of late years, and from the enfranchisement of copyholds. The Commissioners had wisely determined to sell all the outlying and detached lands, buying with the proceeds lands which were nearer their more valuable property. Up to the end of last year the total sums for sales of property amounted to £1,150,000, nearly the whole of which sum had been expended in the purchase of other property. The property thus sold was valued at the time of its being sold or let at £15,000 per annum, and the income derived from the invested proceeds of such sales reached £35,000 a year. In that way, and partly owing to the increased rents obtained for Crown property, the annual income had increased to the extent he had stated. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the subject of forests, and had expressed an opinion that the forests should be sold, and the money turned to better account. But he had forgotten over how small a portion of the forests the Crown had absolute rights. Of the 100,000 acres which were comprised in the whole of the Crown forests, only 20,000 acres belonged absolutely to the Crown. The whole of these 20,000 acres which were in any way fit for cultivation were either planted or were let for farming purposes to the best advantage. As to the remaining 80,000 acres, they were subject to rights of common, and the Crown had no power to turn them to profit except in one particular manner sanctioned by an Act of Parliament passed during the first French Revolution, which gave the Crown power, notwithstanding rights of common, to enclose about 30,000 acres of common land, and to plant them with oak trees. The hon. Gentleman complained that the rental derived from the forests was small, and that was no doubt true; but it must be borne in mind that a great part of the annual return of the forests was not represented by money, but by the additional value of the growing crop of timber, which increased every year. These forests were principally of oak, and oak did not arrive at maturity in less than a hundred years. The oak was planted about fifty years ago, and it was consequently only an accruing crop; but the value was increasing every year, and would ultimately be realized. Another point mentioned by the hon. Gentleman was in relation to fore-shores; but that subject had been so frequently and so fully discussed in that House, that it was unnecessary now to dwell at any length upon it. He would only remark that the law was clear that the shore was the property of the Crown, subject to the rights of navigation, and although he did not desire to see the Crown rights enforced with any degree of severity, yet he could not understand why Crown property below high-water mark should be differently treated from Crown property situated above high-water mark. There was no reason why Crown rent should be remitted to persons who wished to use the foreshore for their own purposes, and if such remission were made it would really be a grant of public money for the benefit of individuals. With respect to the payments into the Exchequer as compared with the increase in the gross revenue of the Crown property, he admitted that it would not be fair to institute a comparison between the payments made now and those which were made before 1850; because before the separation of the Departments there were various charges upon the gross revenue—such as expenses for the management of parks and the expenses of the establishments in London—which were now met by Parliamentary grants; but including only such expenditure before 1850 as was now paid out of the gross revenue the surplus then did not exceed £250,000. The net sums paid into the Exchequer down to recent periods did not exceed £150,000 a year; but in 1858 the payment into the Exchequer was £280,000, in 1860 £290,000, in 1862 £300,000, and in 1864-5 it would be £310,000. The difference between the gross revenue and the sum paid into the Exchequer represented the expenditure under the Office of Works, and it was right also to add the £28,000 voted by Parliament for the Office of Woods. The hon. Member complained that the expenses of the establishment of the Office of Woods had increased since 1850, but he had left out of consideration certain circumstances which had a material bearing upon that point. In 1851 the Estimate for the Office of Woods was about £20,000, and now it was £28,000. The increase was partly due to an increase of salaries and partly to the larger amount voted for legal disbursements. The increase in the charge for salaries arose from the fact that certain officers, who before 1850 were paid by fees, were now paid by salary. The increased charge for legal disbursements was owing, no doubt, to the activity of the Office of

Woods in looking after the rights of the Crown; but it must also be remembered that at least one-half of the amount annually voted by Parliament for legal disbursements was recovered from the parties with whom the litigation took place, and was repaid to the Consolidated Fund as part of the revenue of Crown lands. The real increase on the expense of the Office for Woods had only been about £2,000, which was not more than might have been expected from the increased amount of business which was performed. The difference between the gross revenue of the Crown lands, £425,000, and the net amount paid into the Exchequer, £310,000, this year was £115,000, and that sum represented the outlay of the Department of Woods, not only in the management of the property, but also in the dealing with the forests and parks, including Windsor. It was not quite fair, however, to include Windsor Forest with the other forest lands, because it should be borne in mind that Windsor Park and Forest were devoted to the accommodation of the Sovereign in the same way as the parks of London were devoted to the accommodation of the public. The annual expenditure on Windsor Park and Forest was about £20,000, and the receipts had increased to £8,000; while the annual expenditure on Delamere Forest was £26,000. Those two sums deducted from the total expenditure left a sum of £75,000 to represent the expenditure of that Department of Woods. The amount of fixed charges, for creating which the Office was not responsible, was very considerable. The income tax alone came to £11,000; and there were besides many petty charges attached to the property in former times, and which had come down with it when it came to the Crown. The whole amount of these fixed charges was not less than £25,000 a year. The annual outlay for improvements was considerable—last year it amounted to £31,000. It happened, however, that at the present time very expensive works were in progress. The Committee of 1855 condemned a portion of Delamere Forest as unfit for the growth of timber, and recommended that a certain portion should be converted into farms, the expense to be paid out of the income of Crown lands. In compliance with the recommendation improvements had been going on, and the total amount expended upon the conversion of 15,000 acres was £45,000. This was a considerable sum, but the outlay would ultimately yield a return of from 8 to 10 per cent.

Then a considerable amount had been spent on the Hull citadel and the reclamation of land about it. This was in the possession of the War Department up to a recent period, when it reverted to the Office of Woods, who had taken steps to embank the foreshores, but the result would be that the public would receive about £10,000 from those improvements. All that remained was £16,000 annually expended in the management of the property, paid to the Receiver of Crown Rents, who received 4 per cent, and surveyors who surveyed the lands; but about three-quarters of that would be repaid by the persons who took the lands which were the subject of those surveys. The hon. Gentleman suggested that this expenditure should be transferred from the Consolidated Fund to the annual Votes, and it was true that the Committee on Public Moneys had recommended that course to be taken, provided there were no constitutional objections to it. The whole subject was discussed in that House in 1851, when the Bill passed which separated the two Departments; and after a division the arrangement adopted was to place upon the Estimates merely the expenses of the establishment of Woods, leaving the outlay for improvements and other expenses to be paid out of the revenues of the Crown lands. He doubted very much whether the expenses of the year could be so far anticipated as to allow the property to be administered in the manner suggested by the hon. Gentleman. While the settlement of the Civil List continued as now it was part of the compact that the income arising from the Crown revenues should be paid to the public account, subject to all necessary expenses of improvement and management. The Office of Woods were trustees to this property. The income was payable to the public during the life of the Sovereign, and after his death it went to his successor. The rules under which the property was administered by the Office of Woods were clearly and expressly defined by Act of Parliament. They had been frequently the subject of inquiry in the House; they had passed successfully through the scrutiny of several Commissioners, and he hoped the House would not think it necessary to order the inquiry which the hon. Gentleman had asked for.

ROMAN CATHOLIC OATH BILL.

BILL ORDERED. FIRST READING.

Roman Catholic Oath Act—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee).

MR. MONSELL, in rising to move that the Chairman be directed to move the House that leave be given to bring in a Bill to substitute an oath for the oath required to be taken and subscribed by the Statute passed in the tenth year of the reign of King George IV., for the relief of His Majesty's Roman Catholic Subjects, said, he was sure that although he could not appeal to any party or political feeling, he would receive the kind indulgence of the House. The question he was about to bring under their notice did not touch the majority of the Members of the House. It affected the honour and disturbed the conscience of but a small minority, and on behalf of that minority he confidently appealed to the justice and good feeling of the House—the time for bringing it forward was an opportune one. It was perhaps natural that immediately after the passing of the Emancipation Act Members should group themselves under theological banners. This had passed away, and he believed that hon. Members now took their seats on this or that side of the House according to political not theological views. Another point which had been frequently alluded to in former debates was the idea that some compact was made between the Roman Catholics and the Duke of Wellington at the time of the proposing the Emancipation Bill. That idea, however, had been dissipated by the statement of the more competent authority on the subject—namely, Earl Russell—who distinctly informed the House that there was no communication at all between the Roman Catholics and the Government upon the introduction of the Emancipation Bill. He had been urged by many persons, both in and out of the House, to extend the scope of his Motion, and instead of dealing simply with the Roman Catholic oath, to substitute for all oaths now taken a simple oath of allegiance to be taken by all Members entering that House. ["Hear!"] He entirely agreed with the feeling which that cheer indicated. He would desire that all Members of that House should have simply an oath of allegiance to take; but he would state the reason why he did not think it expedient or desirable that he should be the person to make such a proposal. It was obvious that one oath still imposed on certain great public officers ought to be got rid of. He could conceive no scene more degrading than that which took place the other day in the Castle at Dublin, and he knew for a fact that Lord Wodehouse felt it as strongly as man could do. Lord Wodehouse stood with the Catholic Law Officers by his side, with Catholic Privy Councillors around him, and had to take an oath declaring the Roman Catholic religion to be damnable and idolatrous. He would for a single instant allude to the oath which touched a majority of the Members of that House, the oath taken by Members not belonging to the Roman Catholic religion. Every Protestant Member when he came to the table had to swear that "no foreign prince, prelate, or potentate hath, or ought to have, any spiritual jurisdiction within this realm;" and in speaking of this oath Lord Plunket said—

"My idea of the oath of supremacy is, I confess, that in the strict and literal interpretation of the words it is impossible to be taken by any one, for it not only denies that any foreign Power ought to have ecclesiastical or spiritual authority within this realm, but it denies even that any foreign Power has such authority. Now, if we admit that there are Roman Catholics in the country the Pope must have spiritual power here."

And he went on to say that its meaning was that no foreign Power had authority over the Established Church. This was the interpretation put upon the oath by so eminent a man. But he recollected that Lord Chelmsford (then Sir Frederic Thesiger) gave another interpretation—that it meant that no foreign Power had any authority here that could be enforced by law. But when we found two such eminent men, both Lord Chancellors, differing in opinion as to the interpretation of an oath, it was quite time that the oath was abolished. At the same time, it would be presumptuous for him to deal with anything more than the very limited subject to which his Motion referred. He should leave it to those to whom those two oaths applied to deal with them. He only proposed to deal with the Roman Catholic oath, and he sincerely trusted that the result of the inquiry he suggested might lead to a modification of the other oaths. Hon. Members were perhaps aware that one of the securities discussed by the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel at the time of the Catholic emancipation was to limit the number of Roman Catholic Members in that House. The force of circumstances had limited them even lower than the number—he believed forty—which at that time was suggested. He might appeal to the House whether so small a number of Roman Catholic Members was likely to do any injury to the Protestant institutions of the country, even if they were so disposed. He preferred to rest his case on other grounds. He would ask what had been the mainspring of all the beneficial alterations which had been made in the laws of this country during the last thirty-five years? Was it not the confidence we reposed in each other? Commencing with the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, and coming down to the emancipation of the Jews, had it not been through the confidence which they had been led to repose in one another—had it not been that principle which had led them to admit to the representation so many who were before excluded? All he asked of the House on the present occasion was to carry out that principle, and to have sufficient confidence in the small Roman Catholic minority to believe that they had no desire to injure the institutions of the country, but only to act in harmony with the other Members of the House in those questions in which they were all engaged. The shortest way of discussing the question was to lay down three simple principles on which he thought the oath now taken by Roman Catholic Members was objectionable, in which he thought the great majority of Members would agree. He did not suppose there were more than two hon. Members who would not desire that there should be only one mode of admission to an assembly in which all Members occupied the same position and had the same duties to discharge. Nothing could be more monstrous than that there should be a symbol of division presented to Gentlemen as they went up to the table of that House after an election, and that the House should thus divide itself, not into political but into religious and theological parties. On that ground the Roman Catholic oath was objectionable. Again, he apprehended there would be no difference of opinion that an unnecessary oath was an absolutely immoral thing. We were not justified in imposing upon any one an oath, unless we considered that there was some predominant reason which compelled us to do so. One mischievous effect of multiplying oaths was that it diminished the value of oaths in the public mind, and, therefore, such a proceeding had an absolutely injurious and immoral effect. On this point he would read the opinion of one of the most distinguished predecessors of the Speaker, Mr. Speaker Onslow, who stated at the time of the disputed succession, when the toast of Oxford was—

"God bless the King, the Faith's Defender!
God bless—no harm in blessing—the Pretender!
But who Pretender is, and who is King,
God bless my soul! that's quite another thing!"

—well at that period, when if at any, oaths might be considered likely to be useful, Mr. Speaker Onslow made use of those words—

"I cannot help observing of what little use to a Government the imposition of oaths has ever been. A Government is never secure of the hearts of the people but from the justice of it, and the justice of it is generally a real security. . . . When men habituate themselves to swear what they do not understand, they will easily be brought to forswear themselves in what they do understand. The like danger is from the frequency of them, which always takes off from the awe of them and consequently their force. In my opinion no oaths should be appointed but in judicial matters."

His third point, one on which he thought the House would also unanimously concur, was that it was an absolutely immoral act to present to anyone an oath which was not precise in its terms—an equivocal oath, one about the meaning of which there could be any difference of opinion. On that point he would refer to a statement made by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer four or five years ago. Speaking on March 22nd, 1858, the right hon. Gentleman observed—

"What he wished the House to bear in mind was this—that if there were these difficulties in the construction of an oath, which were held to be of great constitutional importance, that of itself was a clear proof that the matter required the attention of the House; for it was not a subject which ought to be left to A, B, and C to construe for themselves. There ought to be a legislative construction put upon an oath."—[3 Hansard, cxlix. 484.]

According to that most reasonable statement if he (Mr. Monsell) succeeded in showing the House that the Roman Catholic oath was an equivocal one—one about the construction and meaning of which there was legitimately and necessarily a great difference of opinion, they were bound either to repeal it or to make some alteration in it which would render it clear and unequivocal. But, before addressing himself to that point, he would call the attention of the House to the passage in the oath—

"I do further declare that it is not an article of my faith, and that I do renounce, reject, and abjure the opinion that princes excommunicate or deprived by the Pope or any other authority of the See of Rome may be deposed or murdered by their subjects or by any person whatsoever."

That passage about abjuring the belief that princes might be murdered had been removed from the Protestant oath; and there could be no good reason for continuing to make Catholics swear to it, for if they were murderers no oath would be likely to bind them. Then came this passage in the oath—

"I do swear that I will defend to the utmost of my power the settlement of property within this realm as established by the laws."

Those words referred to an Act passed in the beginning of the reign of Charles II., for the purpose of establishing the arrangement made immediately after the Cromwellian Rebellion. As he believed that most of the Catholic nobility and gentry held their properties under that settlement, it was very unnecessary to make them swear to defend it. He now came to the more important part of the oath—that respecting the construction of which gentlemen of great influence took different views—

"I do hereby disclaim, disavow, and solemnly abjure any intention to subvert the present Church Establishment as settled by law within this realm; and I do solemnly swear that I never will exercise any privilege to which I am, or may become, entitled to disturb or weaken the Protestant religion or Protestant Government in the United Kingdom. I do solemnly, in the presence of God, profess, testify, and declare that I do make this declaration and every part thereof in the plain and ordinary sense of the words of this oath, without any evasion, equivocation, or mental reservation whatsoever."

There were three different opinions held as to the obligation imposed on Catholic Members by that part of the oath. The late Duke of Norfolk acted on the belief that it prevented him from interfering with Church property. As against that opinion, he would quote one given by a Protestant statesman. Lord Althorp, speaking in 1833, was reported to have—

"Reminded the House that in the progress of the Catholic Relief Bill a clause had been proposed to prevent the interference of Catholic Members in any matters relating purely to the Church, and the House had rejected it; and as that was the case he thought that Catholic Members had as much right as Protestants to take part in the discussion of any matter that came before the House as Protestants."—[3 Hansard, xvi. 1353.]

It was the intention of the House which passed the Relief Bill that Roman Catholics should possess the same rights in every respect as Protestant Members. The third view was that taken by Mr. Justice Stoe and others. They believed that the words he had read were intended to prevent Catholics from overthrowing the Establishment, but not from reducing it to proper limits. For instance, if in the War Department you found 500 clerks who only wrote three letters a day, you would not be subverting the War Office if you cut down the staff of clerks by 400, keeping only a sufficient number to do the work. He thought there could be no doubt that an oath must be interpreted according to the sense in which it was understood by those who imposed it. Now, what was the sense of the people of England in which the Roman Catholic oath was imposed at the time the Emancipation Act passed? There could be no doubt that they regarded it as a security for the Established Church. He recollected that the Duke of Wellington, in 1840, in replying to some observations of the Earl of Shrewsbury in the other House, took that view of the oath; but, on the other hand, Sir Robert Peel stated that the oath in question was taken from two oaths enacted by the Irish Parliament in 1779 and 1793. What was the state of Ireland at that time? The belief of the Protestants was that if the Catholics obtained power in any way they would exert it to overthrow, by force of arms, the Establishment. The Catholics were kept down completely at that period; they were not permitted to buy land nor to keep a horse of a greater value than £5, and the object of the oaths was to prevent them rising by force of arms and leading the people to subvert the established state of things. Was it not clear that the fear was that violent and not constitutional and legal means would be used to overthrow the Establishment? When Sir Wilmot Horton proposed that Catholics should not be allowed to interfere with the property of the Church Sir Robert Peel rejected the Motion, and said that Catholics were to have every power and privilege which Protestants had. Taking these authoritative statements of Sir Robert Peel, it did not seem a forced interpretation to apply the same rule which Protestants applied when they considered the word "legally" or rightfully as understood in the oath they themselves take. It must be recollected that the Catholic oath was not imposed on Members only, but on students at Maynooth, and on Catholic mayors and magistrates and on councilmen. Did not hon. Members feel that there was really some difficulty in the question? Was it justifiable to force an equivocal and doubtful oath upon any man's conscience? He thought it was a positive crime to permit the oath to remain in force. A very remarkable statement had been made within the last few days by the Dean of St. Paul's, in which he said—

"I confess that to me all this is a very dangerous, a very objectionable, I will freely say, a very immoral trial of the conscience; a perpetual temptation to tamper with its sensitive jealousy of itself—a temptation to gulp down all without thought or without inquiry, or to act under the paralyzing torture of doubt."

Those words were spoken in reference to a different subject, but were singularly applicable to the present question. There was one other point to which he would draw attention. This was an oath imposed solely upon the Roman Catholic Members of the House. Let him suppose his hon. Friends the Members for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) and Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) were walking up to the table after the general election along with himself. In their opinion the whole system of the Establishment was absolutely vicious, and they thought it ought to be got rid of root and branch. It was the unclean thing placed on the altar. He, on the contrary, had no such belief. He did not want to attack the Church Establishment in England, and, as long as the English people were anxious for its maintenance, far be it from him to attempt to touch a stone of it, as he believed it to be a great bulwark against rationalism and infidelity. Yet he was compelled to take this oath, while Gentlemen who would, if permitted, turn Westminster Abbey into a conventicle were not required to take it. Now, was not that a monstrous injustice and anomaly? He could only sincerely and heartily thank the House for the interest they had shown in a matter which, after all, only concerned a small minority of their Members, and he trusted they would join him in an endeavour to get rid of the grievance of which he complained, which was, after all, only a relic of a bygone day. The oaths had been framed, with other severe measures, for the purpose of forcing a sort of fictitious uniformity in a Christian country, and as men's minds grew softer, the penal statutes were got rid of, while the oaths were preserved. The only foundation upon which any institution ought to rest was that of confidence for confidence. When the people believed that the House of Commons was sincerely desirous of adopting that principle, they would join them in the maintenance of our Constitution, and in the support of our Sovereign. Let hon. Members go up to the table of the House without any such invidious distinction as was implied by the terms of the existing oath; let them all be in a position to join heartily in the prayer that the dignity and honour of the country might be maintained by their united efforts, and that they might never allow theological differences to separate them in the discharge of those duties which devolved upon them as Members of that Legislature. The right hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution.

SIR GEORGE GREY: The only observation I feel called upon to make at present is to say on the part of Her Majesty's Government that we give a ready assent to the Motion which has been made by the right hon. Member for Limerick, so far as regards the preliminary step for bringing in a Bill for the purpose he has in view. I think it is impossible to deny that the subject is one which is entitled to consideration. I agree with him that oaths and declarations, which are unnecessary, of doubtful interpretation, or needlessly offensive to those to whom they are tendered—not because they cannot conscientiously make the declaration, but because it imputes to them opinions which they repudiate are objectionable. How far this objection applies to the oath taken by the Roman Catholic Members of this House, we shall have an opportunity of considering on the second reading of the Bill. I believe that no objection will be made by any hon. Member to the introduction of the Bill, and therefore I think that it will be better to postpone any discussion upon this subject until the second reading, and I hope we shall approach the discussion then, with a desire, while parting with no real security for the maintenance of the Protestant religion, to do justice to every reasonable claim made by our Roman Catholic fellow subjects.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I confess I do not think the present a favourable period for taking into consideration such questions as those involved in the Motion of the right hon. Member for Limerick. The whole of Europe—and I do not see how England can ignore these proceedings on the Continent—has just been alarmed at the issue of a document termed the Encyclical Letter of the Pope. This document is of so important a character that it has occupied the attention of the French Legislature for a considerable time, and the compliance of certain Roman Catholic bishops in France with the terms of that document has compelled the French Government to interfere. No one would suppose that the French Emperor would lightly set himself against the feelings of a certain number of the clergy of France, who claim what they affirm to be the liberty of obeying the Pope within the dominions of the Empire. I advert to this subject the more strongly because I think it is unwise in the Legislature of England at this moment to lend any countenance to this Papal aggression, when the Legislatures of France and other Roman Catholic countries find it necessary to resist it in the interests of social and political order and the peace and happiness of society. I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary has on this occasion manifested that same leaning towards Ultramontane doctrines that we have witnessed in him before. I think that, under the existing circumstances, the restrictions imposed in the oath taken by Roman Catholic Members at this moment are really a protection to Roman Catholics. If the Government of this country will not resist these encroachments of the Papacy, in support of the resistance offered by the Roman Catholic Governments of France, Spain, and other countries, whence is resistance to these aggressions to be expected? I think England ought to be mindful of her duty. Hitherto she has maintained the great cause of civil and religious liberty against the encroachments of that Power which, although now limited as to its immediate sphere of action as a temporal Government, was, perhaps, never more active than at the present moment in opposing the great principles of civil and religious freedom throughout the world. Perhaps the House will allow me just to read a description by a very eloquent author in France of the character of the Encyclical Letter, because it will illustrate my opinion of the proceeding which the House is invited to take. This is the description by a Roman Catholic of the document which the Papacy is attempting to impose upon every Roman Catholic conscience—

“According to the Encyclical there is no truly Christian society except where the subjects obey their princes without discussion, and the princes in like manner obey the Pope, and the Pope alone, as God; where the crime of heresy is persecuted and punished with the whole rigour of the law. Therefore, in such a society the religious theocratic power exists alone, for princes will not know how to deal with the affairs of the Church without offending God, while the Pope will be at liberty to intervene in the affairs of Catholic States."

The writer further says—

"Freedom of conscience, freedom of worship, freedom of opinion, the independence of the civil power in contradistinction to the religious, the ecclesiastical, or spiritual, are all described as detestable errors. The theory (system) which is hence adduced is this:—The people at the mercy of their princes; the princes under the authority of the Pope; the Pope having all liberty of intervention in the affairs of the temporal power; princes and Governments cannot in any sense claim of right to deal with religious, spiritual, or ecclesiastical affairs; the Roman Catholic religion alone in possession of the right of public worship; the Roman Catholic Church having the right to inflict corporal punishment upon those who violate her laws; the offence of heresy, which has been obliterated from all the modern codes, is continued, and is to entail punishment, just as in the worst days of the Middle Ages."

Now, Sir, this document issued from the Vatican may excite a smile upon the part of those who do not acknowledge the power of the Pope as the head of the religion which they adopt; but I cite the action of the Emperor of the French, who has forbidden the publication of this document, and I cite even the action of the Government of Spain, to show that Roman Catholic countries at this moment find it necessary to impose restrictions far more stringent than the restrictions in the oath which you are now asked virtually to abrogate. If it be the opinion of this House that this meddling with a grave matter should be permitted, I feel it would be idle for me to resist; but I feel it my duty not only to the Protestant constituency which I represent, but to my Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen, to deprecate the course now about to be taken by the Government of the country and this House, which is not in accordance with the action adopted by France, Spain, and other Roman Catholic Governments in Europe. The object of the restrictions in the oath proposed to be abrogated is to prevent the disturbance of the constitution and settlement of property in this country. When the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Monsell) adverts to the circumstances at the close of last century as being a period of Roman Catholic rebellion in Ireland, assuredly his argument tells against himself, because it was in order to obviate the possibility of questions being raised in this country which might excite similar disturbances that these restrictions were imposed. It is against that very danger that the Government of France is acting. The Em peror has declared that it is in the cause of civil and social order that he forbids the reading of the document issued by the Pope. M. Rouher, in the French Senate, called attention to this subject in a celebrated speech. He complained, as a Roman Catholic, that this edict issued from the Vatican is aimed at the remaining liberties of the Roman Catholic Church in France, no less than against that civil and social order which it is the duty of the ruler of France to maintain, and which the present ruler has maintained to the admiration of the world. I do deprecate that the representative body of a nation in close alliance with the French nation—of a nation which respects and admires the Emperor of the French for the manner in which he has adapted himself to the government of a noble but excitable people, should take this action, which appears to me to cast a slur upon the course which the Emperor has found it necessary to adopt in order to secure social and religious order within his own dominions. I deprecate this movement for another reason. We, as members of the Church of England—as Protestants—ought not to do anything that shall embarrass the Roman Catholics of France in re-asserting those national liberties and privileges of their Church in France which were termed the Gallican liberties of that church, and for centuries constituted the pride and blessing of that great establishment. As a member of the Church of England, not less as a representative of a large constituency, I deprecate this movement. I deprecate the conduct of the Government in thus lending at this moment their aid to the disturbance in this country of questions which are agitating the whole continent of Europe—the disturbance of questions, which every lover of peace, of order, and of religion wishes should remain permanently settled in the interests of humanity and civilization.

MR. WHALLEY said, he did not intend to reply to the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Monsell), but merely to point out to the Government that the proposal involved a constitutional change in the organization of the House—a change in an arrangement which was the subject of great deliberation when it was agreed upon. When, therefore, the Home Secretary invited calm discussion for the question, he begged leave to make this observation, that he, for one, would not discuss it; he should vote against it; and he would charge the Government, whenever an opportunity should occur, with having disregarded their duty. If a change of this kind was to be made, it ought to be made by the Government and upon their responsibility. It was not sufficient for the right hon. Gentleman to say that the matter would form the subject of discussion in the House. That was not the way to uphold the principles of the Constitution, or to maintain an arrangement made within the memory of living men, which was the result of the deliberate contract by which Roman Catholic gentlemen obtained seats in that House.

FIRE INSURANCE.—RESOLUTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN rose to move the Resolution of which he had given notice—

"That in the opinion of this House it is expedient that the reduction of Fire Insurance duty made in the last Session be extended at the earliest opportunity to houses, household goods, and all descriptions of insurable property."

There was nothing new in the terms or scope of this Resolution beyond what the House had already adopted. It was only a sort of refresher to the Government, to remind them that the reduction of duty made last Session was not exactly a compliance with the wishes of the House as expressed in the Resolution which it had agreed to—which was to the effect that the reduction should extend to all descriptions of property. So far as the merits of the question were concerned, he might say that they were settled by the Resolution of the House, and he need not, therefore, go into the already fully expounded history of this oppressive duty. To do so would be quite unnecessary, as the subject had been fully exhausted, and the House had, with full information, arrived at the conclusion, and declared it, that the duty upon Fire Insurance was excessive in amount; that it prevented insurances, and that it should be reduced at the earliest opportunity. The question now before them was two-fold:—first, whether the Resolution of the House aimed at a general reduction on all classes of Fire Insurances, or only had regard to a particular sort of insurance; and second, whether the Government in the reduction it made last Session had given effect to the real aim of the Resolution. Now, there could be no doubt at all that the Resolution passed aimed at the reduction of all insurances, and not one particular class of insurances only. That was the clearly expressed will and wish of the House in the early discussions, and in accordance therewith he had modified the proposals of the Bill he first brought in on the subject. He did not push his Bill, for he considered it more respectful to leave it in the hands of the Government; but the Government did not move in the matter, and then, acting upon judicious advice, he dropped the method of proceeding by Bill and proposed his Resolution. That Resolution having been adopted by the House, and with the sense he attributed to it, last year the Government, having a surplus, undertook to give effect to the Resolution. But it took the wrong course, and proposed a reduction on one special item only of insurable goods. Now, all he asked was that the House should remedy the oversight of the Government, by drawing its attention again to the fact that the interpretation it placed upon the Resolution of that House was not a correct construction of the wishes of that House, and desiring it to extend the reduction to all descriptions of insurable property. That was the sole object of the Resolution which he had now proposed. The only other question was for the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. If he felt that the condition of the Exchequer would enable him to give effect to this Resolution, he would be not only giving effect to the wishes of the House, but would earn the gratitude of the country; and if he could make it a reduction throughout and uniform to 1s. per cent, he would be not only earning the lasting gratitude of the country, but would be taking such a course as to enable him to replace in the Exchequer the amount which it would temporarily lose by the reduction. If the right hon. Gentleman had not the means, then the Resolution he now proposed would serve as a standing instruction to the Government that its first duty would be to reduce the Fire Insurance duty when it should have the means in hand ; and that was, indeed, the interpretation put by the right hon. Gentleman upon the Resolution already agreed to when it was under discussion in the House. He (Mr. H. B. Sheridan) could not for a moment suppose that the Government if it had the necessary means would refuse to give effect to that Resolution, for it had always acknowledged the binding nature of these resolves of the House ; otherwise it would simply be ridiculous for hon. Members to occupy themselves for years with particular questions if, when the House came to definite Resolutions on them, their Resolutions were left to remain without life and inoperative by the Members of the Government charged to give effect to them. He would not trespass longer on the House, except to say that if the right hon. Gentleman had any doubt as to what the wishes of the House and the country were, he had only to consult the petitions presented during the present Session on this subject, and principally one from the City of London itself, calling upon the House not to wait for the Budget, but to give its sanction at once to the Resolution which he now introduced. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the reduction of Fire Insurance Duty, made in the last Session, be extended, at the earliest opportunity, to houses, household goods, and all descriptions of insurable property.”—(Mr. Henry B. Sheridan.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I rise to move the Previous Question—Without entering into what may be called the merits of the Question, I shall address the few remarks I have to make simply to the Question as to the time at which the hon. Member proposes his Resolution ; and I feel bound to say, that the period which he has chosen for his Motion is inopportune. On no occasion that I have known has it ever been considered by the Government compatible with their duty to accede at a period immediately preceding the financial statement of the year to any Resolution of this House binding their hands by anticipation in regard to the proposals they may have to make in respect to the reduction of taxation. The hon. Gentleman has said that some right hon. Gentleman, whom he has not named, found fault with his infantile simplicity for introducing a Bill to effect the reduction of this duty, and told him that if he only proposed a Resolution of this House, that Resolution, if carried, would be potent and effective. For my part, I venture to say, with respect to Resolutions of the House, that in my opinion they are binding, as far as regards the Government, variably according to their subject-matter. I have never concealed my strong opinion that a Resolution of this House, unless relating to a matter of grievance or recommending the reduction of a burden oppressive to the community, does not demand great consideration from the Government ; but Resolutions relating to the repeal or reduction of the burdens of the people, though they may not be in precise accordance with the views of the Government, yet do demand the most respectful consideration at their hands, and ought at all times to be a material element in deciding on their financial proposals. I am bound to say, however, that the sanguine mind of the hon. Gentleman considerably overstates the real potency and effectiveness of Resolutions. Has he forgotten that Resolution, by far the most famous, for the repeal of the paper duty. Though hon. Gentlemen who sit on these benches were inclined to attach weight to that Resolution, yet, when in 1861, the Government proposed its repeal, very large minorities, which were almost majorities, made other proposals which they desired to substitute for the repeal of the paper duty. With regard to Motions made in anticipation of the Budget, I am not aware of any single instance in which public good or advantage has resulted from them. A Motion of that sort has an obvious tendency to excite expectations which, if they are fulfilled, would also have been fulfilled a few weeks later independently of the Motion ; so that nothing material is gained by it, and if they cannot be fulfilled, much mischief is done by the excitement of vain hopes. But this is not the only or material objection to Resolutions of this kind, picking out a single matter of taxation when other matters of taxation are not before the House. These Resolutions are entirely contrary to the principle of our arrangements, which require that annually the entire financial condition of the country should be placed before the House, so that the House, with that financial condition before it, might make a selection as it thinks fit between the different interests of the country claiming relief. Such a Motion is not less hostile, I am bound to say, to the principle which assigns the initiative in these matters to the Government. You give that initiative to the Government, I apprehend, because you think it is for the public interest that they should have it; and I humbly submit to the hon. Gentleman and the House that it is most important that the dividing lines between the essential jurisdiction of the House and the permissive jurisdiction—for such, I grant, it may be deemed—vested in the Government on these questions should be preserved. For look at the injustice of this proposal, to select a particular tax among the various claimants for remission. Only the other night we objected to make any declaration with respect to the Malt-tax on this very ground; we would not let fall from us a single syllable as to the claims which that tax may present for consideration at any given period. And I am bound to maintain an equal restraint and an equal silence on this occasion. But surely it is most unfair to the House, which has rejected one great demand, powerfully supported—and certainly I cannot say that the whole of those who joined in rejecting it rejected it deliberately on the merits; possibly some of them would have been its promoters on the merits—surely it is most unfair to them that a demand like this should now be pressed by those who have another favourite tax to put forward for remission. The hon. Gentleman says, and says with truth, that the House has agreed to Votes in favour of the remission of the duty on Fire Insurance. But it has also come to a vote for remission of the Malt Tax, and has afterwards been called upon to rescind it. I ask the House to consider the position in which any Administration must be put by the passing of a Resolution of this kind. It is absolutely contrary to the duty of the Government to come to any irrevocable decision as to the repeal or reduction of any tax involving an important branch of revenue until we know within certain limits that our revenue and charge will be balanced. Therefore, if the House were to select this inopportune moment for declaring its views with regard to the duty on Fire Insurance, it would place the Government in a predicament of what I may call compulsory disrespect towards the House. It would still remain just as much the duty of the Government as ever to observe such an absolute silence and maintain such an entire freedom with respect to their intentions, as the general interests of the country may demand. At the same time it would not be desirable, for the sake of the public service, that they should seem to show any indifference or inattention to the expressed wishes of the House. But if such an apparent conflict, such an apparent tardiness in responding to the wishes of the House in matters of taxation would be highly inexpedient as regards the Government, I am bound to say that it would likewise be disparaging to the dignity and authority of this House. But these, I admit, are all objections of a general character, and I own that there might be some colour for the Motion of the hon. Gentleman if he could show that he had reason to entertain some special mistrust—to presume some foregone conclusion—in the mind of the Government, that under no circumstances were they disposed to give to the subject of the Fire Insurance duty that sort of consideration which, upon its merits, and, I grant also, upon its history, it may demand. The hon. Member devoted a great part of his speech to proving two propositions—the one that the wish of the House and the country apparently has been for an uniform dealing with this duty; and the other, that the last reduction of it was not altogether a compliance with the desires of the House. But, Sir, I agree with him in both of those propositions. He says the last reduction was not altogether a compliance with the wishes of the House. Who ever said it was? Her Majesty's Government did not propose it in these terms. It is an odious thing for a man to quote from himself, but, still, as what I said in these matters was spoken by me as a Member of the Government, I venture to cite a short passage from the financial statement which it devolved on me to make last year. The words then used were—

“The surplus, which began with £2,570,000, is now brought down to no more than £430,000. And here it would have been the wish of the Government to stop. There is, however, still another subject demanding our attention. In consequence of the formal intimation given by the vote of the House, we have deemed it our duty, limited as are our means, to consider whether we could submit a measure which, whatever else it might do, would do good as far as it went, and which would indicate at least our desire to meet with deference and respect the convictions entertained by the House of Commons, even although we did not entirely and absolutely share them, if it could be done without a vital sacrifice of the public interests. I refer to the duty on Fire Insurances.”—[3 Hansard, clxxiv. 590.]

Therefore, my answer to the hon. Gentleman on that point is that his argument was unnecessary, because we were perfectly aware, independent of the proof he has given of it to-night, that the wishes of the House—the present state of the law continuing—cannot be and do not remain entirely fulfilled. One word more. The hon. Member says that the former decisions were verdicts. Why, then, does he want another? But I object to his Motion out of his own mouth. This is a Motion not merely indicating a reduction of the duty on Fire Insurance, but indicating the particular form, manner, and degree in which it should be reduced. Why is the House of Commons on the 21st of March—the financial year coming to its close ten days hence—now to indicate the degree in which the Fire Insurance duty is to be reduced? But the hon. Member himself supplies me with this answer. He proposes a Motion, and though in the same breath he says he knows of a better Motion, he yet asks the House to agree to the first one. He proposes a Motion, the effect of which is a reduction of the duty to a uniform standard of 1s. 6d.; and in his own speech he tells you that one of 1s. would be better. Can there be a more lively illustration of the inconvenience of dealing with these questions before their proper time? [“No, no!”] Hon. Gentlemen say, “No!” Have they read the Motion? It states that it is expedient that the reduction in this duty made last Session—that is to say to 1s. 6d.—should be extended to all descriptions of property. But that is not stating that it is desirable to reduce it uniformly to 1s. The hon. Member’s speech and his Motion are in conflict the one with the other; for while on the one hand he calls upon the House to vote that the reduction of 1s. 6d. shall be made uniform, he declares in his speech—and with greater reason—that a general reduction to 1s. would be a great deal more satisfactory. [“Hear, hear!”] Well, but if you think that, you ought to join with me in voting against this Resolution, which binds you to a reduction to 1s. 6d. [“No, no!”] The petitioners on the subject of this duty have never indicated what in their opinion is the amount of duty which it is desirable to levy. [“Yes!”] As compared with 3s., or 2s. 6d., or 2s., or even 1s. 6d., they may, I grant you, have done so; but I am not aware that the petitioners in favour of the reduction of this duty have ever stated that if they had the whole matter in their hands they would fix it at 1s. 6d., or have ever treated it otherwise than as a fair subject for a compromise. Why, then, should the House not reserve to itself the discretion of dealing with the question at large when the proper time comes, and when it may be able to form some estimate of the means at command for purposes of remission? Why is it to depart from the just and wise usages which regulate the functions of the Government and the House in regard to taxation, when it recollects the fair admissions which I have made in respect of the history of this duty and the view we take as to the just authority of the House in these questions? I venture to say the hon. Member would see that he has really nothing to gain—perhaps less than nothing—by asking the House for a decision at this moment. He leaves us no choice or discretion whatever. It would be an absolute abandonment of our duty for us to accede to this Resolution. If we acceded to it how could we decline to accede to other Resolutions that would come forward, not perhaps at this time, but at another moment, in regard to other duties having excellent claims to remission? We desire, Sir, to pay due respect to this House; and for these reasons I beg to move the Previous Question.

MR. CRAWFORD, who rose amid loud cries of “Divide!” said, that he had on a previous occasion supported the hon. Gentleman who had made this Motion, but he was unable to vote with him that evening. He was about to take what he knew to be an unpopular course with those whom he had the honour to represent, but he thought the present Motion was inopportune, and that it would be inexpedient to fetter themselves and the Ministry by an abstract Resolution.

MR. HUBBARD wished to know whether this country was to be governed entirely by the Administration, or in part by the House of Commons—because, if the House of Commons were to have any voice in the Government, it surely had a right to express an opinion at some time on such a subject as the present. If the House declared its opinion in regard to the remission of a particular tax before the Budget, it was told it was premature; if after the Budget, it was told it was too late, that everything was settled, and that the Resolution should have been proposed long ago. This was his answer to the advice given to the House by the hon. Member for the City of London. Last year he (Mr. Hub-hard) requested the hon. Member for Dudley not to press his Motion, but to leave the matter in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Remembering, however, the way in which the right hon. Gentleman had failed to carry out the wishes and instructions of the House in his Budget last year, he should vote with the hon. Member for Dudley, and should strongly recommend him to press his Motion to a division.

MR. JACKSON, who also rose amid loud calls of "Divide!" said, he did not often trouble the House, but he wished to be allowed to join in the appeal made to the hon. Member for Dudley by the hon. Member for the City (Mr. Crawford) not to divide the House. He was a supporter of the principle of the measure, but having heard the acknowledgment by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the power of that House in such matters he thought the matter might safely be left in his hands. He had no doubt the right hon. Gentleman, after what he had said, would meet the wishes of the House as far as his means would go.

MR. MALINS trusted that the hon. Member for Dudley (Mr. Sheridan) would not be led off on the false scent just thrown out, but would divide the House. The idea of leaving the matter to the Chancellor of the Exchequer was a mere delusion. The reduction of the duties on Fire Insurance was not a favourite measure with the right hon. Gentleman. It was a tax for which no man would say a word, for it was a tax of 200 per cent on prudence and forethought. If hon. Members at the time when the Budget was proposed made a suggestion of this kind, the right hon. Gentleman told the House that he could not have his plans disturbed. Whether they brought the matter forward before the Budget, after the Budget, or at the time of the Budget, they were always wrong. What, then, was the duty of Parliament? Clearly to put its finger on such a tax, and express an opinion for the guidance of the Government. The Resolution of the House was not without its influence upon the right hon. Gentleman last year, and if the House affirmed the Resolution now before it the Chancellor of the Exchequer would find it impossible to resist such an expression of opinion. He verily believed the right hon. Gentleman intended to propose the reduction of the duty, and that was the interpretation he put upon his moving the Previous Question.

hon. Friend would divide the House. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to reduce the wine duty he said that the reduction would be an advantage to the public. He added that he believed that the Exchequer would soon be replenished. Why should not the same argument be true in this case, when it was stated that there was £800,000,000 of insurable property within a few miles round London, of which 80 per cent was uninsured mainly because there was a tax of 200 per cent upon insurance.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had charged him with inconsistency in moving a Resolution to reduce the duty to 1s. 6d., when he was really in favour of a duty of 1s.; but all he meant to say was, that he had always advocated the reduction to 1s. as the point at which the duty ought ultimately to stand. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer would reduce the duty to that amount, he would earn the gratitude of the country.

Whereupon Previous Question put, "That that Question be now put."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

The House divided :—Ayes 137; Noes 65: Majority 72.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the reduction of Fire Insurance Duty, made in the last Session, be extended, at the earliest opportunity, to houses, household goods, and all descriptions of insurable property.

CHEMISTS AND DRUGGISTS (No. 2) BILL.

BILL ORDERED. FIRST READING.

Order for Committee read.

Acts read ;—considered in Committee.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY moved, that the Chairman be directed to move the House for leave to bring in a Bill for regulating the qualifications of chemists and druggists in England and Wales. It was very much to be desired that these two bodies should come together, and as the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) had already a Bill before the House upon this subject, he proposed, if the Motion were agreed to, to fix any future stages of his Bill for the same days as those on which the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman were set down, so that, if necessary, they might both be referred to a Select Committee.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that as soon as soon as he was acquainted with the provisions of the Bill about to be introduced he should be happy to communicate with the hon. Baronet, and between them a measure might be agreed upon calculated to work satisfactorily. If, however, as he had some reason to believe, the measure of the hon. Baronet went beyond his own in many particulars, he should be sorry to risk the loss of some one Bill of a practical nature this Session by striving after objects which might prove to be unattainable.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, That leave be given to bring in a Bill for regulating the qualifications of Chemists and Druggists in England and Wales.

House resumed.

Resolution reported.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir JOHN SHELLEY, Mr. CHARLES FORSTER, and Mr. AYRTON.

ARMY (LIBRARIES, &amp;c.)

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. WHALLEY moved an Address for a Catalogue of the Books that are at present placed in the Libraries and Reading Rooms to each Troop, Battery, or Company in the British Establishment, and for which an annual sum is sought by Vote 15 of Army Estimates, page 60. The War Office, he believed, objected to the Motion, because these libraries at present were in the hands of the colonels of regiments, and the Department did not think the matter sufficiently important to interfere. It was certainly a question how far the education of soldiers ought to be left entirely to commanding officers. Books were introduced into these libraries which, if known, would not be permitted by the War Office. He refrained from going into details, but he might mention one instance. He had himself read a history of England published originally under the sanction of the Committee of Privy Council on Education which was a complete travesty of all the ordinary accepted facts in our history, which represented, for instance, the massacre of St. Bartholomew as originally planned by the Protestants for the massacre of the Roman Catholics, and that book was admitted into regimental libraries. There was another book called Red, White, and Blue, which was calculated to make soldiers discontented with their position, and the whole scope of which was to exalt the Roman Catholic religion. It was of great importance that the War Office should take some cognizance of this matter. The books which soldiers and sailors read were calculated to exercise considerable influence on their minds. Dibdin's works had been circulated among our sailors at the public expense, and he thought it was quite fitting that this subject should be brought to the attention of the War Office, and that inquiry should be made what books were placed in the hands of the Roman Catholic soldiers.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, a Copy of the Catalogue of the Books that are at present placed in the Libraries and Reading Rooms to each Troop, Battery, or Company in the British Establishment, and for which an annual sum is sought by Vote 15 of Army Estimates, page 60."—(Mr. Whalley.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the explanation which he had given to the hon. Member when he spoke to him on the subject was not, he found, entirely correct. The practice formerly was that books provided for the libraries of regiments were supplied directly either from the War Office or the Horse Guards. At present the practice was that, instead of books being supplied from London, an allowance was voted annually by the House, a certain sum per company, and regiments themselves provided in such manner as was thought fit the books required for the use of the library. The management of these libraries was in the hands of the committee of officers and non-commissioned officers, and no books were allowed to be added to the library except with the permission of the commanding officer, who was always obliged to mention in his quarterly Report what books or periodicals had been added to the library, and these Reports were submitted to the Council on Military Education. He considered these precautions quite sufficient guarantee against the introduction of any book of improper character or irreligious tendency into these libraries. The books of which the libraries at their foundation were composed were originally issued either by the War Office or the Horse Guards, and they had been added too with the approval of the Council on Education. He did not think it necessary that the subject should be further inquired into. There was another reason why he was unwilling to give the Returns now asked. The books in these regimental libraries were extremely numerous, and if a catalogue were had from every regiment the Return would be found so voluminous that no one would be disposed to bestow on it any time or trouble. Under these circumstances, he hoped the hon. Member would not press his Motion.

BILL ORDERED. FIRST READING.

Order for Committee read.

MR. GOSCHEN, in moving that the House resolve into Committee, in order that the Chairman might be directed to move for leave to bring in a Bill to provide for the abolition of certain tests in connection with academical degrees in the University of Oxford, stated that the Bill was identical with that introduced last year by the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Dodson); and, as it had then been fully debated, he did not think it necessary now to make any statement on the subject. It would be more convenient to take the discussion on the second reading. He, therefore, confined himself to moving that the Speaker do now leave the Chair.

MR. WALPOLE observed, that if the Bill was identical with that introduced last year, the only observation he had now to make was that the hon. Mover must expect the same opposition. He thought it would have been better to introduce a Bill amended in form instead of the identical measure which had only reached the Committee last year.

MR. DODSON said, that the Bill of last Session had been introduced by its promoters in the shape in which they were anxious it should pass, and that they had left it to its opponents to give notice of such Amendments as they might think fit. It was not correct to say that the Bill had only reached the Committee, for the fact was that it had been read a third time, and had only been thrown out on the question that the Bill do pass.

SMALL BENEFICES (IRELAND) ACT AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL 13.]

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, it was introduced for the purpose of removing a manifest defect in the existing law in reference to benefices in Ireland. As the law stood at present, when parishes were too large and populous for ecclesiastical arrangements a division might be made and a church built in what became a district parish, and if any person subscribed money for the purpose the patronage of the new church might be vested in trustees to be appointed by them. But in the working of the various Acts of Parliament on the subject, this difficulty had arisen, that the actual transfer of the new church to the patronage of trustees could not be made until the church was completely built and the first incumbent appointed. The result was that there was no security beforehand that the transfer of the patronage would actually be made; and the reason being because there could be no transfer of patronage without the consent of the rector or vicar of the parish and the bishop of the diocese for the time being. It might be that both rector and bishop might be willing to make the transfer, but it by no means followed that after the lapse of a few years, when the church was built, the same vicar or bishop might be there, and the succeeding vicar or bishop was at liberty to say that he took a different view of the matter, and refuse to give the arrangement his sanction. In England no difficulty of the kind could arise, for there it was provided that agreements might be made by the vicar and bishop for the time being which should bind their successors; and thus persons who subscribed their money upon the faith of having the patronage transferred had ample security that the arrangement would be carried into effect. The first object of this Bill, therefore, was to assimilate the law of Ireland to that of England with respect to this transfer of patronage. The Bill also provided that in all these district parishes the fees which were paid for church services—that is, for baptisms, marriages, and burials—should be paid to the incumbent of those parishes, and not to the incumbent of the mother Church. That was the law already as to marriages in Ireland by special legislation. In England it was the law in regard to all the church services, and upon this point also it was intended to assimilate the law in both countries. The same arrangements as existed in this country with regard to the money collected at the offertory were also provided for in the Bill. He trusted the House would consider the provisions which he had described free from objection, and that it would assent to the second reading of the Bill, which he now begged leave to move.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed for Wednesday next.

BILL—[BILL 66]—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, in moving that the Railway Travelling (Ireland) Bill be now read a second time, said, that the Bill was in substance the same as that which he had introduced towards the close of last Session, but which was thrown out on the second reading in a very small House. The object of the Bill was to secure to the public of Ireland the power of travelling on railways on Sundays, and also to give to third-class railway passengers in Ireland the privileges which were enjoyed by the same class in England. The feeling which existed north of the Tweed with respect to Sunday travelling did not prevail in Ireland, and circumstances which had recently occurred justified him in bringing forward this measure. From the introduction of railways into Ireland, some twenty years ago, almost every railway in that country ran one or two Sunday trains; but lately on some of the lines Sunday trains had been discontinued. This was the case on the Limerick and Waterford Railway. This line was the main artery of communication between Dublin and the south and south-west of Ireland. The Sunday traffic on this line had been stopped for the last two years, and the result was great inconvenience. No one, however urgent his business, could leave Clare for Dublin or elsewhere by rail between four o'clock on Saturday afternoon and eight o'clock on Monday morning; and no one could leave Limerick, a town of nearly 50,000 inhabitants, between eleven o'clock on Saturday night and eleven o'clock on Sunday night. He thought that was a state of things which ought not to exist. He took the instance of the Waterford and Limerick line, not because it stood alone, but because it was the principal company that had stopped Sunday trains. A paper had been circulated by the opponents of this Bill, which stated that there were twelve railways in Ireland, which did not run Sunday trains. How they made that out he could not tell, for according to a Return which had been presented to Parliament not very long ago, made up to July of last year, and which showed all the companies in England and Ireland which did not run Sunday trains, it appeared that in England and Wales there were 145 railways, with a mileage of 7,760 miles, which run Sunday trains, while there were only 23, with a mileage of 807 miles, which did not run Sunday trains, and these were chiefly small branch lines of from 5 to 15 miles, and that in Ireland there were 32 railways, with a mileage of 1,453 miles, which ran Sunday trains, and only 3, with a mileage of 293 miles, which did not run Sunday trains. It would, indeed, appear from the Return that the Limerick and Waterford Company did run a Sunday train, but the manner in which that company evaded the Return and made it appear as if they ran Sunday trains was, that they ran a train at eleven o'clock on Sunday night in accordance with the compulsory requirements of the Post Office. The first three clauses of the Bill dealt with the Sunday train

question, and the other two clauses with third-class passenger trains. The first clause required that every railway company in Ireland should run one passenger train each way every Sunday, unless they were excused by the Board of Trade. The next clause provided, in order to prevent any evasion of the Act by running a train at eleven o'clock on Sunday night, and calling it a Sunday train, that the time of departure of such trains should be fixed by the Board of Trade. The third clause empowered the Board of Trade to excuse any company from running Sunday trains where it was shown that it would not interfere with the public convenience. This Bill differed from that of last Session by giving this discretionary power to the Board of Trade. The discretionary power of running or not Sunday trains ought not to rest, as it does at present, with the directors of railway companies, who might be actuated by some religious feeling, or who cared nothing for the convenience of the public, or who might believe that Sunday trains did not pay, although it was absolutely necessary for the convenience of the public that they should run on Sundays. By the Bill that discretionary power was taken away from directors and vested in a public Board responsible to that House. With regard to the other part of the Bill, he believed there would be no controversy upon it. At present, third-class passengers from Tralee to Dublin, or Ennis to Dublin, a journey of about six hours, had to sleep on the road. Now that was a state of things which did not exist in England, and ought not any longer to be permitted in Ireland. Some of the arguments that had been used against the Bill appeared to be untenable, and could not be supported. It was urged in the first place that it proposed a peculiar and exceptional legislation for Ireland. That no doubt was so; but one reason for it was that the inconvenience had arisen in Ireland, and did not exist elsewhere. Another reason was, that there is a difference between England or Scotland and Ireland with reference to the observance of the Sabbath—for instance, the National Gallery in Dublin was open after divine service on Sunday, and the privilege was very greatly appreciated. Sunday trains, too, in Ireland, were greatly used, and he believed that if the railway company were to stop the trains at present running on Sundays between Kingstown and Dublin, riots would take place almost equal to those which had recently taken place at

Belfast. He was confident not one of the Irish Members who intended to oppose this Bill would or had refused to go down to Kingstown on a Sunday, or would wish to see the Sunday trains on that line stopped. The House would probably bear in mind that though in Scotland the Botanical Gardens were not open on Sundays, they had opened them in Dublin. The National Gallery was not open in England, though the gallery of Hampton Court Palace was open on Sunday, and it certainly was very curious that what was wrong in London was not wrong at Hampton Court Palace. The opening of the National Gallery and the Botanical Gardens in Dublin had been attended with great advantages to the working classes, and he had mentioned it to show that grounds existed for Sunday legislation for Ireland which did not exist in England or Scotland. Another argument used against the Bill was, that the House had no right by ex post facto legislation to compel railway companies to bear burdens which the law did not originally impose upon them. But the Legislature and this House had provided against this argument by the Act of 1844, and the Standing Orders of 1852. It is true that the Limerick and Waterford Company obtained their Bill before 1844; but they had since obtained other Bills in 1845, 1850, 1855, and 1860, and consequently they came under the provisions of the Act of 1844, and the Standing Orders of 1852, which made them liable to the provisions of any general Act relating to railways in force, or that might be passed during any future Session of Parliament, for the regulation and management of railways. Therefore this could not be called an attempt at ex post facto legislation, as against them, or any other company similarly circumstanced. But supposing there was neither Act or Standing Order, would the House assent to the proposition that railway companies were not subject to the jurisdiction of that House? Why, the opponents of this Bill might as well say that any future legislation with reference to communication existing between railway passengers and guards should not affect the present railways. Every company must be made subject to the public convenience, no matter when their Act was obtained. Another argument against the Bill was, that as Sunday trains did not pay, the House ought not to compel railway companies to run them. Those who used this argument appeared to forget that railways existed for the benefit of the public, and not the public for the benefit of the railways. Railways did not stand in the same position as carriers and stage coaches, and they could not refuse to run trains because they did not pay. There was no difference in principle between requiring a railway company to run a train each way on Sunday, whether it paid or not, and requiring them to run a train each way on week days, whether it paid or not, as was required by the Act of 1854. On the broad question of Sunday travelling there was much conscientious difference of opinion. That question had been discussed in and out of the House. But it was monstrous to say that the convenience of a few railway officials, or the scruples of directors, should prevent railway travelling on Sundays. The poor required travelling on Sunday more than the rich. One class could travel any day in the week; the other could not leave their work on the six days. But even the rich often required to travel on Sunday. He knew an instance in which a noble lady, visiting a dying father, was unable to proceed to her destination, because there was no Sunday travelling in Scotland. He knew also an instance in Ireland, in which an eminent physician, who had been telegraphed for from Dublin, could not attend the patient because there was no Sunday train. Altogether, the Bill would remedy a great public inconvenience; it did not go too far, and he asked the House with great confidence to allow it to be read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Colman O'Loghlen.)

MR. BLAKE regretted, from esteem he had for the hon. Baronet who introduced the Bill, that he was again obliged to endeavour to frustrate what he seemed so anxious to carry; but his proposal would inflict so much injustice and injury on the proprietors of the railway lines, on whose behalf he spoke, that he felt it his duty to do so. Before entering on the real question before them, he would only remark that the portion of the Bill which provided for giving third class passengers increased facilities for reaching their destination at the same time as second class, were to a great extent unobjectionable, and if he embodied that part in another Bill he would, with certain modifications, be disposed to support instead of opposing him. The section,

however, which made it compulsory on all Irish railways to travel on Sundays was very different indeed, and he would confine his objections altogether to endeavouring to induce the House not to pass the Bill on the ground of the highly objectionable nature of the clauses relating to Sunday travelling. As he regretted he could not lay claim to such highly religious scruples as others regarding travelling on Sunday, he would waive the use of the strong argument which he might use against the Bill in relation to Sabbath observance, and would simply lay before the House the business aspect of the matter. The hon. Baronet and the other hon. Members whose names appeared on the back of the Bill, admitted that their efforts had for their object the compelling of the railways in the counties of Clare and Limerick to run on Sundays. He was alluded to as representing the Waterford and Limerick Railway, but he spoke on behalf of the proprietary of four other companies in that district as well. Notwithstanding the assertion of the hon. Baronet to the contrary, the House could not fail to see that the legislation he proposed was ex post facto in its character, and would impose on railways obligations which they neither undertook or contemplated when they obtained their Bills and constructed their lines on the faith that they would not have to do more than carry out the provisions contained in the former. It would be a great blow to railway enterprise if shareholders, after subscribing their capital, would be liable to have obligations, by which they would be certain to lose, imposed on them after their lines were in operation. The hon. Baronet said that the Bill now before them differed materially from that of last Session, inasmuch as it would be left to the Board of Trade to decide whether, taking certain things into consideration, trains should run on Sundays. But it would be a monstrous invasion of the rights of railway companies to take the power out of the hands of those directors to decide regarding the working of their lines for a seventh part of the whole year. The House could easily imagine how a few Members of Parliament, living in a particular district, could bring such a pressure to bear on the President of the Board of Trade as would influence him to direct that trains should run even to the injury of the proprietors. Why should such power be given to a Minister of the Crown as to decide what line should have a Sunday train, and what line should not? How would he ascertain the necessities of a distant district in Ireland? Was he to issue a Commission of Inquiry? Was he to turn the Board of Trade into a railway committee-room and to hear evidence from both sides? He would confine his illustration of the monstrous injustice that would be perpetrated to that particular district which he represented. The Waterford and Limerick was 77 miles long; the Foynes 25; Ennis 26; Castleconnell 13; and Limerick and Birdhill 18. Sunday running, under the Bill, would involve keeping 880 officials of all descriptions at work. Calculating the extra sum they should be paid at an average of 2s. 6d. the company, independent of the wear and tear of carriages, fuel, &c., would incur a cost of £110 a day, or £5,720 a year. Calculating the receipts from passengers, say twenty-five at ten shillings, which was far beyond what would be likely to travel in the winter months, the proceeds would be £12 10s. a week, or £650 a year; so that the proprietors on these lines would lose upwards of a thousand a year. Now, this was no theory; the experiment had been tried for a long time on all these lines of running Sunday trains, and the result was a terrific loss. On the Ennis and Limerick line an average of only three through tickets were issued; on some of the smaller lines not so many; and on the Waterford and Limerick it was equally bad. The directors, acting for the interest of the shareholders, wisely resolved to stop such a ruinous business. The promoters of the Bill contended if the companies ran on Sundays that traffic would be developed, and that they would be compensated at last, but the experiment had been fairly tried for a long period, and was only given up when it was found that the Sunday traffic was getting from bad to worse. The hon. Baronet had already endeavoured to enforce railway travelling in Ireland on Sunday in the courts of law, and had been defeated. [Sir COLMAN O'LOGHLEN remarked that the case was abandoned.] The case was no doubt abandoned, but only at that critical period when to have proceeded further with it would have ensured defeat. But having been virtually defeated in the courts of law, it was unfair for the hon. Baronet to come forward with a Bill in Parliament for securing the same object, which if applied to England or Scotland would not for a moment be entertained by Parliament.

One of the arguments in favour of the Bill was that the lines were in the hands of a millionaire and a monopolist, and that the battle was fought not for the benefit of a large body of shareholders but in the interest of a single individual. It was quite true that Mr. Malcolmson was the chief owner of the lines in question; and it was very fortunate that there was an individual with the capital and spirit to take up lines that had broken down in other hands and make them a success. And, even supposing Mr. Malcolmson was the sole proprietor, was he on that account to be mulcted in heavy loss for doing what no one else, with the condition the country was in, would venture to do. He begged to call the attention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the few occupants who were on the Treasury Benches to one fact which should, he thought, influence them in not supporting the Bill before them. Nearly all the lines in question had, owing to the depression which prevailed in Ireland, been obliged to obtain advances from the Treasury, and lately had to apply to the Government for an extension of time for payment, in consequence of their receipts not doing much more than meeting their expenses. The Treasury were, therefore, creditors of these lines, and interested in their being able to meet their liabilities; but if Government imposed obligations on them which would still further depress them they would not be in a position to meet those engagements, and should lay on Government the onus of having rendered them so to a great extent by sanctioning the Bill then before the House. The hon. Baronet had urged strongly that Parliament ought to consult the convenience of the large number of inhabitants through which the railways ran, and yet, singular enough, not even a solitary petition had come from these people in support of his Bill; and if the interest of the public was to be consulted, and that railway officials and servants were to be considered as part of the public, surely giving a day of rest to 880 hard worked men, could be well weighed against the travelling on Sunday of twenty-five individuals, who in most instances it could be shown could quite as well have travelled on Saturday or Monday. In conclusion, he earnestly hoped the House would, by as decisive a majority as occurred last year, reject the Bill. He admitted, before it would be stated by others, that he spoke on behalf of a public spirited individual quite as much as on behalf of the other proprietors. He was em-playing his vast resources and great abilities in an endeavour to resuscitate that country, and on his part he asked them not to mar his useful efforts by imposing obligations of so unjust and exceptional a character as that contemplated by the Bill.

Mr. LEFROY, in seconding the Amendment, said, he objected to the Bill both upon religious and financial grounds. The Legislature had declared that all acts, except those of necessity and piety, were unlawful on the Sabbath day; and yet the proposal involved in the present Bill was that 880 railway officials should be employed in unnecessary labour on Sunday and prevented from attendance to their religious duties and separated from their families. And when the House considered that this was done for the convenience of perhaps five-and-twenty persons, he thought they would refuse to sanction the measure. Upon financial grounds the Bill was also objectionable, inasmuch as it would entail an annual expenditure of £5,000 upon certain railway companies which were not in a position to make such an outlay. Not a single petition had been presented in favour of the running of such trains, and so inadequate a case had been made out that he hoped his hon. and learned Friend would withdraw the Bill, and not put the House to the trouble of dividing.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Blake.)

COLONEL DICKSON wished to know whether the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake) stood there as a shareholder in the lines of railway to which he referred, or as a partizan of the proprietors of the great lines? He was, unfortunately, largely interested in two of these lines, and he stood there to protest against any interference with their interests. Of Mr. Malcolmson he desired to speak with all respect. Now Mr. Malcolmson happened to be Chairman of the Waterford and Limerick line, which owing to gross mismanagement had not been prosperous; but he hoped the exertions of Mr. Malcolmson would restore prosperity to it. He should not enter into the religious view of the question; but when hon. Members talked of the immorality of travelling on Sunday he would ask them—Did they never go to Greenwich to dine on a

Sunday? Did they never employ their servants on Sunday? Railways had, of course superseded every other means of travelling, and there was no reason why they should not ask for the removal of the inconveniences at present felt. He protested against those small lines being sacrificed to the great ones. The falling off in the receipts on the small lines was not to be attributed to Sunday travelling, but to the very injudicious way in which their affairs had been arranged. A report had prevailed in the autumn that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had a scheme for purchasing the railways of the kingdom, and as far as regarded the railways of Ireland he wished that the right hon. Gentleman had carried out his scheme. He thought that some steps should be taken to remove the smaller lines from the influence of the great lines, and that the time had come for some legislation on the question.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, that he knew nothing of the squabbles referred to between different railway companies, and he thought it would be better for the House to leave them to manage their affairs their own way. But the Bill before them was not of a local and personal nature—it raised a question of very great importance, and he could not help expressing his surprise that, on a question affecting the trade of the country, the House had not the advantage of the presence of the President of the Board of Trade. With regard to the Sunday question he had his opinions; but the present Bill had nothing to do with that subject. This was a proposition to interfere in a manner never dreamt of for years past with the mode in which persons might carry on their trade. A railway was, no doubt, a public highway. It must be open every day in the week, like any other public highway, and any person who liked had a right to run a carriage upon it, on paying the tolls prescribed by the Act of Parliament. He was aware that that right was not practically exercised. But let the House remember the position of a railway company. Being the proprietors of the highway, they might or might not, as they pleased, become public carriers; they might, if they pleased, run trains on a part only of their line, or they might run trains on certain days only in the week. As regards the law, they were just as free as any other carriers to carry when and how they pleased. If the House were to require railway companies to run trains on Sundays for the public convenience, why should it not for the same reason require them to run trains more than once a day, or at different times from what they did if some of the public chose to think it for their convenience that they should do so? But he thought the House was hardly prepared to say to the railway companies "You are public carriers, and in that capacity we will make you run trains when we think it convenient." The hon. and learned Baronet (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) who introduced this Bill, said that the principle of legislative interference with railway companies was affirmed by the Act of 1854, requiring companies to run what were called Parliamentary trains. But that measure was to be confined to railways which were thenceforward to be constructed, and it did not extend to railways which had already been completed. But besides, the principle on which that Act was passed was, that the poorer classes ought not to be deprived of an accommodation which was afforded to the rich, and it was not sanctioned by Parliament merely in order that the public at large should be accommodated. The hon. and learned Baronet further said that at the end of every Railway Bill there was inserted a clause declaring that the company should be subject to the provisions of any future Act for the regulation of railway traffic. The object of that clause, however, was merely to subject railway companies to subsequent legislation, having for its object the safety of the public. But was it meant that it should authorize the House to legislate in the way of fixing the amount of fares? [SIR COLMAN O'LOUGHLIN: Hear, hear!] He was aware that Parliament had laid down a maximum of railway fares which railway companies could not exceed; but that was a very different thing from declaring what was the particular charge to be made to each class of passengers. Parliament never meant by that Act to confiscate the property of railway shareholders. He would ask, if the principle of the Bill was a sound one, why should it not be extended to England and to Scotland? for it was well known that, in some parts of England and throughout Scotland generally, no trains were run on Sundays. Let the hon. and learned Baronet bring in a general measure upon the subject, and the House would, after due deliberation, know how to deal with such a proposal; but as he conceived that this Bill was fraught with danger in regard to the true principle of legislation, he trusted that the House would not consent to the second reading.

LORD JOHN BROWNE said, he knew an instance in which the life of a gentleman in Ireland had been greatly endangered because it was found impossible to send for a surgeon by railway on Sunday after he had met with a serious accident. The House had already interfered in various ways with railway companies, and had in particular insisted on their providing accommodation for the working classes. He believed that the general feeling in Ireland was decidedly in favour of the measure.

MR. ROEBUCK said, they had heard a very ingenious technical argument from the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns), but the hon. and learned Gentleman had carefully kept out of view the real character of railway companies. They were not private traders in the ordinary sense of the words. Their character was a distinct and peculiar one. First of all, they asked the House for peculiar powers; and the House in granting those powers had a right to require from them in return the performance of certain duties. Besides, the House by granting those powers drove from the same line of traffic every other person whatever. Parliament was, therefore, bound in that case to take care of the public interests. The hon. and learned Member for Belfast had talked of "confiscating" the rights of those companies. There was no word more displeasing to English ears. But there was no confiscation in the matter. In 1844 Parliament told the railway companies that when they obtained Bills they must take them with the understanding that the House would, if it so thought fit, interfere with them; and did not the House interfere with the whole of railway transactions? The House laid down no maximum fare in the case of a common stagecoach, but it did in the case of a railway. The hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns) said that when a railway company constructed a line they became common carriers. Did they? Were they not very uncommon carriers? Did they not drive everybody else from competition? And when the hon. Gentleman talked in the way he did, was it not a farce, and was not the hon. and learned Member endeavouring to impose upon them, and was he not trifling with the common sense of the House? He had not touched upon the religious part of the question, for the

hon. and learned Baronet (Sir Colman O'Loghlen) said he would not raise that question; and the hon. Member for Dublin University (Mr. Lefroy) had touched the question in a very gingerly manner. The attempt to introduce the Sabbatical question into this discussion deserved to be scouted by the House. Then he came to the question whether there was any harm in transferring the decision in such cases from the railway directors to the Board of Trade. And here he could not help saying that the Government were not represented as they ought to be on that occasion. He would pay the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for Ireland every respect, but he ought to have been aided on that occasion by the President of the Board of Trade or the Chancellor of the Exchequer. They knew that there were looming in the distance things with respect to railways in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer was greatly interested; they knew that railways in Ireland were now engaging his attention; and they should have liked very much to have heard his opinion on this matter. This question might touch the financial arrangements of the Irish railways. But the interests of the public had been represented in an extraordinary manner on that occasion. He could not think that the interests of the public were of such a character that they would justify the Irish railway authorities in exclaiming, "We shall be ruined and destroyed by such a proposal;" nor could he think that by acceding to this proposition and putting the matter in the hands of the Board of Trade they would be doing any great injury to the financial interests of the Irish railway companies.

MAJOR GAVIN said, that in matters of legislation the interests of the greatest number ought to be considered. Now, it had been stated that if the trains in Ireland ran on a Sunday 800 railway officials would be inconvenienced; but he would put against that number the 50,000 people in Limerick who were inconvenienced by the want of a Sunday train. No one could regret more than himself that any Irish railway should not pay; but he believed that in some districts Sunday would eventually be the best paying day, if trains ran on that day. But whether that were so or no, he believed that the ordinary traffic paid well, and the railway directors should be satisfied though they might lose in one particular if the traffic paid generally. Foynes, one of the best and safest har-bours in Ireland, was likely to become a great station for America, and he believed that if many steamers started from that port four trains, instead of one, would be needed to run on a Sunday. He hoped that the House would pass the Bill, which would operate to the great convenience of all in the south of Ireland.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he would not dwell on the Sabbatical view of the question. Under the Jewish law a man was restricted to a Sabbath-day's journey, which he supposed was about two furlongs; but he read of nothing of the sort under the Christian dispensation, and he saw no impropriety in people enjoying the treat of an excursion on Sunday. He agreed that railways were the creatures of legislation, and that the House had the right to resume what it had conferred; and though retrospective legislation was not liked in the House or in the country, that did not apply to all times and all circumstances, and he thought it was competent to the House to interfere if a fair case were made out. They had heard "the public" very much spoken of in the course of the debate; they had also heard of the three tailors of Tooley Street speaking in the name of the people of England; and the complaint in the present case seemed to originate with some twenty-five persons, one-fourth of whom were Members of that House. The hon. and gallant Member for Limerick (Major Gavin) complained that the people of that city had no means of getting from that place on Sundays. He (Mr. Longfield) had certainly found it one of the saddest places he was ever in on a Sunday; but he thought the people there might find opportunities if they chose to avail themselves of them; but by some unaccountable stupidity the people of Limerick, when they had the opportunity, did not like to pay for it. They might talk about "the public" if they pleased; but there was no substantial grievance here to be redressed. He had no sympathy with Scotch legislation. A man might as innocently go to Greenock or Dumbarton on a Sunday as stay at home and get drunk there; and a man might as innocently go to Kingstown on a Sunday as stay in Dublin and get drunk. That was the alternative. In the same way he had no objection to the people of Limerick going to Foynes on Sunday if they pleased. But had the promoters of this Bill made out any case for this exceptional legislation for the ruin of these companies? One railway in Ireland had already become bankrupt, and if they passed this Bill every shareholder in the half-paying and non-paying lines of Ireland would, by the peculiarity of the law of that country, be subject to the bankrupt laws on the company becoming insolvent. This Bill had been introduced to accommodate a few Members of that House and an enormous district of twenty-five persons. There were no compunctious visitings of conscience on the part of proprietors of the Limerick and Waterford Company which induced them to forego the profits of Sunday trading. They had no strict Sabbatarian notions, if Sunday was a good paying day, not to avail themselves of the profits. And the most cogent and convincing evidence that Sunday trains in Ireland did not pay was to be found in the fact that the existing railways did not pay. Yet that House was called upon to compel them to become insolvent. The question was, whether the public were likely to be benefited by this compulsory legislation. He had as great a regard for the public as the hon. and learned Baronet who introduced this Bill and those who supported it; but confessed that, although the word public was a generic term, he had very little regard for it when it represented twenty-five gentlemen on one side and the solvency of the Irish railways on the other. He should oppose the Bill because he thought that the public would be more injured than benefited it by in the end.

LORD DUNKELLIN denied that this measure could properly be called exceptional, seeing that it was intended to extend the legislation of 1844. As to the allegation that only twenty-five persons travelled upon the particular line which had been alluded to, there could be no doubt that if an opportunity were only afforded them of doing so, a very large number of persons would travel upon it. As Ireland was a Roman Catholic country he would not offer any observations on the religious part of the question; but would pass to the financial. The hon. and learned Member for Belfast had compared railway companies to ordinary carriers on the highway; but there was no fair analogy between the two. If an ordinary carrier refused to convey on a Sunday that did not prevent the highway from being available to the public; but, if a railway company would not run its trains the line obviously could not be used by the public. The advocates of the Bill did not wish to make the companies work at a loss, but they desired that the different districts which they were bound to accommodate should not be practically cut off from the means of locomotion. The measure contained this safeguard for the interest of the companies, that it made it competent for the Board of Trade to enable them to cease running trains at a heavy sacrifice. It was asked why the Bill did not include England and Scotland as well as Ireland in its scope. The answer was, that England already enjoyed the accommodation which was wanting in Ireland; and as for Scotland its case was peculiar, but if the Scotch Members thought it expedient to bring in a Bill of the same kind for their country they would receive every support from the promoters of the present measure. The general feeling of the people of Ireland was in favour of such a Bill as that being at least tried for a time; and its adoption would afford some relief to those parts of the country, particularly the south and west, which were now entirely at the mercy of two great railway companies.

MAJOR HAMILTON said, that the hon. Member for Mayo (Lord John Browne) had mentioned a case in which a gentleman could not get medical assistance from Dublin in consequence of there being no railway traffic on Sunday. But he was happy to inform the House that there was sitting opposite to him a Gentleman who had that day expressed the opinions of his constituents, and was enabled to make his very lucid statement in consequence of there being no Sunday railway traffic in Ireland. His hon. and gallant Friend telegraphed when he was very ill for the doctor to go down to Limerick and see him; and the answer was that there was no railway travelling on Sunday, consequently the doctor could not go to Limerick, and his hon. and gallant Friend recovered and was in the House to make his lucid statement that day. Therefore, putting Limerick against Mayo, they had an even question as between Sunday railway travelling in Ireland and the absence of it. The objection of the people of Scotland to that Bill was that it might cause compulsory Sunday labour to be forced on railway officials in Ireland; and they were afraid that if it were now passed for Ireland it might, in a future Session, be held good for Scotland also.

CAPTAIN STACPOOLE very briefly supported the Bill.

MR. H. ROBERTSON said, the House was called upon by this Bill to say that trains should be run on Sundays on every line in Ireland; and that the President of the Board of Trade should fix the times of starting. He thought that nothing more vicious than such a Bill as applied to railway management could be conceived. If there was to be a Board external to the railway companies themselves which was to determine what trains were to be run, and to fix their times of running, let the House understand that that would very much involve the whole management of railways. It was proposed that it should first be decided that there was to be a particular train and then that an inquiry should be made to see whether it was wanted. That was inverting the natural order of things. The inquiry should go first and the decision come afterwards; and he maintained that when the passengers on a line amounted only to twenty-five no case was there made out for special legislation. It was sometimes said, and said truly, that Ireland was deficient in capital; but how were Englishmen, Scotchmen, or even Irishmen to be induced to invest their money in railways there if Parliament was to insist on the companies running one, two, or three trains on a particular day whether the traffic was remunerative or not? He trusted that such a mischievous Bill would be rejected.

The House divided:—Ayes 39; Noes 42: Majority 3.

Words added. Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES.—OBSERVATIONS.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, in presenting (by Command) Papers respecting the Termination of the Reciprocity Treaty, of 5th June, 1864, between Great Britain and the United States (North America, No. 2 1865), I wish to make a statement in regard to the relations between this country and the United States. My Lords, one of these papers is a letter from Mr. Adams, in which he states that he is commanded by the President to deliver to the British Government a notice, dated March 13, in regard to the termination of the Reciprocity Treaty between this country and the United States, and stating that this treaty will terminate twelve months from the date of the acknowledgment of that notice. Mr. Adams also encloses the vote of the Congress, which has been approved by the President, declaring that it was no longer for the interest of the United States that that treaty should continue. Coupled with this notice is a notice given with respect to the armament of the Lakes. These may perhaps be considered evidences of hostility towards this country; but I think that this is not really the case. I think it must be admitted that recent occurrences on the Lakes—namely, the seizure of vessels by the agents of the Confederacy and other acts of hostility—completely justify the United States in giving notice of the termination of the convention. My Lords, it was not to be expected that the United States would allow itself to remain open to the repetition of such acts of violence, or would submit passively to such acts without availing themselves of all the means of repression within their power. With regard to the Reciprocity Treaty, although I will not say there are sufficient grounds, yet there are grounds with respect to the admission of articles duty free into the United States which may induce the United States Government to wish for a renewal of the treaty with modifications that may be more advantageous, and which the United States Government may consider more just, to the United States. Accordingly, when Mr. Adams informed me of the result of the negotiations which had taken place between the President of the United States and the agents of the so-called Confederate States, I expressed to him a hope that when he should present to me the notice of the termination of the Reciprocity Treaty I should find that the Congress and Government of the United States would be ready to consider propositions, by which a small and limited armament might be kept up on the Lakes, for the purposes of police, on both sides; and also that a renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty, upon terms to be agreed upon by both parties, might be negotiated during the twelve months to elapse before the existing treaty ceased its operation. Of course, Mr. Adams was not authorized to give me any assurance upon the subject, but the language he used induces me to trust that such an assurance would be given. I am sure your Lordships will all be anxious that the relations between this country and the United States should continue as they are now, of a pacific and friendly character; and, for my part, I should be very sorry that anything should occur, or be done in this country, that would tend to prevent such a satisfactory result. But, my Lords, I cannot but think that expressions which have been used, and speeches which have been made, may tend to excite in the United States a disposition unfavourable towards the end which we thus desire to see accomplished. I allude to speeches declaring that this country has behaved wrongfully to the United States, has given the United States just cause of complaint, and that an unfriendly spirit has been shown by the English people throughout these transactions. My Lords, the obvious effect of speeches such as these must be that individuals in the United States who are in favour of hostilities with this country—and there is such a party there—must know that there is in this country a party ready to take up the view that the United States are in the right, and, therefore, that they will be wanting in proper spirit and in proper regard for the national interests and the national honour if they do not complain loudly of the conduct of this country. I ask your Lordships to attend for a short time to the statement which I have to make; because I cannot but think that the Government of this country and this country itself have been wrongfully accused upon these various points. One of the chief complaints put forward is, that this country, in a great hurry and without proper consideration, granted belligerent rights to what are called the Confederate States. Now, every one who knows anything of the law of nations knows perfectly well that although a country may put down insurgents who rise against its authority, yet that a country has no right or power to interfere with neutral commerce unless it assumes the position of a belligerent. But that is what the United States did. The President of the United States by his proclamation declared that the coasts of particular States were in a state of blockade, and that armed vessels belonging to those States were to be treated as pirates. There came representations on this subject from Her Majesty's Minister in the United States; but in the first instance these merely covered despatches from Admiral Sir Alexander Milne, commanding Her Majesty's squadron in those waters, asking how he was to treat the armed vessels of the two parties. At that time Lord Campbell held the high office of Lord Chancellor, and of course we consulted him and the Law Officers of the Crown as to what should be done. Lord Campbell declared, as we all supposed he would do, that there was no course but one to pursue—namely, to regard the blockade on the part of the United States as the exercise of a belligerent right, and as belligerent rights cannot be confined to one party, but are necessarily exercised against somebody else, our advisers told us that we were entitled to recognize the existence of belligerent rights on the part of both the combatants, and to declare Her Majesty's neutrality between the two parties. And this, accordingly, was the course which we advised Her Majesty to pursue. The proclamation in that sense was approved, if not actually drawn up, I believe, by my learned Friend the present Lord Chancellor, then one of the Law Officers of the Crown. The course of neutrality thus adopted was certainly received with favour, and, I believe, commended itself to the sentiments of the country as the right course for us to take. It is said now that we ought to have awaited the arrival of Mr. Adams. I know not what Mr. Adams could say on the subject. If I had told my Colleagues that we must wait for him and consult him, I believe it would only have caused embarrassment in the relations between the two countries. He could scarcely have approved anything which we did short of taking the part of the North against the South. But then, it is said, if the proclamation of neutrality was not altogether wrong, at any rate it ought to have been delayed, and that unfriendliness was shown in the manner of its promulgation. I conceive that there was nothing unfriendly, nothing uncourteous in the declaration; but, on the contrary, that it was the proper course for this country to declare at the earliest moment that it meant to take part neither with the North nor with the South, but to remain entirely neutral in the contest. Be it observed also that from the issue of that proclamation, on the 13th of May, Her Majesty's subjects were bound to take no part in the contest, and were warned that they would disobey Her Majesty's injunctions if they gave aid to one side or the other. Your Lordships all remember the affair of the Trent. It is said with regard to that affair, as with regard to the proclamation of neutrality, that the proceedings of the Government were unfriendly and uncourteous; and I am accused—not for the first time certainly, nor probably for the tenth time, but with as little justice now as on any of the former occasions—of having had a despatch put into my hands which ought to have been published, because it contained an assurance on the part of the United States Government that they did not intend to resist the delivery of the Commissioners. My Lords, that was very far from being the case. Although Mr. Adams did bring me a despatch on that occasion, it was a despatch relating chiefly to other questions between the two countries, and merely ending with a declaration that if any demand were made upon the subject of the Trent, that question would be fairly considered by the United States Government. The despatch was read to me by Mr. Adams, but it was not put into my hands, and therefore I could not publish it. Even had it been left with me, and had I published it, it would have given no satisfaction, because I certainly believed, and my noble Friend at the head of the Government also believed, up to the last moment, that it was entirely a matter of uncertainty whether the United States Government would give up these Commissioners, or whether they would refuse to do so, and withhold arbitration. And now, as to the manner in which these demands were made. In the first place, I wrote to Lord Lyons, and begged him not to make any demand in the first instance, but to see Mr. Seward and acquaint him with the nature of the despatch, and request that he would name a day when the despatch could be put into his hand, so that he might have the opportunity of consulting the President before he gave his answer. That appeared to me the course which it was most courteous to take. And I am bound to say, in mentioning these facts, that there is one circumstance connected with them which does the highest credit to the memory, good taste, and discretion of one whose loss the House and the nation have not yet ceased to regret—the late Prince Consort. At the last moment, after her Majesty had approved the despatch, my noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston) received a letter from the Prince Consort, in which His Royal Highness said that some of the expressions used in the despatch might be considered too abrupt, and suggested other phrases, which he thought might make it more easy for the Government of the United States to accept the request which it conveyed. These phrases, in deference to one who was so great a master of diplomatic language, were adopted by the Government and embodied in the despatch, and, doubtless, tended in some degree to render the document more acceptable to the United States Government, who were called upon by its terms to perform a duty in conformity with the law of nations and regarded by the people of this country as an act of justice. But it is said that, while we displayed great haste in acknowledging the South as belligerents, we were guilty of great supineness in the case of the Alabama; and upon this point I have only to state that the evidence on this subject was furnished to us by Mr. Adams, and that the information which we received was immediately laid before the Law Officers of the Crown. Their Report was received on the morning of the 29th, and it was immediately considered; but on the morning of that day the Alabama, having obtained some intimation of what was likely to occur, left Birkenhead, and was no longer within our reach. On this question, however, I will say no more, because it may form a matter for discussion between the Government of the United States and our own. I do not wish in any way to forestall that discussion, but I think I may say that we have done everything which either International Law or the laws of this country demanded of us in order to prevent the attacks made on the trade of the United States. There was, however, another case which was the subject of much discussion, and in respect to which exactly the man whom it is desirable Her Majesty should choose to represent her in the United States, and I hope that under his auspices the friendly relations between the two countries will be maintained.

PRIVATE BILL COSTS BILL—(No. 31.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD HOUGHTON, in moving that this Bill, which had come from the House of Commons, be now read a second time, said, that its object was to enable Private Bill Committees of the other House to give costs in cases where they thought there had been a vexatious and unwarrantable opposition on the one side or the other. The debateable part of the measure consisted of two clauses. The first of these provided that when a Committee of the House of Commons unanimously reported that the preamble of a Bill was not proved the opponents should be paid the costs of their opposition. He admitted that in this matter legislation came rather late, and that this was a case of shutting the stable door after a great many horses had been stolen. Innumerable vexations had been caused to persons who had been compelled to petition against Private Bills, especially against Railway Bills, and of these hardships no doubt some of their Lordships had been the victims. There was in the House of Commons at the present moment a very strong feeling against allowing a Bill which had once been rejected to go to a second reading—an objection which was recently very strongly manifested in the case of the contest between the Great Northern and Great Eastern Railway Companies. That feeling had, no doubt, mainly arisen from the want of a measure of this kind; because, if this Bill became law, those who introduced vexatious Bills, and put either landowners or companies to expense would themselves be losers. The second clause enacted that when a Committee unanimously reported that opposition had been unfounded the promoters should recover costs. This part of the Bill would require serious consideration in Committee, because it was possible that there might be cases in which private individuals would suffer severely from coming into collision with powerful companies. He did not, however, look upon that as a very immediate danger, because he contemplated that this Bill would act rather by exciting fear and preventing the evils against which it was directed than by active operation for their remedy. All the questions which would arise were rather matters for discussion in Committee—when it would, he thought, be desirable to insert a clause extending the operation of the Bill to Committees of their Lordships' House—than for debate upon this stage of the measure, and therefore, without further observations, he would move that the Bill should be read a second time.

—(Lord Houghton.)

LORD REDESDALE said, that he entirely approved the principle of the Bill, and rejoiced that it had passed through the House of Commons; because in former times the objection which was generally raised to the proposal of such a measure was that it would never receive the sanction of that House. He concurred with the noble Lord who had charge of the Bill in desiring that its operation should be extended to Committees of their Lordships' House, and suggested that another Amendment would also be required. As the measure was now drawn costs could not be recovered from the promoters of a Bill unless the preamble was unanimously rejected by the Committee. That was a reasonable arrangement as far as public companies were concerned; but as private individuals seldom opposed the whole Bill, but only so far as it affected their own property, the same argument did not apply to them. He thought that if a petitioner showed that his rights had been wantonly interfered with and obtained a protecting clause he ought to have his costs.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that he entirely concurred with the noble Chairman of Committees, and he should be happy to communicate with the noble Lord who had moved the second reading of the Bill, and assist him in preparing a clause which should extend the operation of the measure in the manner which had been suggested.

After a few words from Lord HOUGHTON in reply,

FLOGGING IN GAOLS.—QUESTION.

MR. SCULLY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to certain Returns lately presented to this House, showing that 1,138 persons (not being soldiers or sailors) of various ages from six to sixty-three years, have been recently flogged in England and Wales, receiving from six to fifty lashes, in many instances by the order of only one Magistrate, and frequently for very petty offences or acts of misconduct. And will he explain to the House these three cases, among numerous others of a similar character:—1. The case of a person, aged sixty-three years, who received twelve cuts of a cat for "refusing to work" in the House of Correction at Falmouth. 2. The case of a child, aged six years, who received twelve lashes at Keston on the 6th of June, 1864, besides seven days' hard labour, for "stealing one pocket-knife." 3. The case of a child, aged twelve years, sentenced on the 3rd of November, 1863, by the Reverend Algernon Peyton and Thomas Richardson, Esquire, for "stealing three gingerbread cakes," to fourteen days' hard labour, and to receive twelve strokes with a birch rod, which were inflicted on the 11th of November, 1863, in the House of Correction at Wisbeach up to the eighth stroke, when the punishment was stopped by the surgeon in attendance? Does he consider it desirable that one or more country Magistrates should possess the summary power to inflict such ignominious punishments for trivial offences?

SIR GEORGE GREY replied, that he was afraid he could not give any explanation with regard to these cases. As the hon. Member had stated, the Returns contained 1,138 cases of flogging, but then it extended over a good many years, since the Acts had been in operation. All he could do was to state the law under which these punishments were inflicted. By far the greater number were inflicted on juvenile offenders under what was known as the Juvenile Offenders' Act 10 & 11 Vict. c. 82. Under this Act, boys under fourteen might on summary conviction before two Magistrates be whipped. By another Act, introduced by the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Haddfield), it was provided that the sentence must in every case specify the number of lashes to be inflicted, and the instrument with which it was inflicted, and in the case of boys under fourteen the number of stripes was limited to twelve, and they were only to be administered with a birch rod. By far the greater part of these cases were dealt with by the Magistrates under that Act. There was also a general provision that a sentence by one Police Magistrate should have the force of a sentence by two other Magistrates. Another class of cases was provided for by the 4 Geo. IV. c. 64, which enacted that Visiting Justices of a prison, after inquiry on oath in the case of a prisoner sentenced to hard labour, might order the infliction of corporal punishment for repeated prison offences.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether any Report is made to Government of all the cases of flogging in prisons, by order of Magistrates, for offences committed out of prison, and also for misconduct in prison, without publicity being given of the offences charged, the evidence in support of the charges, the punishment ordered, the ages of the offenders, the number of lashes inflicted in each case, and other particulars; and, if no such Report is made, whether it is his intention to adopt measures to put an end to secret flogging in prisons without a public trial?

SIR GEORGE GREY : No Report was made upon cases of flogging by sentence of the Magistrates for offences committed out of prison, but an exact record was kept of floggings inflicted for prison offences, and of the circumstances under which they were inflicted, and it was the duty of the Inspector of Prisons to call attention to any cases in which he believed there had been an infraction of the law.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will cause inquiry to be made into the particulars of the second case mentioned by the hon. Member (Mr. Scully), in which twelve lashes were inflicted at Knutsford upon a child six years old?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he would inquire into that case. At present he knew nothing of the particulars.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that ten times more flogging took place in Middlesex than in all Ireland?

CHURCH AT NAZARETH.—QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether instructions have been given to Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Constantinople to apply for a Firman, without which the Reverend Mr. Zellar is unable to build a Church at Nazareth?

MR. LAYARD said, in reply, that instructions had been sent to our Chargé d'Affaires at Constantinople to apply for this Firman. It appeared that the Porte had sent for a Report from the Pasha of the district. The Turkish authorities were waiting for that Report, and he trusted that the Firman would be granted.

THE THAMES AT HAMPTON COURT. QUESTION.

MR. DAWSON-DAMER said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he is aware that at a short distance below Hampton Court Palace there was last summer hardly four feet of water in the River Thames at the deepest part, and that when the Waterworks near Kingston were pumping the river ceased to flow over the weir at Teddington during the period of such pumping; whether any of the sewage at Kingston flows ultimately into the Thames above Teddington weir; and whether he is aware that there are three Water Companies at Hampton alone, each of which draws off twelve millions of gallons daily, and have power to increase the amount to sixty millions when the increased population shall require it?

MR. MILNER GIBSON replied, that he was informed that at a short distance below Hampton Court Palace on certain days last summer there was hardly four feet of water in the Thames—not "at the deepest part," but in a shallow part of the river. He was also informed, however, that the river never ceased to flow over the weir at Teddington during the time of the pumping at Kingston Waterworks. With regard to the sewage at Kingston flowing into the Thames, he understood that a very small portion of the sewage had for some years gone into the Thames. An injunction had been obtained from the Vice Chancellor to prevent the drainage from the new system of works at Kingston from being carried into the Thames, and in a short time this would be settled by the Court of Chancery. As to the Water Companies which were said to draw such large quantities of water from the Thames above Teddington, they had exercised their powers under their Acts of Parliament, and all that the Conservancy Board could do was to prevent them from taking more water from the Thames than their Acts of Parliament permitted.

DUKE OF WELLINGTON'S MONUMENT AT ST. PAUL'S.—QUESTION.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, he rose to ask the Chief Commissioner of Works, What progress, if any, has been made towards the completion of the Memorial to the late Duke of Wellington in St. Paul's Cathedral?

MR. COWPER said, in reply, that Mr. Stephens had not completed the model which he had been commissioned to prepare. He (Mr. Cowper) had addressed frequent remonstrances to him, but he was not able at present to say when the model would be ready.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, he wished to know, whether the period that had elapsed since the death of the Duke of Wellington, in 1852, was not too long to be allowed to pass without some active step being taken towards completing the memorial intended to be raised to the Duke's memory in St. Paul's Cathedral?

MR. COWPER said, he quite agreed that Mr. Stephens had been very dilatory in the execution of the engagement, which had been made with him no less than six years ago. He could only hope that much more time would not elapse before the commission was executed.

QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is proposed to take any steps to remedy the evils arising from the Consular Courts in China being the only accessible Courts for the trial of Civil and Criminal as well as the ordinary Police cases; the Consuls not being lawyers by education, and the amount of business having become very large?

MR. LAYARD, in reply, said, measures were in progress for establishing a Consular Court at Shanghai, and to that Consular Court an Assistant Judge and Secretary would be appointed. All the Provincial Consular Courts would be under the jurisdiction of the Court at Shanghai, and, in case of necessity, the Judge would have the power of going on circuit, and appeals would lie from the Provincial Courts to the Court at Shanghai, and thence to the Privy Council.

NEW ZEALAND PRIZE MONEY.

QUESTION.

MR. KEKEWICH said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether the Commanding Officers of the various Corps in New Zealand have preferred any claims to the proceeds arising from the sale of lands captured from the enemy, and whether the Government has any intention of paying them a part of those proceeds as prize money?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, it was the fact that some of the troops in New Zealand had applied for a share of the prize money arising from the proceeds of the land captured by the troops; but he was not aware that in any case, under any circumstances, had land captured by military operations been treated as prize money, and therefore it had been intimated that the application in question could not be complied with.

INDIAN ALLOWANCES IN CHINA.

QUESTION.

MR. WALDEGRAVE LESLIE said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether the "Indian Allowances," hitherto made to Her Majesty's troops serving in China are about to be withdrawn?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that after the withdrawal of the Indian troops serving in China the Indian allowances, given to the British troops with the view of placing them on the same footing as the Indian troops serving in that country, would be withdrawn, and a new scale of allowances would be fixed suitable to the circumstances of the case.

WYCOMBE POOR LAW UNION.

QUESTION.

MR. FERRAND said, he rose to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether it is true that serious charges have been made against the Master of the Belton School in the Wycombe Union; whether the Poor Law Board do not intend to prosecute him, but have allowed him to escape; whether he would lay upon the table of the House all Correspondence between the Board and the Guardians of the Wycombe Union on the subject, and any other papers that relate thereto, and what steps the Poor Law Board intend to take in the matter?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, in reply, that it was true that serious charges had been made against the Master of the Belton School. He had been charged with undue severity against a boy, and there was a charge of indecency to the girls. As soon as it was known at the Poor Law Board an Inspector was sent down to inquire into the matter. The Master at once admitted his fault, and tendered his resignation, which the Inspector accepted, as he was obliged to do, and handed it over to the Guardians. It rested with the Guardians, and not with the Poor Law Board, to prosecute the Master if they thought fit, and nothing which had taken place would prejudice them in doing so. The Poor Law Board, as such, had no authority to prosecute. The Correspondence, with the Report of the Inspector, might, if required, be laid on the table of the House.

TROOPS IN NEW ZEALAND.

QUESTION.

GENERAL PEEL said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether any Despatch or Letter was received by the late Mail from New Zealand from General Cameron expressing any opinion as to the propriety of removing from New Zealand any portion of the Troops ; and, if so, whether it will be laid on the table of the House with the other Despatches ?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON replied, that General Cameron's last Despatches, in which he alluded to the probable withdrawal of troops from New Zealand, would shortly be laid on the table of the House.

THE BRITISH NORTH AMERICAN COLONIES.—QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to leave to the several North American Colonies full discretion whether they will or will not join in the new scheme for a Confederation ; or whether they intend to ask Parliament to adopt any compulsory measure for enforcing it upon those who may be adverse to it ?

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that the Government had no other intention on this subject than that which had already been communicated to the House. They had expressed their entire approval of the scheme, and would be ready, if it were adopted by the Provincial Legislatures, to propose the necessary measures with the view of carrying it out.

WAR IN THE UNITED STATES. QUESTION.

MR. W. EWART said, he wished to ask, Whether it is the intention of the Government to send to the scene of war in the United States any Military or Medical Officers to study and Report on the progress of Military and Medical science as it is exemplified in the war in that Country ?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that military officers had been sent over from time to time during the progress of the war between the United and Confederate States, but there was only one that he knew of at that moment. There was a British naval Attaché at Washington, and it had been proposed to send out also a military Attaché. The Government of Washington had made no objection to this ; but the final decision could not be arrived at till after the meeting of Congress. It having been stated that the Americans thought some reciprocal action on their part necessary, and that they would send to England a military Attaché, for whom a Vote would be required. A medical staff officer had proceeded from Canada to report on medical science as exemplified in the war in America.

HIGHWAYS ACT.—QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD LONG said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention to introduce any Bill for the amendment of the Highways Act this Session ?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he had no such intention.

CASE OF MARGARET SMITH OR SWANSON.—QUESTION.

MR. WALDEGRAVE LESLIE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his refusal to comply with the Prayer of a Petition from certain parties in Aberdeen on behalf of Margaret Smith or Swanson, who, in April, 1864, was sentenced to four years' penal servitude for a first offence, and that a case of theft, to which she pleaded guilty—was based on information received from the presiding Judge or other authorities in Scotland ; and, if so, whether he will lay upon the table of the House Copies of the Memorial, reply, and all other relative papers ?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that he had declined to comply with the request of the memorial in question that the sentence might be mitigated ; but he had sent the memorial to the Judge, and he had not yet received the Judge's answer.

THE SAFFRON HILL MURDER. QUESTION.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has seen any necessity for inquiring into the conduct of the Police on the trial of S. Pelizzioni for murder ; and, if so, to what conclusion he has come on that subject ? He put the question on the part of a very worthy gentleman, Mr. Negretti.

SIR GEORGE GREY replied that he had not found it necessary to institute any inquiry into the conduct of the police, for no facts had been laid before him to warrant an inquiry, but all the circumstances would again be investigated before a Judge and a jury. The facts of the case were well known. Pelizzioni was charged with the murder of a man named Harrington, tried on that charge before Mr. Baron Martin, and found guilty, not on circumstantial evidence, but on the most direct evidence of several witnesses. Mr. Baron Martin, in reporting on that case, expressed his entire concurrence in the verdict, but at the same time stated that, though the facts justified the verdict of murder, the circumstances of the case were such as, in his opinion, did not require that the sentence of the law should be executed, and he suggested that the sentence should be commuted for some minor punishment. The learned Judge, however, added that, as proceedings were to be taken against another man for the same offence, it would be well that any decision on the matter should be suspended until the nature of the evidence in the second case should be ascertained. The other man, Gregorio, was tried before Mr. Justice Byles, and was convicted of manslaughter, and he should have been glad to take that verdict as deciding the case, but by a communication from Mr. Justice Byles he was informed that that verdict was not satisfactory to the Judge. He (Sir George Grey) had thought it right to send the notes of the second trial to Mr. Baron Martin, and to ask his opinion on the whole case. The learned Judge had written a very detailed report of his opinion, and expressed his entire concurrence with Mr. Justice Byles's opinion that the verdict in the second case was not satisfactory; adding that the case required much consideration, as it was one of great importance with regard to the administration of the Criminal Law. Under these circumstances, he had thought it his duty to submit all the papers to the Law Officers of the Crown, and, as there were two other cases in which true bills had been found against Pelizzioni for stabbing, he asked the opinion of the Law Officers whether there was sufficient evidence for putting Pelizzioni on his trial for the minor charge of stabbing, and whether they advised that this course should be taken. Both these questions having been answered in the affirmative, he had directed that Pelizzioni should be put on his trial at the next sessions for the minor charge of stabbing, and he hoped that the trial would have the result of clearing away any doubt on this subject.

ALLOWANCES TO VOLUNTEER SERJEANT INSTRUCTORS.—QUESTION.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Why capitation allowances are issued to Volunteer Serjeant Instructors belonging to the Permanent Staff of Corps, and are refused for the Serjeant Instructors attested as belonging to Administrative Battalions, and whether it is intended to continue such a distinction as to those allowances?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that these allowances were only made in respect of those Volunteers who had made themselves efficient. The sum involved was very small, and it was not the intention of the War Office to propose any change.

COURT OF PROBATE.—QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, The reason of the delay in completing the necessary arrangements for extending to the Clerks and Officers in the principal Registry of Her Majesty's Court of Probate the system of Classification as adopted in other Departments of Her Majesty's Civil Service, whereby progressive annual increases are made in the salaries of the employés?

MR. PEELE said, in reply, that no arrangement had, as yet, been made. As regarded the salaries of the employés, the Treasury was perfectly ready to adopt a progressive scale, but no regulations for the purpose could be of any effect until they had met with the concurrence of the Chief Judge.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

QUESTIONS.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he had given notice of two or three Questions which he wished to put to the Under Secretary of State for War, but before doing so he desired to make a few explanatory observations. He held the army might be looked upon as an institution which was improvable, or an institution which was doomed; and he confessed he thought that if something was not speedily done to put it on its proper footing its efficiency would be seriously impaired, and great public dissatisfaction would ensue. He thought that the enormous power concentrated in the office of his grace the Field Marshall Commanding-in-Chief demanded serious consideration. He recollected that in what was called the model year the charge for the army, navy, and ordnance together amounted only to £13,000,000; but at that time we had no Royal Duke at the head of the army. He was not, however, disposed to say that a Royal Duke ought not to hold such a position; but his holding it, with an expenditure for the army of nearly £14,500,000, was a very different thing from the office being filled by a man like the Duke of Wellington, or Lord Hill, when the charge was about £6,000,000 a year. Gentlemen below the gangway were, he was afraid, neglectful of their duty in quietly allowing so vast an amount of patronage to be placed in hands which might not administer it altogether satisfactorily. The authorities responsible for the army had lately abolished the office of the Inspector of Infantry—a most important office, because it was the duty of the person who filled it to get the depôts into a state of efficiency according to the Queen's regulations. It had been found that in many instances when the men of the depôts joined headquarters they were more perfect in drill and general efficiency than the men and officers at headquarters. Now, however, the Government had thought proper to abolish the office of the Inspector of Infantry Depôts, the reason, he supposed, being that that officer had made the depôts too perfect for the colonels of regiments. Again, in connection with the important subject as to our power to defend our colonies, it was a great question whether we ought not to have a large force of marine artillery and skilled gunners, instead of some of the troops now under the control of the Duke of Cambridge. The first Question of which he had given notice was, Whether any inconvenience would result from abolishing the grades (as they become vacant) of Lieutenant Colonels of the three regiments of Foot Guards? The three regiments of Foot Guards consisted of seven battalions; they were called, in the aggregate, a Division, and were under the command of one officer, a Major

Sir John Trelawny

General; but each regiment was under a Lieutenant Colonel, who was to all intents and purposes a Brigadier. Each battalion was commanded by a mounted officer called a Major of the Guards, holding an army rank of Lieutenant Colonel, and the office of regimental Lieutenant Colonel was useless. At present, matters of detail must go through the office of Lieutenant Colonel, causing great delay and confusion, and preventing the exercise of the promptness and decision essential to the proper control of a regiment. In the opinion of many experienced officers, the offices of the Lieutenant Colonels of the Foot Guards ought to be abolished. He would have them abolished as they fell vacant, as he did not wish to touch vested interests. His second Question was, Whether it was for the advantage of the service that Captains of Companies in the Foot Guards should rank as Lieutenant Colonels; and whether it would not be for their advantage, as well as for the interests of the service, that they should reside in barracks, near the men under their charge? There were something like seventy or more of these officers of the Foot Guards (he had heard them calculated to be eighty-seven) who ranked as Lieutenant Colonels. He thought they should not hold the army rank of Lieutenant Colonel, but should be like other Captains. He believed it sometimes happened in the presence of the enemy that, owing to the loss of a Colonel, the command of a corps might fall to a very young person, because he had rank as a Lieutenant Colonel in virtue of being Captain of a Company in the Guards; while an old Major of the line who had seen service in all parts of the world was superseded. The officers of the Foot Guards were not obliged to reside in immediate contact with the barracks of the men; and he was told that a great deal of labour connected with the practical administration of the Guards devolved on the Serjeants. The last Question he had to put was, Whether Colonelcies of regiments should not be given to General Officers in rotation, according to seniority, exceptions being made in favour of officers who have particularly distinguished themselves in war? This was not a question which related to the Guards alone; it concerned the army generally. He believed it would be more satisfactory to the army and to the country if these lucrative appointments were given according to seniority, unless where officers had greatly distinguished themselves in the field. These were the Questions he had to put, and which he had thought it his duty shortly to explain. He hoped the noble Lord the Under Secretary for War would be able to give him a satisfactory answer.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he would answer the questions of the hon. Baronet as shortly as possible. First, with regard to the office of the Inspector General of Infantry, he could only repeat what he stated the other day; the cause of the abolition was that the reduction of the number of depôt battalions had been so considerable that a very great part of his duties had been done away with, and it was not considered that those which remained were sufficient to warrant the retention of the office. It was considered that the depôt battalions which remained would be equally well administered by the General in whose district they were. The abolition of the office was not owing to any dissatisfaction with the manner in which the duties of the office had been performed by the officers who lately held the appointment, but simply because since the reduction of the depôt battalions there was not sufficient occupation for such an officer. With regard to the second Question as to Colonels of the regiments of Guards, he could only repeat what he said the other evening—although the brigade of Guards consisted of seven battalions, yet it did not in reality constitute a Division under the command of a Major General. The present system worked admirably, and he should be sorry to see it altered. With respect to the rank of Guards' officers the hon. Baronet and the House were aware that the privileges in point of rank of Guards' officers dated almost from time immemorial, and he believed it was of great advantage that it should be. It was generally recognized by the army that there should be a privileged corps in the position of the Guards to whom was especially intrusted the protection of the Sovereign, and who were also to be the first troops sent on foreign service in any great emergency. He did not believe that any great dissatisfaction had ever been expressed by the army at the exclusive privileges possessed by the Guards, nor did he ever hear that any practical inconvenience had ever resulted on active service from the youth of the field officers. With respect to the residence of officers in barracks he did not think any change would be an improvement. The non-commissioned officers of the Guards were a most excellent and most exemplary class of men; and officers residing as they did within reach of their men, and leaving part of their duties to non-commissioned officers, were practically responsible, and left nothing to be desired. With regard to the last Question he could only say that the rule laid down in regard to the promotions referred to was pretty much that which the hon. Baronet seemed to wish. The rule observed was practically this—the colonelcies of regiments were generally given according to seniority; but two exceptions were made—first, an exception in favour of officers who had performed distinguished service, and secondly, an exception against those officers who had not had the opportunity of seeing active service. He did not mean to say that the latter never got their regiment; but the officer who had had the opportunity of distinguishing himself in service was promoted much earlier than he would otherwise have been, while the officer who had been so unfortunate as not to have had that opportunity was passed over for some time. The rule, as stated, had, he believed, given satisfaction to the army, and he did not think it would be for the advantage of the service that any other rule should be laid down than was in force.

THE LOCK OUT IN THE IRON TRADE. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HENNESSY rose to call the attention of the Home Secretary to a case which had just occurred of very unusual importance. He thought the present combination in the iron districts demanded the attention of the Government as well as of the House. He would preface the observations he had to make by quoting a short passage from Adam Smith, who, speaking of strikes, said—

“Masters are always and everywhere in a sort of tacit but constant and uniform combination not to raise the wages of labour above their actual rate. Masters, too, sometimes enter into particular combinations to keep the wages of labour even below this rate. Such combinations, however, are frequently resisted by a contrary defensive combination of the workmen.”

That general sentence exactly covered the present case. The first step was, the masters combined to sink the rate of wages; and, as a defensive measure, the workmen in a certain district—namely, North Staffordshire, combined against the masters. He offered no opinion as to the conduct of either masters or men in Staffordshire, but that was the first step in this lock-out. When the masters and workmen were thus opposed to each other, the manufactories were closed, and both parties suffered. One consequence to both was that the masters, as was well known, received from the masters in other districts such accommodation as they required at the banks; while the men, on the other hand, received aid from the working men in other districts. So far this occurrence was a usual one. Thus the ordinary conflict of labour and capital was kept going on. But the masters in South Staffordshire and other districts had taken this unusual course—they determined to have a lock-out to enforce on the working men in their employment some compulsory rules and regulations with the view of compelling these workmen to use their utmost exertions to induce those in North Staffordshire to return to their work. That step was perfectly unusual; and what had happened? In the towns of Staffordshire and other large districts where the lock-out had taken place he had just heard from a good authority in that House that there were not fewer than 150,000 persons, including the families of the labourers, who were now suffering from this lock-out. What had the workmen done? Meetings had been held. At Middlesbrough this resolution was proposed by Mr. McCarthy—

"That we get up a requisition and present it to the Mayor, requesting him to convene a public meeting at his earliest convenience to take into consideration the best means of supporting the 5,600 men who are locked out at present; and that this association pledges itself to refuse any aid to any person or persons who, by any riotous conduct, shall place person or property in danger, or otherwise commit a breach of the peace; and the like person or persons shall be liable to forfeit any benefit from the association hereafter."

That resolution showed what the conduct of the men had been, and that conduct they had pursued up to the present time. A meeting was held last night in the metropolis on this subject by the Trades' Unions, and a good deal of light had been thrown upon the dispute by the statements made there by persons in the confidence of the men. He would ask the attention of the House to what was said by the chairman of that meeting, Mr. Potter, who told them in a few words what was precisely the present position of this conflict. He said—

"Now, the Brierley Hill Executive had some weeks ago declared their opinion that the North Staffordshire men should resume work, and, if they refused to do so, the executive would cease to subscribe towards their support. The North Staffordshire men did refuse, and the Brierley Hill Executive abided by their decision. The Gamblehead Executive had also assured the masters that they would not support the North Staffordshire men, and the Millmen's Association, who had never sanctioned the strike, would not now, of course, support them."

Mr. Hennessy

We thus find that those who represented the working men had, in the form of resolutions and recommendations at public meetings, counselled them over and over again for some weeks past to return to their work; but, notwithstanding that, the lock-out had been continued in the districts of South Staffordshire by the masters, for the purpose not only of punishing the workmen who were not willing to work at the rates of wages proposed, but to punish workmen in other parts of England. The lock-out was most unfortunate, and he would venture to say that it was also illegal. He believed that the conduct of the masters was not only morally unjust and improper, but was also a violation of the law of the land. The masters were fairly entitled, as Adam Smith had said, to combine to reduce the rate of wages if they wished, and the workmen were equally entitled to combine for the purpose of obtaining a higher rate of wages; but the law said that in no case could either masters or workmen combine for the purpose of injuring masters and workmen elsewhere. Now, the South Staffordshire masters had combined and locked out their workmen, not because these workmen were doing anything which could be objected to, but for the purpose of inflicting an injury upon the workmen in another part of England. He trusted Her Majesty's Government would be able to give the House some assurance that, looking to the moderate tone which the workmen had taken and which they still maintained, there was some likelihood of that arbitration being accepted which the workmen had asked for frequently, but which the masters had refused, and which every Gentleman in that House would like to see adopted.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I was not at all aware that the hon. and learned Gentleman intended to raise this question in the House to-night, having only given notice on a former evening of a Question which he would then have answered had it been put. He regretted that the hon. and learned Gentleman had now entered into a statement of facts connected with the unfortunate differences which existed between the masters and the men, and he hoped the House would not assume they were undisputed and not open to any answer. In any discussion which might take place he would remind the House that it was necessary that every word should be carefully weighed in order not to widen the present unhappy differences which existed between the employers and the workmen, and prevent that agreement between them which every one must wish to see re-established as speedily as possible. The hon. and learned Gentleman gave notice the other night of a Question, the object of which was to ascertain whether the Government had received any official information upon the subject of the lock-out, and whether it was prepared to take any steps with reference to the distress among a large class of persons occasioned by that proceeding. The only official information the Government have received with reference to this subject is contained in two letters from the Chief Constable of Staffordshire. Without expressing any opinion upon the conduct of any party, he said in the first letter that there was at the time it was written about 60,000 men out of employment in North and South Staffordshire, and that their conduct had been orderly and peaceable. The second letter stated that things remained in the same state, and that the writer (the Chief Constable) was in constant communication with the Lord Lieutenant of the county on the subject. It is of the utmost importance, as I have already said, that every word spoken upon this matter should be carefully weighed, in order to avoid anything which could tend to widen the breach between the masters and their workmen in this branch of industry. Judging from what I read upon this subject in the newspapers, I think there is a hope of the parties agreeing upon some terms in a short time which will put an end to the strike and the lock out, and I trust that nothing will be said here which will have the effect of delaying that desirable result. I can only say, on the part of the Government, that we deeply regret the existence of these differences, which, whatever may be their origin, cause great distress not only to the parties primarily concerned, but also to a very large number of persons who are not in the slightest degree responsible for what has occurred, but who are directly or indirectly dependent for their livelihood on the works which are now stopped. Her Majesty's Government have no power to interfere, except by way of advice, unless a breach of the law should take place. No breach of the law has, I am happy to say, taken place. If there was the slightest prospect that the advice of the Government would bring the matter to a satisfactory and early termination, they would readily offer it; but there is no reason to believe that any interference on their part would be acceptable to either party or have any beneficial effect. I think, however, that I see in the newspapers indications of a wish on the part of the masters and men to submit these differences to arbitration. And if the parties will select some competent and impartial persons, and are willing, to submit these matters to their arbitration I sincerely hope the dispute may be brought to a speedy conclusion. I hope that neither the discussion which may follow, nor anything that has been already said—I am sure there has been no such intention—will in any degree affect such a termination of the dispute. From all the information I have upon the subject I have reason to believe that the conduct of the men out of employment has hitherto been marked by a total absence of any acts of violence.

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in rising to move the Vote of £811,400, for superintending establishment of, and expenditure for, works, buildings, and repairs at home and abroad, said: Sir, I will not interpose long between the Committee and the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) who proposes to reduce this Vote by the sum of £50,000, the amount asked for towards the improvement of the defences of Quebec; but as I have not yet said anything in explanation of the policy of the Government for the defence of Canada, and as the recent debate turned rather more on the general question of our relations with the United States than on the details of this plan, it may be convenient to the Committee if I state as shortly as I can what is the plan and what are the views of

Her Majesty's Government with respect to the defences of Canada. I trust I may be permitted, in the first place, to express a hope that the House will to-night discuss this question upon its merits solely, and not again enter into the consideration of the possibility or the probability of hostilities with the United States. I do not feel called upon to express any opinion as to the wisdom and prudence of entering on discussions of that sort. It might, perhaps, be better that we should, on both sides of the Atlantic, frankly state what our fears and apprehensions of each other are, and it is possible the very discussion of the differences between us and our suspicions of each other might tend rather to improve our relations; but, on the other hand, I should be inclined to fear that words inadvertently uttered in the heat of debate might tend to excite suspicions and anxieties which do not now exist, and be productive of those very dangers which we are anxious to avert. Whatever may be the opinion of the House upon this point, there is one thing which I feel sure is not necessarily mixed up with this question of the defences of Canada—that is our relations with the United States. The real facts of the case are these. Four years ago our North American provinces had upon their borders a very great nation—not then a great military nation, because the United States had the smallest standing army, perhaps, of any nation in the world; the people were the least turned to military matters, and their greatest public men devoted themselves to the pursuits of peace and eschewed those of war. Unfortunately, however, the United States have become a great military nation, and have command of armies as large, if not larger, as any which can be wielded by the great Powers of Europe; and at the head of these armies are Generals as able as any we know of. Although our North American Colonies cannot compete with the United States either in size or commercial prosperity, yet they are, it must be admitted, a great nation, and are on the high road to be a still greater nation. These colonies profess a wish to remain independent and distinct from their great neighbours, the United States; and they also profess, in the most unmistakable language, their desire to maintain their connection with this country. If such are their wishes, it seems to me that it is not strange that they should desire to place themselves in such a position as not to be dependent upon the forbearance of their great neighbours, however long they might imagine that forbearance might be extended. It seems to be only worthy the position of our North American Colonies, and only worthy our position, so long as they belong to us, that we should do what we can to place their borders in a state of defence. Without the slightest expectation of the Government of the United States meditating any attack upon our Canadian Provinces, I do not see why we should not do what all continental nations do—namely, erect such works as are necessary for the protection of their frontier. Now, a good deal has been said about the great length of the Canadian frontier; but upon that point I need hardly say more than that it was never intended or contemplated by Her Majesty's Government to maintain that frontier intact. Not only would an attempt of that kind prove impracticable in the case of Canada but it must always be impracticable in the case of all continental nations having a large frontier, and exposed to the attack of a formidable neighbour. What great nation is there in Europe, for instance, which is able to prevent an enemy from invading its frontiers, and that not at one but at many places? All that they can and do do is to fortify the most vital points, and to trust for the expulsion of the enemy to such further operations as may from time to time be judged expedient. That is just what we propose to do for Canada—to erect fortifications at four or five points that are essential for the protection of the country. If Canada be invaded by the United States or any other enemy, the invasion must either be made with one of two objects—either with the object of permanently annexing the country or of inflicting upon our arms humiliation and defeat. If the object be the permanent annexation of the country, that can only be accomplished by the conquest of the whole country, and more especially by the reduction of the most important points. It can certainly never be attained by overrunning the country, though operations of that character may be very largely extended. Above all, to insure the annexation of Canada, it is necessary that the enemy should possess himself of the line of the River St. Lawrence, the great artery of the country, and the great means of communication, not only between province and province, but between the provinces and the rest of the world. He must also possess himself of the points which command the navigation of that river—namely, Montreal and Quebec. If we, therefore, can place the line of the St. Lawrence and these two points which command its navigation in such a state of defence as to enable the Canadians to resist the attack of an enemy, it is reasonable to suppose that, if the object of the enemy be annexation, he will first of all endeavour to ascertain his chances of success at those points. Unless he can see a prospect of succeeding in those directions he will hardly think it worth while to incur the expense and the loss of so large a number of men as must necessarily follow a hopeless attempt. It seems to us, therefore, that by insuring the efficient protection of these places, we are really providing for the protection of the whole of Canada; and so, it may be, that no enemy would think it worth while even to attempt to invade it. If, on the other hand, the object of his attack be the defeat of our arms, it is obvious that the construction of proper works of defence will enable our troops, assisted by the Canadian militia, to make a successful resistance against very superior forces, and even if overcome by superior forces, the fortifications, accompanied by the command of the St. Lawrence, will always enable our troops to embark in safety. The plan recommended by the Government for the defence of Canada entirely depends upon our maintaining our naval superiority on the St. Lawrence. I will not now enter into the conditions which are necessary for the preservation of that superiority. That is a question which comes more particularly within the province assigned to my noble Friend the Secretary for the Admiralty than that of the War Office; but I think it not an unreasonable condition in this country to hope that we shall, in case of a war even with a country possessed of so powerful a navy as the United States, be able to maintain our naval superiority on the St. Lawrence. The first point at which we propose to erect fortifications, and the only place for which the House of Commons is now asked to vote any money, is Quebec. As the House is aware, Quebec is already strongly fortified, and is, I believe, really a place of strength, except that, like a great many other places formerly regarded as being beyond the reach of cannon, it is now exposed to the bombardment of cannon of long range. As was pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for

Calne (Mr. Lowe) the other evening, the fortifications of Quebec can be bombarded and the town shelled from Point Levi, on the south side of the River St. Lawrence. It is on that very point that the Government propose to spend nearly all the money which the House of Commons is asked to vote. It is proposed to form detached works which will be connected by a military road, and will form a sort of intrenched camp, partially protected by our gunboats on the river, and so long as we maintain the command of the river it will be impossible for an enemy to invade Canada at that point. A small portion of the sum asked for will be expended upon the improvement of the existing works at Quebec, replacing those that are in a dilapidated state and making the whole adequate to the requirements of the present day. The attack, however, from Point Levi is the only attack which it is considered the United States could make, and therefore the only point upon which it is thought necessary to spend any large sum of money. The works will in a great degree resemble the land defences which have recently been constructed in this country. At Montreal, too, the defences will be of a somewhat similar character. It is proposed to form a series of works, forming an intrenched camp, on the south side of the River St. Lawrence—works which will prevent the enemy from making an attack upon Montreal by means of the Victoria Bridge, and also prevent his approach to any point from which he could command the town with his artillery. It is expected that the Canadian Government will undertake the defence of this place themselves; and that, as far as the protection of the River St. Lawrence is concerned, the expense incurred by the Imperial Government will be confined to the defence of Quebec and to maintaining the necessary naval force upon the river. There are other smaller works proposed in the neighbourhood of Montreal, but it will be unnecessary for me to take up the time of the Committee by describing them. The principal feature of the defences are the fortifications of Quebec and Montreal.

An expression frequently made use of in discussions on the subject of fortifications in this House is, that our troops would be cooped up behind earthworks. The object of those fortifications is undoubtedly, to a certain extent, to enable a comparatively small number of our forces to resist the attack of a much larger body; but the main object of their construction is not so much the protection of our troops as the protection of those points, the preservation of which is considered essential to our interests; and I have already said that in my opinion it would not be worth an enemy's while to attack Canada unless there were a probability of his succeeding at these points. In addition to the purposes which I have enumerated, behind these works can be collected not only our own troops, and the volunteers and militia may have been already enrolled, but the whole people of the country can, if so disposed, rally within them to arrest the invader, and the whole body of the people can collect behind them, and there be drilled and organized as far as the time at command will permit. I have described the nature of the works which we propose to erect. It is said that no works that we can construct can hold out against a large force, and that our troops, aided by every assistance they can receive from the Canadian militia, will not be able to hold these works against the forces which the United States would be able to bring against them. Now, I believe that works of the nature such as I have described could be made capable of holding out, if not for ever, at least for an almost indefinite period, because it must be recollected that the capability of defending such fortifications depends upon the question whether they be completely invested or not. If we have a naval superiority upon the river it is impossible that these works should be completely invested. Therefore, I maintain that such works as we purpose could be held for a long time against a superior force. Further, I believe that it will be impossible for any army to carry on military operations in Canada on a large scale for more than six months of the year. It is quite true that various opinions have been expressed upon that point; and reference has been made to the campaign of General Montgomery, in which during a rigorous winter he made an attack upon Quebec. Now, the history of that campaign seems to me to be rather an argument in favour of our views than otherwise. It is true that General Montgomery did with a small force march across the country in the winter, and did make a sudden attack upon Quebec; but will the House allow me to quote a passage from Sir James Carmichael's Précis of the Wars in Canada? They will find that any attack upon Quebec was not in those days a very formidable operation, and they will also learn what was the result of attempting such an operation in the middle of winter. In the book I have referred to I find this passage—

"The garrison of Quebec consisted of only one company, to these were added the seamen and marines of a sloop of war and the inhabitants of the town. The latter, both French and English, were armed, formed into companies, and showed great zeal and alacrity at this important crisis. Governor Carleton, in all, had about 1,600 bayonets. The season and the want of heavy artillery prevented the Americans from making any impression upon the defences of Quebec. It was evident that the former would not permit them to remain much longer in their situation. Governor Carleton had refused to receive a flag of truce or to enter into any sort of negotiation with them. It was, therefore, necessary either to retire or to get possession of Quebec by an escalade."

The House knows the result of the attempt. General Montgomery was killed, and his troops retired in confusion. That very event, which is used by some persons to prove that siege operations in Canada can be carried on in winter, seems to me to prove the very reverse. Quebec was defended only by a small force, with only one company of regular troops; but General Montgomery, with a superior force, was prevented by the severity of the weather from undertaking any siege operations, and was therefore compelled to make a rash and almost hopeless attempt to take the place by assault, in which he failed. The opinion of the Canadians themselves upon this point is worthy of our consideration. I have lately received a speech delivered in the Legislative Assembly of Canada by a gentleman who is well known to many Members of this House who have been in Canada. I refer to Mr. Rose, who, although not now a member of the Government, has held office in that country. That gentleman is Member for the City of Montreal, he knows that country well, and he also has visited the American armies and knows what operations they are capable of. Mr. Rose says—

"Hon. Members must remember that it is impossible to have more than a six months' campaign in this country. And supposing you were to erect works before which an enemy was compelled to sit down in the month of May, it would take him fully three months before he could bring up his supplies and siege train and protect his communications, and by the time he was ready to make a determined attack he would be overtaken by winter, be compelled to raise the siege and to go into winter quarters. In truth, our winters are our safeguard and defence."

He goes on to say—

"If, therefore, we can only by manning certain salient points in the country prevent the progress of invasion we are safe."

While I am quoting from Mr. Rose's speech I should wish to add one more extract to show what is the opinion of the representative of a most important constituency, and what is the feeling in Canada as to those defences. Mr. Rose says—

"I am sure that no Member of this House, no man in this country, would hesitate, if need were, to put his hand into his pocket and give a tenth of his substance for the construction of the works required to protect the country from the ravages of the aggressor, and to secure to ourselves the inestimable blessings derived from living under the British flag."

That is the opinion of a man whose judgment is well entitled to have weight with this House. Then as to the fact I have mentioned, that military operations on a large scale cannot be carried on in Canada during the winter, that is admitted by the Americans themselves. I do not deny that small bodies of troops may be marched from one point to another. I do not even deny that an enemy might remain in huts in front of works; but I do deny that during a severe Canadian winter an enemy could make any progress against such works as we propose to construct.

Another point which has been alluded to is the possibility of our providing a sufficient number of troops to man these works. The calculation which I am about to read is, of course, a rough one, but I believe it to be sufficiently accurate for the purposes of the discussion. It is considered that the number of men that would be required for the defence of works at Quebec and Montreal would be about 12,000. That is the number that would be sufficient for garrisons; but in case the attack was fully developed it would be desirable to have at least 35,000 men. There should, further, be a movable force of 20,000 or 25,000 men to harass the enemy whenever opportunities should arise. The total force that would be required for the defence of the lower St. Lawrence to Montreal would be 60,000 men. That is not a force which we need despair of getting for the defence of these works. We could easily send out from this country 20,000 troops. There are already 20,000 Volunteers enrolled and organized in Canada, and preparations are made to raise 80,000 militia. Those men are already designated, and under the law of the country are required to turn out when called upon. As the Committee knows, a sum of money has been voted for the organization of the militia; the officers have, to a considerable extent, been drilled, and the Canadian Government has now applied to us to send them officers to assist in organizing the militia force of 80,000.

I have now stated what are the works we propose for the defence of the lower St. Lawrence. I admit that it is quite possible that the inhabitants of the Western Province of Canada may consider that this scheme does not provide sufficiently for their defence. They may wish very naturally that some measure should be taken to prevent an enemy from occupying and overrunning those Western Provinces, even though they could not maintain the occupation. I admit that it is possible they may hold that view, and I think very fairly; and Colonel Jervis has prepared a scheme for the defence of the Western Province of Canada, as well as for the defence of the Lower Province. I believe the scheme to be perfectly practicable, but, of course, it involves a greater expenditure, and requires a larger force of men. I have stated that we consider that, if once we can put in a proper state of defence the line of the lower St. Lawrence, it will not be worth while for an enemy to invade Canada. That is the view of Her Majesty's Government; but, of course, it is a question for the Canadian Government to consider whether they will take the additional measures of defence which are indicated to them for the other provinces. I believe they have only postponed the consideration of their further plans until the project for a Confederation has been accomplished, as it has not been thought right to pledge the future Confederation to a larger outlay than might ultimately be found to be necessary. Until the Canadian Government have announced their intentions upon the subject of the defence of Western Canada, it is not necessary that I should enter into any detailed explanation of the plans proposed to that end. I believe, however, that it is a rational and practicable plan—one that would neither involve any very large amount of money for the construction of the works, nor require any very large force for their defence in time of war.

I will only further detain the Committee by briefly alluding to other plans that have been suggested for the defence of Canada. I need say nothing of the views of those hon. Gentlemen who think that it is impossible to defend Canada, and that therefore it is

impolitic to take any steps with that object in view. Those Gentlemen adopt a very intelligible line of argument. They say the only source of danger to Canada arises from her connection with this country. They add that this country is powerless to defend Canada in time of war, and therefore it is better we should say to the Canadians in time of peace, "We cannot undertake your defence, but we will relieve you of the danger which arises from your connection with us, and we advise you to keep on good terms with the United States, and not to provoke hostilities with that country." That is an intelligible line of argument; and if the Committee think that the allegations upon which it is based are true, then I hope it will at once say so, and will not wait to declare its opinions until we have induced the Canadians to spend a large amount of money, and to raise a large body of men. But there are other hon. Members who do not wish to abandon Canada, and who say that the measures we propose for the defence of the country are not such as they approve. They say that the best mode of defending Canada is not to defend her frontiers or any particular points, but rather to withdraw all our troops from the country and trust to our own powers of aggression upon the enemy's frontiers to make him loosen his hold upon Canada, to relinquish any attempt at invasion, and to restore any territory which he may already have captured. Well, that would be a very plausible argument if those who use it could show what points in the United States are so vulnerable as to admit of our attacking them with a fair prospect of success. It is well known to the House that for several years past the Americans have been busily employed in fortifying their most vulnerable points; they have erected fortifications at all their great harbours and at the mouths of all their great rivers; and even supposing that our navy could make an attack on those harbours and land 40,000 or 50,000 men, would it not be in the power of the United States, possessing such an army as they do now, to send 100,000 or 150,000 men into Canada, against whom no resistance could be made, if its frontier is left unfortified? And we know that at the conclusion of a war to call upon one of the belligerents to give up a territory which he has completely occupied is a different thing from calling upon him to give up a territory which he has only partly overrun. On the whole, I submit that the advocates of the other system have got to show much more clearly than they have shown yet where those weak points are to be found by an attack upon which, with a smaller expenditure of money and with fewer men, we should be able to defend Canada in case of emergency. I believe that the majority of this House and the majority of the country do not agree with those who wish to give up our connection with Canada, or with those who wish to defend Canada by refusing to fortify the Canadian territory. I hope that the proposition of the Government will be fully and calmly considered to-night. If it be so considered, I think the opinion of the House will be that the proposal is a reasonable one, affording every prospect of success, and calculated to meet with the approval both of the Canadians and the people of this country.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £811,400 be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Superintending Establishment of, and Expenditure for Works, Buildings, and repairs at Home, and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1866, inclusive."

MR. BENTINCK, in moving the Amendment of which he had given notice, that the Item of £50,000 for the Improvement of the Defences at Quebec be omitted from the proposed Vote, said, he should discuss the question in the spirit in which his noble Friend the Under Secretary for War had asked him to discuss it, and would abstain from referring to the probabilities of a war between this country and the United States. He fully admitted, and he appreciated what he believed to be the feeling of the country, that Great Britain was bound to maintain at any cost the integrity of the Canadian territory; and it was in no opposition to that view that he was about to make his remarks. He wished to observe, also, that except in one particular, to which he should presently allude, he thought that the Report of Colonel Jervois, who bore the highest reputation as a military man, was worthy of the credence of Parliament and the country; but the view he took of the subject placed it far beyond any question of military detail. He was desirous of saying, likewise, that he had no wish to embarrass Her Majesty's Government in the conduct of what must be a most difficult and delicate affair. Nor could he be held guilty of raising the question of the probability or the possibility of hostilities between the United States and this country, because the Vote before the Committee raised it, and he could not discuss the Vote without considering the question so raised ; but he would take care that nothing should fall from him calculated to excite a feeling of hostility in that quarter. His first ground and objection to the item for the improvement of the defences of Canada was that, in the unfortunate event of a war between this country and the United States, this was not the right mode of defending the Canadian provinces. As he had stated on a former occasion, if we were to defend Canada at all, it could only be done by sea. Any attempt to defend Canada by land would be only a waste of men and money. He stated his views on this subject when the Navy Estimates were before the House, but he had not said that if a war should arise between England and the United States we should put a stop to it by starving those States. What he stated then and what he now repeated was, that a war between two great countries, more especially countries like the United States and Great Britain, never could be brought to a termination by one or two great battles, but must be brought to an end by the financial or commercial exhaustion of one or other of the belligerents. He maintained that history bore him out in his view. As to the particular argument in the Report of Colonel Jervois, which was adopted by his noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington), but from which he dissented, he thought he again had history in his favour, and that it was against the view of Colonel Jervois and his noble Friend. The gallant Colonel said that in the place of which he was writing, military operations could only be conducted during six months of the year, and that if we could erect and maintain such defences as would protect that portion of Canada against invasion for six months, for the other six months our labours were at an end. Now, he begged to deny that the passage which had been quoted, describing General Montgomery's attack upon Quebec, afforded any proof whatever that a winter campaign could not be carried on in that country. He went further, and asserted that it afforded indubitable proof that it could be carried on. If his noble Friend had read a little further, he would have seen that the failure of the attempt was to be attributed to a chance shot being fired down the street, which killed the general of the invading army. They should recollect that whatever facilities might have existed for carrying on a winter campaign in 1775 were vastly increased now by the opening of railways, which were available all the year through. In fact, the difficulties of a winter campaign were to a great extent done away with. They ought also to recollect that an invasion from the United States now, instead of being carried on by armies of 20,000 men, would be carried on by armies of 100,000 or 200,000 men. That which was possible in 1775 could be done now with the greatest facility, and his noble Friend was greatly mistaken, therefore, in assuming that there would be six months' respite in the war. But not only was Quebec not exempt from attack during six months in the year, but there were six months in the year, on the contrary, when, fighting as we should be under the enormous difficulty of having to carry our reinforcements and supplies across the Atlantic, it would be impossible for us to throw reinforcements and supplies into Quebec. That appeared to him the strongest argument against an attempt to erect defensive works on the Canadian frontier. Such an attempt would only end in a complete waste of money, without having any effect on the ultimate result of the war. But his second ground of objection was stronger than the first. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that the proposed mode of proceeding was the correct one, were we going to work in the right way to carry out that suggestion? He believed not. His noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) asked for £50,000 for commencing the defensive works in Canada, and no doubt he would tell them in the course of the discussion that he had asked for all which could be spent in one year. If that were the case nothing would tend to show the utter hopelessness and absurdity of the proposal more than the fact that, owing to circumstances, they could only lay out £50,000 in the first year, and that it would take two or three years before the plan could be carried out. Certainly if ever the contingency of a war with the Northern States of America did arise they would hardly be kind enough to wait until our system of fortifications was complete. If ever that unfortunate contingency should arise it would as likely arise in three or four months as in three or four years. Was it not, then, absurd to come down to impolitic to take any steps with that object in view. Those Gentlemen adopt a very intelligible line of argument. They say the only source of danger to Canada arises from her connection with this country. They add that this country is powerless to defend Canada in time of war, and therefore it is better we should say to the Canadians in time of peace, "We cannot undertake your defence, but we will relieve you of the danger which arises from your connection with us, and we advise you to keep on good terms with the United States, and not to provoke hostilities with that country." His noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) asked for £50,000 for commencing the defensive works in Canada, and no doubt he would tell them in the course of the discussion that he had asked for all which could be spent in one year. If that were the case nothing would tend to show the utter hopelessness and absurdity of the proposal more than the fact that, owing to circumstances, they could only lay out £50,000 in the first year, and that it would take two or three years before the plan could be carried out. Certainly if ever the contingency of a war with the Northern States of America did arise they would hardly be kind enough to wait until our system of fortifications was complete. If ever that unfortunate contingency should arise it would as likely arise in three or four months as in three or four years. Was it not, then, absurd to come down to the House and ask for money to commence works which might take three or four years to complete, and which were intended to meet a contingency as likely to occur within four months as four years? The whole scheme was utterly unworthy of the consent of Parliament. He objected, too, to the works, not only because they were inadequate to the defence of the Canadian frontier, but because they were likely to be a source of irritation in the Northern States. They were a great deal more likely to precipitate hostilities than to avert them. If the Government really thought that it was necessary to take steps for the defence of the Canadian frontier, and if the House agreed in that opinion, he should be the last man to throw obstacles in the way; but he contended that it was most unbusinesslike to come down and ask for money which was to be spent in dribblets, and was more likely than anything to create the emergency which was deprecated. Assuming, however, that his noble Friend was perfectly correct in his suggestions, and that the plan he proposed was founded on the best information and ought to be adopted, then after all it was only a portion of the scheme for the defence of the frontier. It must, therefore, be understood that the Government contemplated adding to these fortifications in future years. Fortifications without men were of little use, and it was to be presumed that the Government had considered this question of manning these fortifications. His noble Friend had told them that 60,000 men would be required for the defence of the frontier, and that we were to give from 10,000 to 20,000. He should wish, first of all, to be informed by his noble Friend where these 10,000 or 20,000 men were to come from. It had been stated in the House, and the Government had not contradicted it, that we had not sufficient troops to furnish the requisite reliefs for the colonies, and that the difficulty would be increased greatly in a couple of years, when the regiments sent to India for the mutiny would have to be brought home. If these men were kept in India beyond their proper time, the Government would be guilty of the murder of every soldier who should die in that country. Moreover, the Government had given no denial to the assertion that we were several battalions short of the number of men voted. Where, then, were these 10,000 or 20,000 men to come from? Then we were told that this was to be a joint scheme of defence between the mother country and the colony. He wanted to know whether, if this scheme were adopted, there was any agreement which would bind the colonists to carry out their portion of it—because, according to the Report of Colonel Jervois, a very large sum would be required to do that. Was the colony willing to construct the forts required, and to go to the expense of raising and keeping in an efficient condition the number of men that would be necessary to garrison them, and also a sufficient standing army? These were points which the Government ought to clear up. He came now to what, in his opinion, was the most important part of the case. His noble Friend had said that this country hoped to maintain her naval superiority. They all hoped that. But in the Report with which Colonel Jervois had furnished the Government, and which he believed was the foundation of the present scheme, that officer in summing up his plans of defence had stated that the most important part was the keeping the command of the rivers and lakes by means of iron-clad gunboats. That statement of Colonel Jervois had been accepted by the noble Lord, and it was admitted on all hands that those iron-clad gunboats, and a number of them sufficient to cover the whole River St. Lawrence upwards to the further part of the Lakes, were indispensable. When the House was asked to vote a sum of money for the commencement of a scheme of this character, assuredly they ought to have some information as to how they were to provide for the most essential part of the design. We did not possess at this moment such a thing as an iron-clad gunboat. There were old wooden gunboats rotting in the yards since the time of the Crimean war; but the Government, acting on the plan of doing everything at the last moment, had neglected to provide iron-clad gunboats. Colonel Jervois, however, had distinctly stated that they must have such gunboats, and of a superior description. Now, the Committee had a right to demand an answer from Her Majesty's Government as to where these gunboats were to come from, and whether any preparations were being made for their construction. Was his noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty, after the Chancellor of the Exchequer had slipped his Budget through the House with the greatest rapidity, to come down and ask a sum of money for the construction of these gunboats, or was there any other arrangement? Such gunboats as Colonel Jervois referred to were not to be constructed in a week or a month. He should be glad to hear what length of time would be required to construct a sufficient number for the defence of Canada upon the plan proposed. The Committee had a right to call upon Her Majesty's Government to give a positive assurance that these gunboats were, or were about to be, put in hand, and that by the time the fortifications were completed they should have enough both of gunboats and of men ready to play their part in the defence of Canada. There was only one point more. He would ask the Government to bear in mind that they were about to take no trifling step when they asked for this Vote of £50,000, but one the consequences of which no man could venture to calculate, either as regarded ourselves or the influence it might have upon the defence of Canada. He thought, with all deference to the Committee, that they ought to pause before assenting to this Vote; that they ought to have better information, in the first place, as to where the men were to be found, and in the next place as to the gunboats. He feared they were about to embark without sufficient advice and consideration upon a measure which if it failed might ultimately lead to a great disaster both to the honour and interests of this country. He begged to move the omission of the sum of £50,000, for the defences of Quebec from the Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £50,000, for the Improvement of Defences at Quebec, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Bentinck.)

GENERAL PEEL: Sir, although a great deal of the interest and importance attached to this Vote has been already forestalled and anticipated by the debates which have taken place upon the subject of Canada, I shall, with the permission of the Committee, offer a few remarks on the subject now before us. In the course of previous debates the House has, I think, expressed its opinion, with a degree of temper and moderation which does it the greatest credit, to the effect that, without casting the slightest doubt upon the good intentions or honour of the American Government, this country has come to the determination that, if Canada be attacked by anybody, that attack should form a casus belli, and that she would be defended with the whole strength of our armaments, to be employed in such a manner as should be most effectual to her interests. This I take to be the opinion of, at all events, the majority of this House, and I am sure it is of the majority of this country. Entertaining this opinion myself, I shall now come shortly to the consideration of the merits of the scheme proposed by Her Majesty's Government. If I were to look at the proposed fortifications of Quebec merely with reference to the Report of Colonel Jervois, I should be inclined to say that they were intended to secure the safe retreat of Her Majesty's forces in Canada in case it should be invaded; and I should look upon the position of our troops in Canada in much the same way as the Minister looked upon that regiment of Volunteers whose colonel wrote to say, upon the breaking out of war, that they would not under any circumstances leave the country, and the reply of the Minister was that he thought they had better make one exception, and that was in case the country was invaded. If that be the position of our troops in Canada, why you had better at once secure their safety and save your own money by withdrawing them, and adopting the principle of leaving the inhabitants to their fate, and seeking some other battle-field upon which to defend their cause. That is no new scheme nor has anybody in the course of these debates had the merit of making this suggestion for the first time. More than two years ago, in 1862, Sir Francis Head, who is some authority upon this subject, after describing, in the first instance, the great extent of the frontier you will have to defend, goes on to say—

"Now, over such an enormous expanse of land and water, instead of our despatching troops, vessels, and ammunition to engage, not in regular warfare, but in an endless, costly, and ignominious game of 'hide and seek,' in which we might possibly lose more than we should be permitted to capture, let England proclaim that so long as Canada shall unequivocally evince the loyalty and attachment to Great Britain which have hitherto distinguished her, any unjustifiable invasion of her territory by the army of the adjoining Republic shall, in the first instance, be instantly resented, not on her own soil, but by an infinitely cheaper and more efficacious punishment elsewhere. Thus, if the army of the Government of the Northern States fire Toronto and Hamilton, let England, instead of troubling herself to extinguish those distant flames, bombard and burn Boston and New York. If Canadian vessels are attacked on fresh water let the injury be promptly avenged by the British navy throughout the 'wide, rude,' salt, aqueous surface of the globe."

That might be very good advice in merely a military point of view; but there are other points of view. It would be very poor consolation for the inhabitants of Toronto and Hamilton if they had been bombarded and burnt on your account to tell them that you intended to burn and bombard Boston and New York—which you would find it very difficult to do. I think our position with regard to the Canadians, if we abandon them, would be very like that of the absentee landlord to his steward when the latter wrote to say that in consequence of his arbitrary and oppressive treatment his tenants had threatened to murder him, and the reply of the landlord was, "Tell the scoundrels if they think to intimidate me by shooting you they are very much mistaken." I suppose we are to instruct the Canadians to tell any aggressor that if they think to punish England by massacring them they are very much mistaken. Now I am totally opposed to this policy of abandoning the Canadians. So long as they continue faithful subjects of Her Majesty, and are prepared to defend themselves from aggression, I think that by every tie of blood and by every consideration which can actuate a great nation we are bound to protect them. I attach value to this Vote, because I look upon it as a declaration on the part of England that if Canada is attacked she "will not be left to defend herself alone," and as that declaration will come from the House of Commons in the name of the English nation, I trust it will be more faithfully kept than other declarations which have been made of late to other countries. Still, Sir, the question remains as to the merits or demerits of the plan proposed. Now, nobody can have a higher opinion of the ability of Colonel Jervois than I have. So high is my opinion of him, that I feel perfectly certain that if he had had the least idea that a confidential Report to the Secretary of State for War would have been laid on the table of this House, he would have accompanied it by those explanations which the Secretary of State would, no doubt, obtain from him in private. He would not have thought of publishing to the world the bare fact that the British troops are placed in Canada, very much like our unfortunate cavalry horses on the heights of Inkerman, as so many scare-crows at the mercy of any assailant who may choose to attack them. As to the merits of the scheme, looking to the great extent of frontier, which it is impossible to defend, it is evidently of the last importance to prevent the enemy from taking possession of vital points in the country. You can only do this by means of fortifications, and I think it would be most unwise not to have recourse to them. In my opinion, Colonel Jervois's Report is much strengthened and supported by the fact that the Canadians are ready to undertake their proportion of the proposed works. I look upon them as a very sensible and intelligent people, and they have among them military men quite capable of judging of the sufficiency of these fortifications for the purpose for which they are designed. If, therefore, they undertake their share, we may rest assured that these are very good and necessary works of defence. There remains, however, a question which has been alluded to, but has not yet been answered—Are the Canadians to carry on the works at Montreal themselves, or are we to do it? Are the Montreal works to be carried on simultaneously with those at Quebec? and if the Canadians should find any difficulty in providing the money, will they be assisted by loan or by guarantee? In point of fact, is our undertaking to provide for the defences of Quebec dependent upon the performance by the Canadians of their part of the agreement? The Government have been, with much justice, complained of for having been two or three years in possession of Colonel Jervois's views upon this subject, and yet having taken no steps whatever to secure the safety of Quebec; for allowing valuable time to be wasted, and then, when the necessity is pressing, proposing to spend so small a sum as £50,000 in the course of the present year. The answer on the part of the Government is, that so long as the Canadians did not show any disposition to defend themselves it was useless for us to undertake the duty for them. But I cannot help thinking that the Government are themselves to blame for any backwardness which has heretofore existed on the part of the Canadians in this matter. It is all owing to the great mistake you made in sending out in such a hurry some 10,000 or 12,000 men at the time of the Trent affair. In my opinion this was a mistake, both as regards the Americans and the Canadians. It was a mistake as far as the Americans are concerned, because it was treating the American Government with suspicion, as though they would not of their own accord pursue a course which was dictated by justice and the Law of Nations. You ought to have waited till they had refused compliance with the proper and peremptory demand you made for the return of the prisoners taken from under the protection of your flag. This is one of the cases in which I think a Minister should carry out in his public policy the same principles which he would act upon in private life. If a neighbour's servant committed against me an improper and wholly unjustifiable act, I should not go to his master for redress with a pistol in one hand and a horsewhip in the other; on the contrary, I should explain to him calmly the circumstances of the offence, express my belief that he would be very happy to have the opportunity of repudiating the act of his servant, and of doing me justice. But you never gave the Americans the opportunity of doing justice to you with credit to themselves. You almost rendered it impossible for them to subdue that feeling of irritation and excitement which prevailed in their country, owing to the manner in which you made the demand upon them. I know it was said by a great many people that it was owing to the spirited conduct of the noble Lord opposite that a war was prevented upon that occasion. But, depend upon it that if the American Government had not been actuated by a sense of justice on that occasion—if they gave way merely because it was not convenient for them to go to war with you at that particular moment—you have not prevented war; you have only postponed it till it is convenient for the Americans to make a similarly spirited demonstration. It would have been better to have thrown upon them the responsibility of entering into an unjust war, which it would have been on their part, if they had refused to act in accordance with the Law of Nations, and to give up the prisoners improperly taken by them from the Trent. You would then have had with you the whole of this country to a man, and you would have had, at all events, the acknowledgment of every other nation that you were in the right. It is perfectly evident, therefore, that if the American Government, in which you now place such confidence—I trust and believe that you have good reason for doing so—were then ready to have acted justly, it would have been far better not to have sent troops to Canada. On the other hand, if the American Government were not prepared to have done this, there was still greater reason why you should not have sent troops to Canada; for, according to Colonel Jervois—

“It is a delusion to suppose that that force,” meaning the regular force now maintained in Canada “can be of any use for the defence of the country without fortifications to compensate for the comparative smallness of its numbers. Even when aided by the whole of the local militia that could at present be made available, it would, in the event of war, be obliged to retreat before the superior numbers by which it would be attacked; and it would be fortunate if it succeeded in embarking at Quebec, and putting to sea without serious defeat.”

I need not remind the Committee that at the time these troops were sent out to Canada no fortifications or defences were available there, and therefore a great mistake was committed as regards the Americans. But the mistake was no less serious as regards the Canadians, because you led them to believe that you were prepared to undertake the entire defence of the country against any attack made upon them on your account. And it would have been no wonder if this feeling existed. The quarrel was yours, not theirs; and we cannot be surprised if they desired to throw the whole burden of their defence upon your shoulders, thinking it a sufficient hardship if their country were made the battle-field throughout the war. I say it was natural, then, that they should show no great anxiety to be ruined on your behalf. But now the case is different. It is certain that the Canadians are prepared to make every effort in their power for their own defence, and I think you are bound to assist them. I do hope and trust that if they ever should be assailed they will be able, with your assistance, to maintain their independence. I, for one, will never believe that Her Majesty holds any portion of her dominions by the forbearance of a neighbouring Power. I trust that so great a calamity as war with America may never occur, and I am certain that, whatever causes of dispute may arise between the two nations there will be no necessity for war if those differences are treated in the spirit which ought to prevail between two great nations. At the same time, while we have no right to complain of any act done by the Americans in order to secure themselves from attack upon their Canadian frontier, neither ought the American Government to be in the least annoyed or jealous on account of the fortifications now proposed. By their very nature they are for defence, and not for aggression; and as for this Vote, it is rendered absolutely necessary for the reconstruction of the defences of Quebec. The only ground of surprise is that such a work should not have been completed before, without any reference to apprehended attack on Canada. I shall, therefore, give my vote to the sum proposed by the noble Marquess, and I take it for granted that if this sum is voted the House of Commons will stand pledged for the completion of the whole work—that is to say, the Government will at once be able to enter into contracts for its completion; at all events, to the extent of the sum mentioned in the margin; for no contractors will supply the necessary plant if the sum now voted may be the limit of expenditure, and if there is a possibility that next year the House will refuse to proceed with the works.

MR. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE said, that if it should go forth that we would do nothing for the defence of our Canadian fellow-subjects the patriotic movement going on among them would be arrested, and the Canadians would not take the proper steps to make the country defensible against aggression. He confessed, on his part, a feeling of the deepest disappointment at the smallness of the sum the Government proposed to take for the defences of Canada. Still he thought that by an expenditure of £50,000, Quebec could be made by means of earthworks more defensible than it was at present. The smallness of the Vote, however, was not a ground for opposing it. He thought more money should have been proposed by Government, and he considered that money should have been expended in other ways than those now projected. He conceived that the best way of defending Canada was to give her the Imperial guarantee to enable her to carry out her great works of railroad communication; in order that she might in emergencies gather together her spare and scattered population, and in fact double her material resources. He concurred in thinking that if we went to war with America we should have to trust in a great measure to the daring and enterprize of our seamen, and therefore he thought it a great mistake on the part of the Government that they had not put Bermuda in a proper state of defence, and neglected the fortifications of Halifax. It was from the latter place that, by means of a railway running to Quebec, provisions and materials of war would have to be conveyed to the British troops. The weak point in the American armour was not on the Canadian frontier, nor on the Atlantic, but in the Pacific; and he looked in vain in the Estimates for any Votes for defences on the Pacific side. If there was war with America there would be constant engagements in the Pacific. Our cruisers now refitted at San Francisco. If San Francisco were shut up they would have to go to Valparaiso. In case of a war in the Pacific our cruisers would require a place to repair and refit, and he thought the Government should ask for a sum of money for the fortifications of Esquimaux, Vancouver's Island. He went further, for he said that Hong Kong and some point in Australia ought to be put into a position of defence. He quite agreed that these proposals involved very great expense; but if we were to have the glory of empire and the prestige of a protectorate we must be ready to incur the liabilities of that position. We had done nothing of late years to put our possessions over the face of the earth in a proper state of defence. He believed that a great Vote was necessary to effect that object. We did not grudge £9,000,000 to put England in a state of defence, and he contended that Canada was as much our country as England, and that the honour of England was as much involved in an engagement on the St. Lawrence, in the Atlantic, or the Pacific, as if it took place in the Channel or in the Thames. He did not propose that there should be a huge Vote at once to put all our possessions over the world in a state of defence; but he thought something should be done to protect our most vulnerable points, so that if ever we were at war with America we should be prepared to strike her hip and thigh where she was weakest, in the Pacific, and thereby detach California from the union—a State immensely rich in minerals and other resources. Though quite willing to vote for the sum of £50,000 for the defence of Quebec, he thought the proposal was very inadequate, but he hoped it would have a good effect as showing that this country was willing to put forth all her resources to defend her Canadian colonies.

MAJOR ANSON said, that there seemed to be a general uncertainty in men's minds with regard to the defence of Canada, and the reason no doubt was that we had no precedent to guide us. Though we had had colonies to defend before now, yet England had never been placed in the same position as she was at present with respect to Canada. In case of war with the United States, England would be the base of operations, and she would have to carry on the war at a distance of 3,000 miles, with the communications closed for six months of the year. She would have to defend a frontier of 600 miles, from Quebec to Georgian Bay, in Lake Huron. It was proposed to defend three points—Quebec, Montreal, and the peninsula of Toronto, and at each British troops were to be placed. To provide those troops with the necessary supplies the communications with them must be kept open, and the geographical position of Canada was such that the whole frontier must be defended to keep up the communications. A force of 100,000 men would be required between Quebec and Montreal, and another force of 100,000 men between Montreal and Upper Canada. But the question was not one of 100,000 or 200,000 men. If a war should break out the Americans had hundreds of thousands of veterans ready to fall upon Canada at any moment, while we should only have a handful of regular troops supported by a raw militia, without any artillery except what was sent from this country. Even England itself could hardly compete with the Americans in that branch of the service, as he believed that the American army had a larger proportion of artillery to the number of men than any other army in the world; and they had, besides, efficient siege, transport, and commissariat trains, and unlimited means of communication upon any part of the frontier for the accumulation of troops. He maintained, therefore, that it was perfectly and utterly impossible for this country to dream of defending Canada for one moment. But he would assume for the moment that we could make as good a fight for Canada as the Southerners had made against the Federal States. Still the cost of the war in men and money must be calculated. During the last four years of war in America the recklessness of blood and money had been greater than any nation ever exhibited before in the prosecution of a war. He did not see exactly how this country could keep up the supplies of men necessary to carry on the exhausting struggle which it would have to maintain in Canada against the Americans. Where were the men to come from? There was nobody in that House who had a higher opinion of the capabilities of the British army than himself; but an army ought to be proportionate in point of numbers to the duties it would have to undertake in time of war. He did not think the British army had been kept up at that proper proportion; and, at the time of the war in the Crimea the real reason of the failures there was the attempt that was made to get the work of 20,000 men out of 10,000 men. In like manner, the real cause of the mutiny in India was the attempt to keep in subjection the Native army of 280,000 men by means of 18,000 European troops. A great deal more work was always expected to be got out of the British army than it could possibly do. After the Indian mutiny was over they had a war with China. They sent off a force of some 6,000 troops and told them to march to Peking, the capital of an empire with 400,000,000 inhabitants, and they did it. But all that was perfect child's play compared with what they would have to undertake in the event of a war with America. There they would not have ten Sepoys or ten Tartars with their bows and arrows or their matchlocks against one Englishman, but they would have to face Anglo-Saxons, men of their own race, with all their own indomitable energy, courage, and perseverance. For every gun that England brought, no matter of what power, the Americans could bring ten; for every gunboat we put upon the Lakes and the St. Lawrence, they could put ten, and more, too, if they chose to try it. With the small army which England possessed, and with the very great demands made upon it all over her extended Empire, we ought not to allow ourselves to drift into a great military war with America, of which it would be difficult to assign the termination. Canada herself ought to look upon such a contingency from the same point of view—she ought to perceive that it was no part of the duty of England to shed the blood of her soldiers in that colony. If the Canadians wanted a standing army, let them raise it for themselves, and let them rest content with the maritime and other efficient aid which England could render them. England certainly was not called upon by her honour to send troops to fight in Canada, especially when all knew that it was hopeless. With regard to the £50,000 for the defences of Quebec, which they were now called upon to vote, he wished to ask the Under Secretary for War if Colonel Jervois had been told to place Quebec in a sufficient state of defence before next winter set in—whether he would have said he could or could not? That, he thought, was what the Government ought to have done. Instead of asking for that £50,000, they should have sent out an Engineer and told him to put Quebec in an adequate state of defence before the winter, no matter at what cost, nor no matter what our opinions may be as to the defence of Canada. Having a portion of our army there it is our duty to place in a state of defence the only port through which we could withdraw our soldiers or send reinforcements in case of war.

MR. ADDERLEY said, that the hon. and gallant Member who had just spoken (Major Anson) seemed to make out that Canada was the only country in the world which it was impossible to defend; but, for himself, he could not conceive that she was in a different position from other States in Europe and other parts of the world which had powerful neighbours on their frontier, but which, he maintained, were somehow or other defensible if the inhabitants were in earnest. The question, as he took it, was, how was the frontier of Canada to be defended. If the proposal on the part of the Government was that England was to undertake the defence of Canada, then he could understand the hon. and gallant Member's argument that they were undertaking what was impossible. But he did not apprehend that the Government were undertaking anything of the kind. The proposition they were discussing was the first Vote towards fortifying Quebec; and what did they undertake by that proposition? Certainly not to defend the Canadian frontier, but to provide for the security of the troops they now had there, and also for the security of stores which they now had there of great value. Last Session he (Mr. Adderley) called the attention of the House—and then not for the first time—to that very point, and he did so with these two objects—first, the security of British troops in North America, whom he felt to be in a most precarious and exposed position; and secondly, in order that this country might as soon as possible come to a clear understanding with Canada as to how much Canada would undertake for herself, and how much England was prepared to undertake for her. It was because he conceived that the Vote now before the Committee tended to accomplish both those objects that he should give it his cordial assent. It was all very well to say it was quite impossible for this country to defend 2,000 miles of frontier in Canada. It was perfectly true that such an undertaking would be absurd and impossible. But, because that is so, would anybody—would the hon. and gallant Member who had just spoken, or the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), or the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck)—ask the Committee to come to the conclusion from those premises that they should either leave the troops they now had in Canada exposed as they were, or should withdraw them thence altogether? Was there anybody who would withdraw those troops at this moment? [Mr. Lowe: Hear, hear!] There was one right hon. Member who would do so; but he stood alone, nobody else shared his views on that point. And if nobody but the right hon. Gentleman would withdraw the troops from Canada at that moment, would anybody venture to say that if they were to remain they should remain without fortifications? When Colonel Jervois made his Report it was proposed that this country should undertake to fortify not only Quebec, but Montreal also, and that the Canadians should undertake to raise fortifications at three other points on their frontier—namely, Kingston, Toronto, and Hamilton. When that proposal was made he himself (Mr. Adderley) ventured to suggest that it would be wiser if this country only undertook to fortify Quebec, and to make it perfectly clear to the Canadians that if works at other points were essential for the defence of their frontier, they themselves must undertake to fortify all those other places. And what was his meaning in that? Why, that Canada should distinctly understand that if we were to fortify Quebec it was not with a view to defend their whole frontier, but to defend our own troops and to secure our own stores, which we had there to the value of about a million sterling, and that the defence of their frontier was to be undertaken by the Canadians themselves, the only people who could undertake it. Nothing could be worse than the vague understanding between this country and Canada with respect to the assistance she was to receive from us. Canada had been trusting to a broken reed in relying for her defence upon England; while we, on the other hand, talked a vague sort of rhodomontade, saying that as long as Canada was loyal and attached to us we would protect her, when we knew that under the circumstances the thing would be impossible. Moreover, it would be absurd, even if we could, to relieve any part of the Empire from the duty of self-defence—a duty which patriotism and self-respect imposed upon all men worthy or capable of freedom. By our fortifying Quebec alone

we should show the Canadians that we meant only to protect our own troops and stores; that all other fortifications which might be needed on their frontier must be provided by themselves; and that the rest of our share in defending them in the event of war would be performed by sea, in attempting to cut off the enemy's commerce, or in attacking his most vulnerable points. That we must have fortifications at Quebec no one can have a doubt who would have any troops in Canada at all. He would ask the right hon. Member for Calne, who alone proposed that we should now withdraw our troops, whether he knew what the state of Canada was at this moment—whether he knew that she was only now, for the first time, seriously considering the question of her own defence, and that she could not put forth her own strength without the assistance of a certain number of regular troops? If the right hon. Gentleman did not wish Canada to go entirely undefended, why did he wish this country to take a step which would absolutely disable the Canadians from defending themselves? No moment could be more inopportune for withdrawing the regular force from Canada which was in the act of drilling and forming their first local forces. It was certainly matter for anxiety to us that our troops there, now about 9,000 in number, were scattered in half battalions along 2,000 miles of frontier. That was certainly a precarious position for any troops to be in; but it was at present unavoidable, unless we meant to leave the whole of Canada at the mercy of the United States, or any enemy that might attack it. His proposition last year was that those troops should be concentrated, and the Government, I believe, favoured that proposal; but the necessity of providing military schools, as it were, at different places in the colony for the training of officers and discipline of the provincial levies now prevented the carrying out of that concentration. That being so, how could we leave 9,000 British troops in the present aspect of affairs in North America without any place of strength on which in case of extremity they could fall back? He fully concurred with the right hon. Member for Calne as to the mischief which was done by the presence of those troops; and nothing but an over-riding necessity justified our having them there. They were like the red flag held out at a bull-fight. They were like an incentive to the very attacks which they were put there to ward off. That was a great mischief. Another mischief was that these troops were looked upon as a pledge on the part of England to undertake the defence of Canada, far more than was meant by England in sending them there. The third mischief was in diverting the attention of this country from its chief means of defending Canada—namely, by sea, and in leading us to look mainly to its defence by land. He would allow the truth of what had been said by Sir Francis Bond Head, long before the speech of the right hon. Member for Calne, that—putting out of the question the conveyance of a sufficient number of troops 3,000 miles across the Atlantic, and the impossibility of bringing the recent inventions of war to the aid of the English forces should war come—the English army would be firing guineas in such a war, while the United States army would be only firing shillings in return. He entertained great hopes that when the English troops in that country had done their work, and had developed the strength of Canada, it might be possible to withdraw them and to make the Canadians a present of the fortress of Quebec, in order that they might defend it for themselves. These considerations did not, however, lead him to consent to the withdrawal of the English troops at the present moment. On the contrary, he would leave them there, in order that they might aid the Canadians in developing their own resources and powers of self-defence. It was said that war with the United States was only a remote possibility, and that the Americans were too sagacious a people to draw upon themselves a powerful enemy at a moment of exhaustion. The sagacity of the Americans was, however, leading them to fortify their sea-boards. Not only so, but for some reason or other, known, of course, to themselves, they were not waiting for the completion of their permanent fortifications, but were actually throwing up temporary fortifications in readiness for any emergency. If there was any lesson to be learnt from their sagacity, it was that steps should be taken on our part corresponding to those taken by them in contemplation of the possibility of a rupture with this country. His only regret was that this Vote was not passed a year ago. He regretted the delay that had taken place in commencing the proposed fortification of Quebec, but he felt bound to add that he fully acquitted the Secretary of State of any blame. It was obviously necessary that this country should not take the initiative in fortifying any part of the American continent. If this country had taken the initiative, we should only have repressed the spirit of the Canadians, and rendered it almost impossible for the Canadian Government to obtain any Vote for fortifying the frontier. It was necessary for the Secretary of State to wait until the Canadians had shown some proof on their part that they were as much in earnest as ourselves in defending their country against aggression. There was now ample proof of the spirit of the Canadian people, and it could only be repressed by uncertain relations being maintained towards them by the mother country. Nothing could show the spirit of the Canadians more than the way in which the Volunteers marched to the frontier the other day the men, women, and children joined in cheering them upon taking the first step in the defence of the country. He trusted that this feeling would be kept up by such measures as were indicated by the present Vote. The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) said that Colonel Jervois's Report showed the necessity of supplying the Canadians with gunboats. He could not agree in this version of Colonel Jervois's opinion; but we ought to encourage them in the formation of dockyards upon their lakes, to furnish them with artificers, and possibly with materials, and thus enable them to build for themselves a sufficient number of gunboats for the defence of their frontier. He must confess his disappointment in regard to the part taken by New Brunswick in the matter of the Canadian Federation. New Brunswick appeared to be holding back, as if lingering in the expectation which our treatment had fostered that her defence would be supplied by the mother country. He did not suppose it was the intention of the Government to put any pressure upon New Brunswick—the attitude of this country should be rather to accept offers from the other side of the Atlantic. The first proposal for Confederation came from Canada, and we accepted it. It was not our business to press any one of the maritime provinces into the Confederation, but if any one of these provinces was holding back from the Confederation merely to maintain the advantage of British supplies and protection beyond what it had a right to expect, this country should give it reason to believe that she will not continue that protection if there were not signs of self-help on the part of such province. He would assure the Government that he most cordially supported the Vote, and he did so because he trusted it would be taken as an indication that further measures would be taken on their part to assure the Canadians that England would support them if they would take the proper steps to defend themselves.

VISCOUNT BURY said, that having some acquaintance with Canada, he wished to make one or two observations on this Vote. The first question in every mind was whether England would defend Canada. He believed that there were not three men within the walls of that House who did not believe that the matter was already settled for us. Every one had concluded that it was inconsistent with the dignity of Great Britain to yield up to the ravages of a foreign army any possessions that formed part of the territory of the Crown. That question might be regarded, then, as already settled. During the whole time that Canada had been under the protection of the British Crown it had been known that any attack on its frontier would be an attack made upon England. If England ever came to a different conclusion, it would be her duty to give the Canadians notice of the termination of that understanding; but until we had done so, and until the period of that notice had expired, no one would think it consistent with the duty of the English Government to recommend the discontinuance of that protection. He would not say that at some future time Canada would not be obliged to defend itself, or that the time might not soon come when the Canadians would be in a condition to declare their independence. Many things had, however, to come to pass before that event occurred, and, when it did arrive, it would be necessary to give notice of the intention of this country to withdraw from its protection of Canada and to give the Canadians time to organize a system of defence for themselves. If that were the conclusion, we must see what could be done under the present circumstances, entirely divesting ourselves of the idea that it was impossible to defend Canada. There was only one possible enemy by whom the Canadas could be attacked, and on all hands we were frightened by the immense forces at the disposal of the United States.

Mr. Adderley

He quite admitted that within the last few years the United States had made extraordinary progressive strides and had risen to be one of the first military nations in the world. They had at their command vast resources; and, as his hon. and gallant Friend behind him (Major Anson) had said, they had two or three guns, and could put in the field five or six men for every gun and man that we could put forward. But could we help that? Was it by exaggerating the forces of an enemy that we could get out of the difficulty in which we were now placed? All we could do was frankly to recognize the power of an enemy and to take the best means in our power to render his attacks of no avail. He confessed that to him it did not seem probable that we should be subjected to any attack at all. Looking at the United States we found that they had been waging a great war for a great cause, and at great cost to themselves—they had made immense exertions and expended an enormous amount of blood and treasure; and they had accumulated a debt beside which our own sank into insignificance. ["No, no!"] He had heard the most extraordinary estimates of that debt; but though the debt might not be as large as ours at the present moment, it had been created in four years, while ours was the growth of centuries, and before the war was ended, no doubt, they would have accumulated burdens far in excess of any which this country could show. After such a struggle the exhaustion consequent on such tremendous exertions must necessarily be felt; and even supposing the war were to terminate in the entire subjection of the South, enormous garrisons would have to be maintained in order to hold the country which they had conquered. Was it likely that to the South, disaffected and ready to rise in fresh rebellion at any moment when the strong hand keeping them down was removed or weakened, the United States would desire to add a North equally disaffected to their rule and equally consisting of an Anglo-Saxon race—who, moreover, not having yet suffered any sacrifices, would come fresh to the encounter? It did not seem within the bounds of probability that the United States, whatever their aggressive spirit—upon which he offered no opinion—would rush blindly and for no possible reason from one great war hardly terminated into the jaws of another. It was, therefore, likely that we should have a breathing space in which to perfect our defences against the enemy -- if enemy he proved to be. Still, though we might never be attacked it was plainly our duty to stand prepared, and in his firm opinion the proposals made by Her Majesty's Government were the wisest means of preparation. The hon. Member for West Norfolk said in the course of his speech that we should not have time to complete our forts before the enemy attacked us; but he (Viscount Bury) believed that if the completion of the works were delayed for three or four years we should even then not be too late for the purpose for which the forts would be required, we should then have more than enough time to complete our defences, not only of Quebec, but of Montreal and of Upper Canada also. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (General Peel) had been very satirical in his comments upon the Government for making a point d'appui at Quebec behind which the English soldiers could retire in case of disaster befalling them. But he did not think the great master of the art of war (the Duke of Wellington) was of that opinion when he found the lines of Torres Vedras, and advanced with the knowledge that he should probably have to fall back upon those lines; and did any Englishman think that the Duke of Wellington by providing for the safety of his army in case of disaster had degraded the honour of England? It seemed to him (Viscount Bury) that the wisest thing that the Government could possibly do would be to put Quebec in such a state of defence that in case of disaster not only the English troops, but the Canadians fighting with them, should have a place to which they could retreat. They had been told over and over again that, in such a war as he was considering, we must be in possession of naval superiority in order to defend Canada. But if we had no place to retreat upon where our navy could concentrate—if we were to give up Quebec—we should be unable to maintain our naval superiority. He had lived in Quebec for years, and knew every inch of it, and he must say that Quebec, under present circumstances, was upon the wrong side of the river for military and strategic purposes, though it was different in former days, when the range of artillery was much shorter and military operations were conducted on a system now exploded. Any gentleman who had visited Quebec would remember that it was built on the slope of a hill, and that from the height opposite almost every part of the citadel would be commanded by a long range cannon; and they would therefore see at once that it was not upon the present fortifications that they must depend in case of any attack upon the city. The out-works, therefore, must be transferred to the Point Levi shore. It was on out-works upon the opposite side of the river connected with one another—earthworks formed in the first instance, and afterwards connected together—that we must rely. He believed that in the modern science of fortification they were directed to trust much more to earthworks than to masonry, and that it was by making successive earthworks and retiring from one to the other as necessity required that we must defend Quebec, instead of trusting to those stone defences which, with rifled guns, would be of no avail. Not second in importance to the defence of Quebec was the defence of Montreal. At that point the river took a circular sweep round the Island of Montreal. Above were the Rapids, and on the right towards New York the road by which the enemy advancing from the United States must come into Canada. Strategic reasons existed now as they had done throughout all history, proving that this was the only road by which an enemy could enter Canada. In the war which began in 1755 there were two campaigns, and in both of them the policy was to concentrate forces upon Montreal and Quebec; and the only successful force which ever advanced out of the United States territory came by way of Montreal, and it was by that way we must defend it. The peculiar conformation of the current round Montreal gave great facilities for making a line of defence round the head of the Grand Trunk Railway-bridge, and would enable our gun-boats stationed a little below the town to command by a flanking fire almost the whole of the line of works, and thereby materially to assist in the defence of the place. This being so the plan of fortification proposed by Colonel Jervois had this great advantage, that our naval forces below the town could assist us very materially in defending the earthworks behind which the troops could be concentrated. There was no doubt that fortifications such as he had described could be held with ease by a very small English and Canadian force during the six months that operations were possible in Canada. In winter everybody acquainted with that country must know that it was impossible to do more than keep the great roads; and consequently a small defensive force would have great facilities in resisting a large aggressive force which, finding it impossible to deploy, would be unable to make use of its numbers. In case any attempt of this kind were made, a few men on snow shoes would easily cut the line of communications; and, therefore, during the winter the enemy would be obliged to retire to his base of operations. The defences of Upper Canada remained to be considered. A frontier upwards of 1,400 miles in length it would be impossible to defend without an enormous outlay of money, and without sending into Canada more troops than we possessed. It was, therefore, only possible to retain possession of these two strategic points—Montreal by which the enemy would come, and Quebec, behind which our troops would rally if unfortunately there should be occasion to do so. These were the principal points on which, in an Imperial point of view, we ought to concentrate their attention. No doubt, as the numbers and discipline of the Canadian militia increased, and as means became available, it would be necessary and easy to fortify Toronto, Hamilton, and Kingston; but these works must be left over for future discussion, after they had dealt with what they were now assured on all hands was matter of great and immediate danger. ["No!"] He did not believe in the existence of the danger, but he did believe in the necessity of being prepared; and the proposal of the Government to fortify Quebec and Montreal on the principle he had mentioned was, he thought, the best mode in which that very desirable object could be carried into effect. Having some personal knowledge of the country, he only wished to make a few practical remarks. He felt it would be an injustice in any one who had lived among the Canadian population not to say when such a matter as this was under discussion, that he believed that the Canadians were in temper, in bone and sinew, in manners, like ourselves, and able and willing to defend themselves. Like ourselves, they had representative Government in Canada. Having conceded that to them—having made them free—we could not be surprised to find that they were in fact free. Therefore, when under circumstances of great internal difficulty a Militia Bill was presented to them, they took advantage of the occasion to turn out an unpopular Government. We did not like that proceeding, because we wished them to make provision for their own defence; but having given them responsible Government, we could not quarrel with them for exercising it. Now that difficulty was swept away; the very men who rejected the Militia Bill were, he believed, ready to do far more than had ever yet been proposed to put Canada in a state of defence. Even those who had been turned out were ready to join with them, seeing the necessity of being prepared. It was not, he believed, the wish of the Canadian people to throw the burden of their defence on this country; they were prepared to take their fair share of it. He believed they would in a very short time see a highly efficient force organized in Canada by the same means which had been adopted in England—by the raising of a Volunteer force. There were a large number of serjeants of the regular army all through Canada, and if a large body of men had been raised here and rendered not unworthy to stand by the side of any soldiers, he could not doubt, out of the same materials among the Canadian population, a force equally efficient would in a short time be produced. But they had the disadvantage of living among a sparsely settled population. They had also the additional disadvantage of having to sacrifice enormously high wages to attend drill; but now they knew it was necessary to provide against a danger which could only be averted by being prepared for it, they would no doubt be immediately at their post.

MR. WATKIN said, that he felt concerned to hear the United States so often spoken of in the debate as "the enemy;" and if he thought that the Vote before the Committee would in any manner increase international irritation, he should regret his vote in favour of the proposition of the Government. As it was, he felt that he could not quite agree with the policy the Vote indicated. That policy was one of armament against an enemy. The proposition, in his opinion, went either too far or not far enough. It did not go far enough to inspire undoubted confidence and to deter attack by providing for absolute defence; and still, it went far enough to raise suspicion, and to excite or to aggravate a frontier feeling. But he thought that our actual relations with the United States were guiding considerations in reference to the policy of this Vote. Government ought, therefore, to tell the House how far they could repeat the peaceful assurances of a former debate. Did the despatches by the mail just arrived tend towards peace or misunderstanding? Was it true, on one side, that formal notice had a few days ago been given to our Government by the United States to terminate the Reciprocity Treaty? and was it true that that notice had been entirely unaccompanied by any overture or suggestion for a re-discussion of the question? On the other and more friendly side, was it true that the vexatious passport system had been abrogated? and, above all, was it also true that the Government of Washington had expressed to Her Majesty's Government their intention to revoke the notice to terminate the arrangement of 1817 and to place gunboats on the great American Lakes? If this was true, and if it should also appear that the notice to put an end to the Reciprocity Treaty had either not yet been given or had been accompanied by some friendly declaration of a desire to negotiate anew, the House must receive the intelligence with satisfaction; but should it, unfortunately, be the fact that non-intercourse regulations were maintained, that the Lakes were to be covered by armaments, and that international trade was to be interfered with, then he thought the House would consider the question as one affecting an hostile neighbour, whose unfriendly designs had to be met by preparation. He hoped, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman would give the House all the information at his command. Had he been in possession of all the facts, he should have been disposed to move as an Amendment that it was inexpedient to consider a Vote of money for the construction of fortifications adjoining the United States frontier until negotiations had been undertaken and had failed with a view to the suspension of such works under treaty obligation. He was strongly in favour of negotiation. There was an example and precedent in the arrangement of 1817 for the neutralization of the Lakes. That peaceful compact had endured for fifty years, and had alike saved the expense and obviated the dangers attending rival navies on the great internal waters of America. It was self-evident that we must either fortify efficiently or let it alone. The United States could not fail to see that if they laid out large sums on permanent works of defence, we must do the same; while if we voted money, they must follow us. And thus, people of the United States knew our own estimate of our own officials well, and they took it as a slight if we did not send to Washington a man of the first rank as a diplomatist. He would appeal to the noble Lord at the head of the Government to consider the suggestion he had ventured to make, and not to allow the country to embark, without any attempt at negotiation, in an expenditure of which this was but the first beginning if the policy of it should be forced upon the House. Our fellow-subjects in Canada ought to be assured that, if an unjust war broke out, this country would stand by them at all hazards; but that assurance was quite consistent with the attempt which, he hoped, would be made after all to neutralize the frontier and the Lakes and to re-establish the Reciprocity Treaty. The House would, he felt assured, do nothing to raise up bitter feelings between the British provinces and the United States, nor to alienate still further two peoples of common origin, who, for the sake of civilization itself, ought, as far as possible, to be one and united in the interests of commerce and of peace. ◀

MR. HALIBURTON said, the present might have turned out a very inconvenient debate if it had taken the inconvenient form which many had anticipated—that the Vote proposed by the noble Lord could not be acceded to without exciting a feeling of hostility on the part of that country against whose aggressions they were bound to erect fortifications. He wished to disabuse the minds of hon. Members with reference to the probability of a war with America. He knew something of Canada. Sixty winters had passed over his head before he removed from America to this country, and he would venture to say that he knew something of that country, and of its climate and its people. He had not the least notion that the Americans wished or intended to make war upon this country. They were too sagacious a people for that, and knew their own interests too well; they knew their own inability to attain the object they desired—namely, the annexation of the British provinces. There were two good and sufficient reasons to prevent the Americans from entertaining the foolish project of going to war with England. The noble Lord (Viscount Bury) had alluded to the debt of the United States, and he had not underrated its amount. It was a larger debt, taken with its interests and its et ceteras, than the debt of this country; and if they made peace with the Secessionists one of two things must ensue with respect to their finances—they must either repudiate their debt altogether or submit to be as heavily taxed as the English were to pay the interest on it. If there was a country impatient of taxation, and which had been always impatient of it from the earliest times, that country was America—indeed, so much so that every expedient of borrowing, confiscating, or raising money by loans at a high rate of interest, had been adopted in preference to that taxation which they loathed. Therefore there was a great security in that—that they were not able to go to war. They could not go to war if they repudiated, for then the people would not trust their Government again with the sinews of war; and if they paid the interest on their debt they must increase their taxation, and utter exhaustion must ensue, after the terrible struggle in which they were now engaged. He, therefore, put out of sight any probability of a war between England and America. There had been some irritation; no doubt there were causes for it. The Alabama had unfortunately escaped from this country, and that naturally led the people to look with suspicion on every act which this country did as favouring the escape of that vessel and aiding it in assailing their commerce. This had produced a good deal of irritation, and some very rough language had been used by their newspapers, which never were famous for truth or mildness of expression, especially towards this country—but it was all “bunkum”—vox et præterea nihil. If it meant anything it was but to alarm the people of England who were truthful themselves, and naturally believed others when they asserted anything solemnly, and to prevent them from recognizing the Confederate States. With respect to the Reciprocity Treaty which they had given notice to terminate, the whole loss resulting from its ceasing would fall upon the Americans; because that, like every other treaty which they had made with us, was altogether in their own favour. When Lord Elgin wished to make this treaty he sent to Nova Scotia for delegates; but when they arrived at Quebec they found their fishery rights had been swept away without any notice to them. Under this treaty the Americans acquired not only access to their shore fisheries, but also the right to land on uninhabited parts of the province and to dry their fish, and they had also the privilege to import duty free "lumber," of which there was little or none in back States, and which therefore was an article of prime necessity. The treaty was of great service to them, and if it were put an end to the abrogation would be to their cost. It had been said that Canada was unable to defend herself; but they were not to believe a word of it. Canada had at present a population equal to that of the United States at the time of their rebellion, rebels as the United States were calling the Southern people; but Canada had 3,000,000 of a hardy and brave people, and if they were determined to resist, as the 3,000,000 in the United States formerly resisted the whole power of this Empire, they must succeed. Surely the Canadians had a right to get credit for pluck and courage as much as the people of the States formerly. There was a time in the history of Canada—when there existed a good deal of sympathy for America—when there were many deluded into a love for democracy, and were in favour of the States. That time had passed away; those men had grown wiser as they had grown older, and they had seen that poor foolish country with a cheap Government, with no army, with no navy, grow up into a giant State, but with a giant's load to carry. The people of Canada now felt that if they were amalgamated with the United States they would be swallowed up in the immensity of their debt, and they did not wish to have anything to do with them. It had been said by one hon. Gentleman that a winter campaign could be carried on. When the hon. Gentleman had lived sixty years in that country he would know more about the winters than to assert anything of the kind. With the exception of the few horses that drew the sleighs in Quebec for the necessary traffic, all the rest were sent for the winter into the country; because horses were of little or no use at that season in Quebec. The cold was so great in the open country that they could not explain it by the thermometer or their own feelings. It was difficult to express it in language—a man must feel it in his nose, at the ends of his fingers, and in his amputated toes, to obtain a correct notion of it. It was true, as they were told, that General Montgomery attacked Quebec in the dead of winter, but it did not follow that General Grant could do the same if he had time and opportunity. There was a great difference between a small body of men travelling through the woods, where they are protected from the cold winds, and an army moving through an open and desolate country. Then, also, there was the difficulty in moving ammunition and provisions for the supply of a large force. It was utterly impossible for an army to carry on war in Lower Canada during the winter. A noble Lord had spoken of the facility of approaching Quebec by railways, using the plural number. There was only one railway, which was on the other side of the river, and which for five or six days at a time during winter was lost out of sight, so that they had to dig it out of the snow. And such were the means of transportation for the army that was to capture Quebec. When the debate first opened he felt anxious lest something should be said which might give offence to the colonists. The Canadians had done all that they could do, and more than they could have been expected to do. They had always the assurance of protection from this great country, and that they would be defended by our soldiers and fleet whatever attack was made upon their country. If they had relied on that army and navy more than they ought to have done, it was a reasonable error; but they had seen their error now, and had shown that it was their wish to do their part; and when they were ready to do so it would be disgraceful now, if there should be in the public mind an idea that the Canadians must defend themselves against the Americans. That could not be done with honour—it had been always held out that an attack on Canada was war with England. But if it was inconvenient to have this alliance with Canada, it would be better to tell the people of Canada at once that we must separate. The Canadians were a very noble people, and as long as the Americans behaved honestly and acted properly towards them, they would be likely to display a reciprocal good feeling. The people of Canada were, moreover, perfectly loyal and very much attached to this country; indeed, he did not think that in Canada a disloyal man of any sect, or creed, or colour was to be found. New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, he was sorry to say, did not deserve the same praise to the part they had acted in the matter of the Confederation, and he hoped the Secretary for the Colonies would show that he was aware that such was the case. It was not easy to coerce them, but he trusted the right hon.

Mr. Haliburton

Gentleman would let them understand how matters stood. Those two colonies were equally anxious for British connection, but when some years ago responsible government was granted to them it was unaccompanied by any definition to preclude the possibility of everybody putting upon it his own meaning. By some, therefore, it was construed in the most extensive and enlarged sense as operating to cut off all British influence, and to make the colonies completely independent, and thus it was that they came to be cursed with demagogues who made use of all sorts of arguments in support of their views, and who, being possessed of a good deal of talent and very little property, appealed to the prejudices and passions of the people and led them astray. They would only see in Confederation, a diminution of their own little personal influence—they duped the people by playing upon their loyal feelings—they told them to beware of Canada, if it was once in rebellion and would entangle them if they could, and that they would be swamped in the immensity of that country. But to advert more particularly to the fortresses which were about to be erected, it was contended that when constructed there would not be a sufficient number of soldiers to man them. Colonial history, however, appeared to furnish a very different lesson. General Braddock, for instance, had led a very fine army into the interior of the country, and it was routed by a few French and Indians. General Burgoyne surrendered his whole army to a common farmer who had raised the population, and deprived him of supplies; while Lord Cornwallis met with a similar reverse. That being so, it was clear that troops disciplined after the model of European forces were not absolutely necessary for the defence of the colonies. Soldiers extemporized for the occasion, provided they were properly officered, would serve the purpose very well. There were in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, as well as in Canada, half-pay officers and sergeants who would assist the militia officers in giving full instruction to the militia. They could not select a battle field like Waterloo. The country was broken up, partly wood and partly lake, and this would enable the militia to be equal to the occasion. In the former war which the Americans declared at a time when Napoleon was marching upon Moscow, and they supposed that he was about to conquer the world, there were only two English regiments in Canada, and yet the militia and these two regiments repulsed every attack on their country and conquered the state of Maine as far as Kennebec, and a portion of the country bordering on the Lake. It was, however, desirable that there should be a small force of British troops to give the colonists confidence and steadiness; and he had no doubt they would then be found equal to the occasion. He would only add that he should have great pleasure in voting in favour of the proposed scheme, and that he was glad the debate had not taken such a turn as to render it necessary that he should say a single unpleasant word with regard to the Americans, for whom he confessed he had no great predilection. He did not like their democratic institutions, nor the ungodly and unchristian way in which they carried on the war in which they were at present engaged, nor their utter disregard of all International Law.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he objected to this Vote, also to the Votes for the fortifications of Halifax and Bermuda, because they inaugurated a new policy of rival armaments, fleets, and armies, in reference to America, such as that which had so long been the curse of Europe; and to avoid this it would be wiser, in his opinion, to wait till the end of the war, in the expectation that when it is over the American Government will be anxious to disband their troops and to revert to that happy state of freedom from armaments which was its condition before the war; and his belief was, that there was no difference between us and the United States which might not be settled by means of amicable arrangement, or, if necessary, by resort to arbitration. He would not deal with the strategic difficulties in defending Canada, which had been so well urged by the hon. Member for Calne. There were, in his opinion, political reasons which rendered it far better for Canada as well as ourselves that we should not commence the proposed fortifications with the intention of maintaining in that colony a large force of British troops. There were two ways in which war might break out with the United States, it might originate in consequence of difficulties with Canada, or, on the other hand, with England; and it appeared to him that the one country ought to be in a position to repudiate, if it should deem right, the policy pursued by the other. Because, though England and Canada were one country in the sense that they were under the same Crown, having separate Legislatures independent of one another, they might pursue different policies. Let him suppose that the cause of war had its origin with us—ought not Canada to be able to say, "We have nothing to do with the matter; it arises out of no policy of ours?" as, for instance, in the case of the Trent, to which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (General Peel) had referred. So, also, in the case of the steam rams, which, if they had left our shores, it is well known would have caused war between this country and the United States. The Canadians were never consulted upon the policy which should be pursued in that case; and, therefore, they ought to have been in a position to have repudiated all responsibility for it, and, if necessary, to have declined to participate in any war with America to which it must have led. Let them take the converse case—suppose a war had arisen out of the St. Alban's raid, a matter over which our Legislature and Government had practically no control, but in which we might have been involved. Now the general opinion was, he believed, that up to a certain time the Canadian Government were somewhat remiss in taking measures to secure the performance of their obligations as neutrals; but that after they had seen the danger of their position, they had most honourably done all that could be expected of them. Supposing, however, that the Canadian Legislature had not in time taken steps to prevent the recurrence of such an event, and that war had resulted, our Government would justly have been entitled to refuse to engage in any war with America which might thus have been produced. But our troops being there, if the Americans had attacked Canada, we might have been involved in war before either our Government or Parliament had had any opportunity of discussing the question. In both aspects, therefore, it was a matter of extreme importance that Canada should be in such a position that either her Government or our own Government could assume a neutral position in the event of a war occurring with America. What had happened during the last three years might happen again; he did not, however, anticipate the occurrence of difficulties which could not be settled by arbitration, and if difficulties should arise it would, in his opinion, be a great crime on the part of this country if it did not take every means to prevent their leading to hostilities. No doubt, many things had been done in both countries during the last four years which he might wish undone; but he did not think that anything had occurred on either side which was likely to lead to war. On the contrary, he believed that, looking at her conduct as a whole, this country had, in maintaining her neutrality, assumed a noble attitude, for which, at the conclusion of the war, he hoped that she would obtain full credit; and he regretted the commencement of this new system of armaments and forts in Canada, because he was convinced that it would not conduce to the permanence of friendly feelings between ourselves and the Americans.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that the hon. Member who had spoken from his side of the House (Mr. Haliburton) had laughed to scorn the notion that the United States would go to war with this country. That statement, however, he could not but class with a good many of the American prophecies which had from time to time fallen from hon. Members in that House. They had for instance heard it confidently stated before now that the Americans were so enamoured of liberty, that nothing would compel them to resign their privileges and freedom; yet their President at this moment was invested with the authority of a quasi-despot. He suspended the habeas corpus when he pleased, he seized and imprisoned men without hope of trial or manumission. Similarly it had frequently been urged that their taxes were few, that their expenditure was small, and would never increase; and yet they were at the present moment overburdened with taxation, and groaning under loans which far exceeded ours. It had been urged, too, that they were a people loving peace, who would always support but a small standing army; yet now their army exceeded our own in number, and it was the very strength and magnitude of their army which occasioned our present perplexity and anxiety. These predictions had all been falsified. The noble Lord the Member for Wick (Viscount Bury) said that the United States would not go to war with us as long as they had another war on their hands. That their strength was now exhausted, their energies overtaxed, so that there was little fear of their undertaking new hostilities. If we waited until the present war between the North and South was terminated, we should have to tarry long enough. A fight will never cease where nations are the bottle-holders. It is our interest, and the interest of other peoples, that the war should continue till both combatants are exhausted. Yet grant the noble Lord's proposition; in that case what would become of the arguments employed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe)? The right hon. Gentleman said that the United States was so strong in the neighbourhood of Canada that we could not expect to resist them in that country, and that we must therefore conquer them by creating a diversion elsewhere. The right hon. Gentleman contended that the defence of Canada could only be carried on by the bombardment of some town upon the American coast. Yet what bombardment of single towns could make a diversion as strong as the diversion which the Southern States are now making? The hon. Member for Lichfield (Major Anson) had said that our colonies ought to be left to defend themselves. That system of policy was the one pursued by us until the great French war; during that war it was found necessary to take the defence of the colonies upon our own shoulders, and to guarantee them against the attacks of our enemies. It appeared to him that that was the very thing which the Government now proposed to do, they were preparing to make our North American colonies defend themselves. We could not leave Canada to ward off attacks of the United States until it had an army, and was ready to receive the enemy, by having their soldiers strongly entrenched on important points. It had been said that the army of the United States consisted more or less of raw levies, and that they only required good officers to command them. But was it right for us to leave the drafting of officers and sergeants until the time when the Canadians ought to be fully drilled and in the field? The plan of the Government was to construct fortifications at certain vital points in order that our troops might be sheltered in case of a defeat in the field. But still more with an eye to the succeeding peace. If the whole country were overrun and annexed by the United States it would never be ceded to us again. If we still held Quebec and Montreal we could claim the whole country at the cessation of hostilities. He could see nothing in the arguments which had been advanced that evening which should induce us to refuse the paltry £50,000 which was asked for. The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr.

Bentinck) had urged as an alternative that we should defend Canada by means of a maritime war. He had said truly that our strength was at sea; that we were not a military but a naval Power. But in what does a naval war consist? There were three modes of carrying on a maritime war—by bombardment, by blockade, and by right of search. The noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) had said, that it was quite ridiculous to attempt to bombard the American towns, because they had been so strongly fortified. They were each like a Sebastopol, against which it had proved so useless to knock our heads. But it was said, "We now have big guns, which we had not then." True, but the Americans have big guns too; the balance is the same. A bombardment would certainly require the services of iron-clads, and of this description of vessel we only possessed thirteen. The American navy during the bombardment would remain safe in harbour, and would come out when all was over, and would then easily make a prey of our crippled ships. If, on the other hand, their ships did not remain in harbour, what was to prevent them, in the absence of our iron-clads, from ravaging the Clyde or the Severn, or from bombarding Dublin, which was without any defence whatever? and it must be remembered that our wooden ships would not be able to contend with iron-clads. The second mode of carrying on a naval war was by means of blockade. This consisted in interdicting the trade with neutrals. It was directed against neutrals and not against enemies. The ships of enemies were captured anywhere without a blockade. The object of a blockade was to prevent neutrals from entering the ports of our enemies, and conveying to them supplies of any kind. Such a course, however, would bring a Lancashire distress upon every country of Europe which had commercial relations with America, and would not be resorted to unless found to be absolutely necessary, for Ministers would fear to lose friends in crushing an enemy. Then as to the right of search. He did not know what the hon. Member for Birmingham would say to the adoption of that mode of carrying on warfare; the hon. Member for Rochdale and his friends had lifted up their voices against such a course. The object sought to be attained by the right of search, was to make an enemy submit by crippling his commerce, by seizing his merchandize, goods, and men wherever they could be found. But by adopting this course they must abjure the Declaration of Paris of 1856. They must deny that a neutral flag covers enemies' goods, otherwise a small nation, such as Schleswig-Holstein, might lend its flag to the enemy. Unless they seized the goods of the enemy wherever they could be found, they could never hope to crush his commerce, and thus reduce him to submission. But if they seized upon all within reach they would have plenty of prize-money to attract men into the service, and privateers without end would soon be afloat. The United States would obtain our things by invading Canada, we must seize their things on the high seas. They had, therefore, only the option of defending the points in the manner proposed by the Government, or of resorting to a maritime warfare which had been denounced by the hon. Member for Birmingham and his Friends. He should therefore feel himself bound to support the Vote.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that he rose for the purpose of calling attention to the political theory as to the relations of the mother country to the colonies propounded by the hon. and learned Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre). On one point he thoroughly agreed with the hon. and learned Member. The point to which he referred was often passed over by Gentlemen in the course of these discussions, and was naturally, perhaps, much better appreciated in the colonies than it was in the mother country—it was that Canada was likely to be involved in a war over which she had no control, and in which, if there were any blame, she was blameless. She would, in fact, be involved in a war simply on account of her connection with this Empire. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that in the case of a war he would like to see Canada in the position of a neutral, and that he should be glad if she could escape the horrors of a war. His (Mr. Chichester Fortescue's) answer was that such a state of things implied independence, and that Canada herself did not desire to separate from us. But it was not enough to see to it that Canada should be neutral in case of a war with the United States; the question was whether the United States would permit her to remain neutral. It was very likely that they would give her no such advantage, and he thought, therefore, that the hon. Member's theory was likely to remain a theory. He would now call the attention of the Committee to the real question at issue. It appeared to him that, under all the differences of opinion expressed, there was a large amount of agreement in essential points. Nearly all the hon. Members who had taken part in the debate agreed that it was the duty of this country to contribute more or less aid to Canada with a view of enabling that country to maintain that independent position towards all the world which, as a member of the British Empire, she so much appreciated, and which she desired to perpetuate. They were nearly all agreed that the main security of Canada consisted in the good sense and friendly feeling of the two great countries—Great Britain and the United States—upon whose relations the fate of Canada must depend. If, unfortunately, the present peaceful relations should ever cease, they were nearly all agreed that the main defence of Canada would lie in the fact that the power of the British Empire would be exerted not only in America but all over the world. The only question which remained was whether, over and above that great security, they should call upon Canada to make preparations to defend herself. He took it for granted that the Committee would not say to the Canadians, after urging upon them for years to make exertions to provide for their own defence, that now they had taken steps in that direction this country could not help them either with money or with men, simply because Canada was utterly defenceless. Of his own personal knowledge he could state that for years past the Colonial Secretary had been continually urging the Canadians to provide means for their own defence. As an instance, he might refer to a despatch written by the Duke of Newcastle in December, 1862, to the Governor General of Canada, in which that Minister, after admitting the force of an objection made by the Executive Council of Canada to the effect that the Imperial policy was most likely to be the cause of any war in which Canada would be concerned, recommended them that their interests were connected with the maintenance of the peace of the North American continent, and that while they were dependent on the power of Great Britain to defend them, they must also in return contribute to assist the mother country in the struggle. After having addressed these observations to the Canadian people and Government, and which exhortations it has appeared to be producing practical results, it would not be generous to turn round and say to them, "We cannot give you any aid for the construction of your fortifications, or for the disciplining of your troops, because you really are defenceless." What was the meaning of "defenceless?" No one would dream of defending so large a frontier; but a country was not defenceless when it was possible to hold certain important and vital points which would enable the inhabitants to make the task of invasion a difficult and dangerous enterprise to any enemy. If we succeeded in infusing a warlike spirit among the people and induced them with our assistance to put themselves into a respectable state of defence, we should have contributed greatly towards placing them beyond the risk of invasion. When it was said that the existence of these proposed fortifications and the continued presence in Canada of Imperial troops would prove a temptation and a defiance to an aggressive Power, he confessed that he could not understand that argument. He could not comprehend why any fortifications at Montreal should be considered as a defiance to a neighbouring Power of superior strength, nor why the presence of the Imperial troops should invite aggression. It appeared to him that the temptation would be exactly in an opposite direction. It might almost be taken as an axiom that if there was a country in which military spirit was low, threatened by another country in which there was a spirit of aggression, to proclaim the defencelessness of the first was to offer a temptation to the latter which it was not in human nature to resist. For those reasons it appeared to him that, upon the ground of common sense, if we recognized our duty to defend Canada against foreign invasion, we should take care to aid her defence so effectually as to make the task of an invader disagreeable, costly, and dangerous. But the immediate question before the Committee was not one of British troops in Canada, but of giving aid to the Canadians themselves to make fortifications. Works of this kind were intended to form points at which the defending forces could be centralized, and to place the smaller force on something like an equality with a larger force invading the country. Quebec was the natural and proper place to select, as it was the gate of Canada—its entrance and its exit—and it seemed to point out the degree and manner in which Imperial aid could be best expended under the circumstances. But apart from this consideration, the Government recommended that assistance should be afforded to the Canadians to defend themselves, and this assistance the Government as well as the people of Canada themselves thought would be best rendered by fortifications. He hoped, therefore, that the Committee would not listen to arguments, however ingenious, which only meant that we should leave Canada helpless in the presence of any foe that might assail her; so that her very helplessness would invite the invasion which we all wished to avert.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, that he listened to no one in the House with greater pleasure on many subjects than the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) [who had risen at the same time], but as the question now before the Committee was of a military nature he must be pardoned for pressing his own right to address the House when called upon by the Speaker. He was glad the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) had raised this debate, as the right issue had thereby been brought fairly before the public. The noble Member for Wick (Viscount Bury) had given them in his exhaustive and most able address, an admirable description of the country, proposed to be fortified, and of the objects which those fortifications were to accomplish, from which it was impossible to draw any other conclusion than that the course proposed by the Government was the proper one to adopt. It had been contended that we ought not to defend Canada at all, but to leave her to the chances of war; but he did not think that the majority of that House or of this country would be of that opinion, and that night's Vote would show their confidence in the course which it was proposed to take. They had been told that they ought not to defend, and that they could not defend, Canada. It was upon the latter point that he wished to address the Committee. The Report of Colonel Jervois was clear and convincing on that point—more so, indeed, than the covering letter by which it was accompanied, and which had alone been presented to the House. What was proposed as to Quebec? It was to be defended by exterior works, to be constructed on the principles of modern science, which would put it out of the power of an enemy to approach sufficiently near to bombard it without first capturing these works. That was exactly what was wanted; and if the same thing was done at Montreal by the Canadians, there would be two great points secured. He hoped these would be done simultaneously, and the other points westward might subsequently be done. If, then, they had Quebec and Montreal fortified on modern principles as proposed, and had a superior force of gunboats with other maritime defences on the St. Lawrence, he held that it would be impossible for an enemy to attack either of those places, and that an incursion to the eastward from Montreal supposing it eventually to be captured would be impracticable. But whatever was done should be done quickly, and if more than £50,000 could be expended this year, it would be well for the Government to introduce a supplemental Estimate. Indeed, he should prefer their taking the whole sum this year, and completing the defences of Quebec as rapidly as possible under one contract. These fortifications would form depôts, and within a short time the Canadians would make excellent soldiers, and with a small number of regulars there would probably be enough to defend the territory. Within a very short time Volunteers made good soldiers; he said that advisedly. If this country were invaded he would almost as soon be attached to an army of Volunteers as the regulars, as he had the highest opinion of their gallantry, discipline, and intelligence. When he remembered what had been done here in a short time with no immediate prospect of invasion he felt that it would be possible to do much more in Canada, which was certainly in greater danger. They were already training officers, and in a short time they might have 70,000 or 80,000 men prepared to take the field in defence of their country. Suppose they required 12,000 men for the two fortresses, they would then have 60,000 or 70,000 in the field, fighting on their own territory and knowing every inch of the ground. In the event of a war being declared the first thing the general in command would do would be to establish defensible posts, as it were, on all the great roads, by taking possession of houses, loopholing them, and so occupying them that an advancing force would find it difficult indeed to make progress. As to carrying on war on a large scale in the depth of winter it was simply impossible. When the 43rd were sent up in the winter, the men could hardly hold their muskets, and were obliged to wrap them up in flannel and cloth. A very small number of men and a few guns would be quite enough to make roads over the ice impassable. He hoped the Government would lose no time in pushing forward these works, but above all he recommended that they should prepare at once for the naval defence of the St. Lawrence.

MR. LOWE: I have been so frequently alluded to in the course of this debate—although I have taken no part in it hitherto—that I trust the House will allow me to offer a few remarks in my own justification. I should be very sorry to be obliged to go over, however hastily, the ground I tried to cover the other night, but it is absolutely necessary that I should just restate the points I then took up. I have listened very attentively to the debate to-night, and, with the exception of the gallant officer who has just spoken, who boldly affirmed the proposition, not one of the hon. Members who have addressed you have expressed their belief that Canada can be defended. We have heard a good deal as to the honour, duty, and expediency, but nothing as to the possibility, of defending Canada; now, it is not a question of honour, duty, or interests, but of possibility, and it was upon the latter point I rested my argument on a former occasion, and it is upon the same point I feel bound to rest it still. The right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) told us that England was bound to defend Canada, the noble Lord the Member for Wick (Viscount Bury) said it would not be dignified, and another hon. Member that it would not be honourable to desert her, and the Under Secretary for the Colonies said it was our duty to defend her, but not one said it was possible to defend her. The real question which lies at the bottom of all this talk, which we must look manfully in the face, and which we must answer to our own minds and consciences—to God and to man—is, can we defend her? I have heard nothing to-night among the various arguments used by those hon. Gentlemen who have addressed you, and who are so competent to speak on the subject, to alter the impression I hold as to the impossibility of defending that country—except the statement of the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just sat down, who has given us a most unqualified opinion that it can be defended. I will not put my own opinion against that of the hon. and gallant Gentleman on a military question; but I will refer him to a sentence of Lord Bacon, wherein he says—

" Authority is a bow, the arrow from which derives strength from the hand that draws it while argument is like a cross-bow, as powerful in the hands of a child as in those of a giant."

I will not recapitulate the arguments I made use of the other night. Indeed, a great many Members have shown that they recollect them very well, for upon the strength of those arguments the hon. Member for North Staffordshire has founded his surmise that I must be mad. I think, according to the present state of the law of lunacy, I am bound, from a due regard to my personal safety, to show him that I have at least lucid intervals. The hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Mr. Haliburton), than whom no greater authority can be quoted, has cited many historical incidents to prove that regular troops are of little value in that part of the world. He has told us that General Braddock was defeated by a few untrained men, and that General Burgoyne was compelled to surrender at Saratoga to a farmer and his men. I always thought a General Gates had something to do with it. But, with great submission, I do not think we can argue from those times to ours. If the basis of the operations of the American Government were situated somewhere at Cape Horn, or if she had no regular trained veteran army, or even if she were in the condition she occupied four years ago, I, for one, would not despair of defending Canada against her. But we must look the matter fairly in the face. We should have to defend her against what is probably the best, and is certainly the largest army in the world, the appointments and training of which are unexceptionable. In fact, we should have to meet with 10,000, him that cometh against us with 20,000. It is no use talking about honour and dignity and that sort of thing—it is a question of possibility, and we must satisfy ourselves in the first place whether or not we can carry out our plans. The hon. and learned Member for Launceston says there is only one railway to Quebec, that I believe is true—but there are four or five different railways touching on the St. Lawrence. There is a railway to Detroit only separated by a narrow strait; there is a railway to Cleveland, and I believe one to Ogdensburgh, two to Niagara; so that the Americans, by means of the railways at their command, have the power of throwing any number of men on the southern bank of the St. Lawrence at any moment they please. That disposes of the difficulty of making marches in winter, and of throwing a force on one point or another, with nothing but the St. Lawrence between them and Canada. Then, it is said, there is no precedent for making a campaign in winter, though how General Montgomery's precedent is got over I do not see, except that instead of sending his troops by railway he marched them through the woods and so kept them warm and comfortable. But there is another precedent. In 1837 Canada rose in rebellion, and our troops and the Canadian militia turned out in the dead of that bitter and severe winter and put down the rebellion. Is not that a proof that such a thing as a winter campaign is possible—more especially if you can bring up your troops to the point you wish by railway? However, I will not weary the House by any recapitulation. Suffice it to say that nothing I have heard convinces me that there cannot be a winter campaign, or that our troops have any chance of holding out any length of time behind these fortifications. Then it is said the Americans could not occupy Quebec without first taking Point Levi. But what is to prevent them taking Point Levi, looking at the exploits they have performed and the works they have carried in the course of this war? Is it to be supposed that we are capable of throwing up fortifications which will resist them more effectually? Without going over the matter again, I shall take the liberty of assuming that we cannot defend Canada effectually. Nothing can be more feeble than the arguments which have been used both by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) and the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies. The noble Marquess says that if the people would only rise and assist us something might be done; and my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary says that Canada is defensible, only she could not be defended for any great period of time. If that be so, the whole basis of my argument rests on that admission; and what becomes of the rest of the argument? The hon. Gentleman says it is our duty to do what it may not be possible to do. But it is a sound legal maxim, Nemo tenetur ad impossibile—if a man cannot do a thing it is not his duty to do it. Duties are limited by possibilities. Once satisfy your mind that you cannot defend Canada in Canada, and the duty of defending Canada in Canada ceases. You cannot alter it by using fine words, you must go straight to the fact—we have no duty, no honour, no dignity in pretending to do that which we cannot do. Then it is said we ought to encourage Canada? Why should we encourage Canada? If the people think it their duty and their interest to defend Canada, then it may be right in us to encourage them; but if not, why should we encourage them to rush on what would be their own ruin? It is said also that the Canadians are loyal, and that we are bound, therefore, to defend Canada. But that does not prove that because it is our duty to defend Canada that therefore we are bound to defend it in Canada. It is our duty to defend her wherever she can best be defended; if in Canada, then there; if not, then wherever elsewhere she can best be defended. Then an hon. Gentleman says that America has an impregnable front, that there is no point at which we could assault her. That is as much as to say that because we cannot defend Canada at all, therefore we must defend her in Canada. I will state to the House frankly what I believe to be our duty. We ought to deal frankly and honourably and truly with Canada, and lay before her the actual state of things. We ought to tell her plainly and straightforwardly that we do not apprehend that we have the means of resisting the present force which the Americans could place on Canadian soil, but that we are willing to do anything we can do. As to giving her officers to train her men, and troops to serve as an example and model, it would be farthest from my wish that anything of that sort should be withheld, if she desires to defend herself; but though we have got 10,000 certificated schoolmasters to pay, I cannot understand why we should require 10,000 masters in Canada in red coats. I should have thought a much smaller staff would have answered all the purpose. But mark how by arguing this question as it is put before us we lose sight of the better half of the considerations we ought to keep in view. Nobody pretends to say that we are going to defend the valuable part of Canada—the Upper Province. Upper Canada is a country with a rich and fertile soil, well cultivated, and crowned with all the gifts of nature. The Lower Province is a rugged and barren region with a Siberian climate, shut out, inaccessible, poor, and inhabited by a population by no means progressive, and it is upon the Lower Province that every shilling we are going to spend is to be spent. But is the Upper Province, which we then abandon, less exposed?

Mr. Lowe

Do not suppose that it is through Lower Canada that the Americans will march to Upper Canada—and what use, then, will your fortifications be for the defence of the Upper Province? Upper Canada is accessible to the Americans by Lake Ontario, by the Straits of Detroit, Lake Huron, and Georgian Bay; and, after all you do, you restrict your efforts to Lower Canada, but you do not pretend to defend the Upper Province in any way whatever. All you risk you risk for the sake of defending the Lower Province, and—if we strip the thing of its varnish and tell the truth—for the sake of securing a better retreat for your soldiers when they are driven from the field and cooped out in these fortifications. Now, what is our duty?—for, although I have objected to what hon. Gentlemen have defined to be our duty, I freely admit that we have a duty in the matter. Our duty to our troops is not without some far better and nobler end to expose them to almost certain destruction. It is not our duty in this manner, and upon such shadowy grounds, to sport with the lives of 10,000 brave men. If their country required the sacrifice, they might be willing to do for her all that Marcus Curtius or Decius ever did for Rome; but let us not call lightly on them for such a sacrifice. It is easy for us who sit at home at our ease to read of their struggles and to offer them up, in a spirit of magnanimity, to some phantom of national honour or to imaginary duty and dignity; but I say, that we owe it as a duty to those brave men, who may be willing to give us their best blood, not lightly to put them in peril, and not to sacrifice them in an enterprise which we know beforehand to be desperate. We have also a duty to perform to the people of this country. The policy which I understand to be inaugurated to-night is what I call a fair-weather policy. Hon. Gentlemen have expressed their opinions that, after all, America will not invade Canada. I have no ill-feeling to the Americans. I received great kindness and hospitality from them when I was there, and I do not at all wish to put a bad construction on anything they may do or say. I do not believe that we shall see them invade Canada; but in a matter of this kind—a question of defence, we must act as if it were quite certain that they would. Now, this fair-weather policy of ours is one which will answer if America does not invade Canada. If she does not invade Canada, nothing can be more glorious to us, or more magnanimous. We shall appear to our colonists as having taken them under our wing, and kept them in safety under the shadow of our protecting ægis—their loyalty to the Crown will not be impaired, and our prestige will not be impaired in any way. On the other hand, we shall have observed a dignified and slightly defiant tone to the Americans, and we shall have held out to all men the spectacle of a small country daring to beard the American giant with his nerves strung and hands all bloody from the fierce contest in which he has been engaged. But, on the other hand, suppose the weather does not turn out fair, suppose that the invasion does actually take place, suppose the Americans enter Canada—what course is left to us? We may leave our men in America to perish or to be captured; or we may withdraw our troops. I know not which alternative this country would choose, in one there is safety without honour, in the other neither honour nor safety; but it is our duty beforehand to look at every contingency which may occur, and to be prepared for it. The way in which men run wrong in this world is by refusing to look at both sides of a question, and, therefore, being unprepared to meet reverses when they came upon them. It is not our duty to adopt a policy which may answer in fair weather times, but will not bear the test of the slightest reverse. Our duty is perfectly clear. We ought to represent these things to the Canadians with perfect fairness. We ought, in my opinion, to tell Canada that we will defend her with all our strength; that we consider her interests bound up in ours, and that we will fight for her to the last, so long as she belongs to us; but that we see no chance of successfully defending her on her own ground. If she chooses British connection she must take it subject to this condition, that she will have to defend her own soil in case of invasion; that we will make diversions elsewhere, and defend her in what we think the most efficient way, and that if our arms are crowned with success, she shall be the first object of our consideration in making peace. We should also represent to her that it is perfectly open to her to establish herself as an independent Republic, and that if she thinks that will make her position safer and more tenable, we do not desire to drag her into any danger. It is our duty, too, to represent to her that, if after well-weighed consideration, she thinks it more to her interest to join the great American Republic itself ["No, no!"]—it is the duty of Canada to deliberate for her own interests and her own happiness, and it is our duty to put before her the real relation of things, not as seen through the illusion of dignity and glory, and things of that sort, but as they really are; and to assure her that, whatever course she may take, she shall have in us a friend, a protector, and an ally up to the time of her departure. But I cannot think it is the best attitude for those who, with me, think that we cannot defend Canada in Canada to encourage her to believe that we will resist an invasion which we cannot resist—to stir her up, relying on our support, to incur dangers from which we cannot deliver her. It appears to me that there is mutual deception. We expect Canada to defend herself, and Canada expects us to defend her. That, I think, is likely to come to very little. In conclusion, I have only to say, that as for my vote on this question, I, for one, cannot take the responsibility of resisting the proposal of the Government. I said so the other night, and I repeat it now. If it is thought that it will be an advantage for Canada to have those fortifications, the money is but a trifling sum, and I am willing to vote for it. But I beg that my vote may not be misconstrued. Though I am quite willing to vote this money and to vote any supplement that may be required to complete those fortifications, I do not consider myself pledged to the policy of maintaining any troops in Canada except such as may be wished for by the Canadians themselves to instruct them in the defence of Canada.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I cannot say that I entirely and heartily approve of the form in which the Vote is presented to us and I particularly disapprove of the manner in which it is introduced to us by placing a despatch upon the table of a confidential character, from an individual employed by the Government, the general result of which has been alarm, perplexity, and confusion, not only in England, and which has attracted also a degree of attention that was not desirable or necessary to what was, I hold, the common duty of the Government. I know that there have been cases in which Reports of a confidential character from officers of the Government, have been laid upon the table of the House to prepare the public mind, and also that of Parliament, to consent to some large measure, or perhaps some considerable Vote of public money, but generally, I think it is a course which the House ought not to sanction. In all legal questions in which the principles of International Law are concerned, Her Majesty's Government very wisely and very properly, when asked for the opinion of the Law Advisers of the Crown, always urge the prerogative they justly possess, and decline to produce them. Now, that rule is highly salutary, though it is sometimes disappointing and annoying to the House of Commons; but certainly I think that rule is one that ought to be peculiarly followed in the case of other advisers of the Crown, when their Reports refer to military questions relative to the defence of the Empire, and which naturally lead to the discussion of questions with reference to other Powers and Governments necessarily of a very delicate character. Yet, on the present occasion, Colonel Jervois's document has been thrown upon the table; and if it had not been, none of these discussions need to have taken place. Parliament votes money on the responsibility of the Government, and not on Colonel Jervois's Report. And it is the duty of Her Majesty's Ministers, when they are supplied with information, to completely investigate the question, and ascertain the course that ought to be adopted, and then expound their policy, and not make an official paper of a confidential character the intimation of their conduct. But whatever objection I might have to the particular proposition of Her Majesty's Government as to its form or its amount, or the manner in which it has been introduced to the House, I have no hesitation as to the course which I ought to follow, which is to support Her Majesty's Government in this instance, because I feel persuaded that if there be any hesitation in the House now, it will discourage the conduct of the Canadians at a most critical moment of their history. I am perfectly willing to admit that no mere sentimental feeling would justify us in entering into a policy of which we disapprove and which may ultimately be disastrous to the country. In that I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman who has just addressed us, but I cannot agree with the rest of his arguments. He says that no one has proved that Canada can be defended. Well, but on the other hand no one has proved that Canada can be invaded. These are opinions which we must form as best we can, from our powers of thought and the series of facts before us, and I am bound to say that having listened to the right hon. Gentleman with considerable attention, I am not inclined at all to admit that the balance of argument is on his side, that Canada cannot be defended. It is a matter of opinion, but this I observed in his argument—that it involves this fallacy, founded on this alternative—that if we unfortunately have war with America, it must be carried on either in Canada or in some other specific place. But I maintain that if we have war with America it will be carried on everywhere, in every place where we can carry it on, not in one but in both oceans, and wherever we can annoy and weaken our enemy. Then are we to admit as a sort of strategical corollary, the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman that we are to permit America to invade our provinces with the utmost facility, and therefore with the least cost of money, men, and material. I should have thought that common experience would teach us that the more difficult we make the invasion of Canada by the Americans, the greater the demand upon their resources, upon their soldiers, upon their treasure, upon their military material, so proportionately we should diminish the amount of their military power and their military material in every other point in which they could contend with us. It seems to me preposterous that the right hon. Gentleman should lay down this principle—that if we go to war with America we shall permit the Americans without any resistance to attain a considerable end when, if resistance were offered, although it might not be completely successful, that resistance must diminish the power of the enemy in those quarters where they are available. The right hon. Gentleman has argued this case in the same spirit as the case of the Peninsular war was argued by the Whig party fifty years ago, "It is useless to resist the power of Napoleon, because no one can stand against it." This assumption entirely pervaded the whole argument of the right hon. Gentleman, "The military power of America is the power of a great nation; you cannot resist it." Well, he counts the immense legions with whose exploits we are familiar. He tells us that America has hundreds and hundreds of thousands of men in arms who are all veteran troops; that they are commanded—which no one denies—by some generals of signal ability and success; and how, he asks, are we to resist such a force in Canada? Well, if war were to take place with America to-morrow, there might be some foundation for the views of the right hon. Gentleman, but they are utterly inconsistent with his repeated declarations that he believes such a war will not take place to-morrow, that he does not think it imminent, that he does not even think it probable. Are we to understand from the right hon. Gentleman—a man of acuteness, of historical knowledge, and public experience—that he believes it will be the normal condition of the United States to maintain these armies like the host of Xerxes? Are we to suppose that if peace is to be maintained for four or five years, America will still have at its command an army of 600,000 or 700,000 men. If that is his opinion, it is one in which I cannot share; and it appears to me to be utterly impossible for him to substantiate it. I need only refer for a moment to the financial position of America, as it has been put very tersely by one hon. Member. No doubt America has incurred an immense debt by her present struggle. I will not attempt to investigate its real amount. I will take it according to the official acknowledgment of the American Government, and according to that I should suppose that that debt, which is not to be calculated by its mere amount of money but by the rate of interest it carries, is not probably less weighty than our own. But, then, as has been said, is it the intention of America to keep faith with her public creditor? I believe it is the intention of America to pay the public creditor. I am of that opinion because sagacious people must feel that if they do not keep faith with the public creditor their future will be ruinous. If the United States do keep faith with the public creditor they will not keep up an army of 700,000 men, which they maintain this year by a loan of £120,000,000 sterling. And therefore, unless we go to war with America to-morrow, I am not aware that this innumerable host, which is always at the command of the right hon. Gentleman in his speeches on the part of the United States, would be at hand. Let us look a little at the position of Canada as to its means of defence. I speak with diffidence on this subject. An hon. Member said the other night that England had not a general—a statement which alarmed me immensely. But the result of these debates on military affairs has shown such knowledge of military matters, that I trust if anything happens a general will not be wanting for this country. I think it is pretty well admitted that the population of Canada could under ordinary circumstances bring when necessary 100,000 fighting men into the field. Well, but the population of Canada is a very high-spirited population, and under extraordinary circumstances, it could do something more than bring 100,000 men into the field. Some of the hon. Gentlemen who have spoken on this subject seem to have no idea of the creative inspiration of patriotism. If their blood was up, it is more likely they would bring 200,000 men into the field. Now, supposing you had 200,000 fighting men, qualified from their habits and constitution to attain military excellence—supported by a series of strong places—I do not mean to give this as my opinion, for it would be absurd for me to do so; but we have it on the highest authority on these matters that a series of strong places supporting an army is equal to one-third of the whole force; so that you will in effect have 300,000 fighting men; and I say that 300,000 fighting men are a force, acting purely defensively, equal even to those hosts which the right hon. Gentleman has brought into the field. The right hon. Gentleman has settled the campaign, I admit, with the utmost facility. If campaigns could be settled by chopping logic the right hon. Gentleman would be the greatest general that ever existed. I remember the Duke of Wellington once saying that there were very few men who could see the end of a campaign, and we know from our own knowledge of what has happened, how doubtful has been the issues of campaigns. What in a great degree has made them so? The resistance of fortresses, and the extraordinary character and conduct of individuals who, as we saw in the case of Sebastopol, have suddenly risen up and baffled the advance of conquering armies and thrown back the fate of war for a year or two. Such circumstances occur in a state of war, always admitted to be proverbially doubtful, and I cannot but believe that from the number of the population, their spirit, from what we know they can do, and what I think under the circumstances they would do—under circumstances of excitement—I cannot but believe that so long as their connection with England is maintained and that they are encouraged by the presence of the trained warriors of our country, the resistance of the Canadians would be very considerable, and that the result would not be that which is foreseen by the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman maintains that it is impossible to defend the frontier of Canada. Does he mean to say that for the future it is to be laid down as a principle that no extensive frontier is to be defended? If so he contradicts all the principles of modern military affairs, and confounds all the principles of policy which have regulated the boundaries of nations. I am sure that he does not mean that. But why should he oppose the present Resolution, because our disaster and disgrace, if we interfere in Canada, are inevitable? Why, after all, what is the present proposition of the Government? We may find fault with its amount, with the manner in which it is introduced, with the mode in which it is proposed to dispose of it, but after all the proposition of the Government is to take some precaution that our troops should not be placed in a position from which they must retire with precipitation. It is to secure them from that danger that the present proposition is made, and, therefore, if there be any serious conclusion to be drawn from the general views of the right hon. Gentleman it is this—that we ought to refrain from attempting to maintain the independence of Canada, and altogether renounce the public duties which devolve upon us. Now, I cannot agree with him that the assertion that England has a duty to fulfil in maintaining the independence of Canada ought to be treated as an idle or sentimental boast. The right hon. Gentleman looks forward to Canada becoming a republic. I do not grudge Canada its independence. I can anticipate that those who follow us may view that country independent and powerful, but I do not necessarily see that the form of its Government should be that of a republic. The traditions of Canada are much opposed to such a form of Government, and the recent experience of Canada would not make it particularly enamoured of such a form of Government. What is the moment at which the right hon. Gentleman calls upon us practically to desert Canada? It is at a moment when North America is in a state of revolution; when no one can foresee what may be the result of the vast changes and vicissitudes which have occurred during the last four years, and are still rapidly occurring—not confined to the United States—not confined to the Confederate States—but in English America itself, and most remarkably also in Mexico. We know that the British American Provinces contain the elements of a great nation. They have now no inconsiderable population. They have immense resources. The right hon. Gentleman has described in happy language, picturesque and true, the condition of the Upper Provinces of Canada. These provinces and the lands contiguous to them contain the means of sustaining not only millions but tens of millions of population, and why are we to doom Canada to the fate of being absorbed in the United States or becoming a mere dependency on some American republic? Canada, I believe, has its future. We have a right to assume this, for it has all the elements which make a nation. It has at this moment a strong development of nationality; it is influenced by feelings which we ought to sanction, and it is for us now cordially to consider the mere proposition of the Government. Not to consider now whether it is ample enough, or whether it has been introduced to us in the happiest manner; but whether it is not on the part of the Government an appeal to the Parliament of England; whether they will shrink from the connection with Canada and the North American Provinces which at present exists; whether they do not believe it a point of honour to maintain it, and that even in our interest we should do so. Unaided by us, those provinces probably have the means of establishing their independence of any foreign foe, and if ultimately they can become an independent country we shall not find in such a circumstance a source of mortification, but rather a cause of pride.

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, this debate has happily been characterized by the same spirit which characterized the former debate on this subject. It may be referred to without the smallest apprehension of exciting any feeling of hostility between us and that great country on the other side of the Atlantic, with whom we are united by so many and by such close ties of intimacy; and I should not have referred at all to this part of the question at the close of the debate if it had not been for the remarks that were made and the inquiries addressed to me by the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin). My hon. Friend asked me whether I could repeat the assurances that our relations with the United States were perfectly friendly, and whether I could give him any information with respect to the Reciprocity Treaty, with respect to the maintenance of steamers on the Lakes of Upper Canada, and with reference also to the question of passports in America. I am happy to say that it is my good fortune to be able to give my hon. Friend and the House information that will be agreeable to them on these subjects. Since I came into the House I have received a despatch from my noble Friend the Governor General of Canada—a despatch which confirms the agreeable reports that had already reached us through the ordinary channels of information. He informs me that he has received a telegraphic message from Mr. Burnley, at Washington, to this effect, “The Secretary of State informs me that his Government intends to withdraw the notice for the abrogation of the Treaty of 1817, and that the passport system will cease immediately.” Sir, I refer to that announcement with feelings of the greatest pleasure; and I now trust we may proceed to discuss the important practical question before us in no spirit of panic, but in the just spirit which becomes the consideration of what is due to the honour and interest of this country which has dictated the proposal, and which has characterized the manner in which the proposal has been received by the House. Because we are on friendly terms with other Governments—because we hope and believe that the friendly spirit which animates us is reciprocated by them, and because we are confident that these two mighty peoples, of one blood, and one origin, and one language, are united together by every tie which should for ever forbid the possibility of bloodshed between them—these considerations do not render it the less necessary that we should, in a just and temperate spirit, consider the nature of our own defences, and the protection of our own territory, and the defence of our own troops; and that you should lay down the principle that for your safety and defence you are dependent on no other consideration than the great power and assertion of that power on the part of our own country. My right hon. Friend the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) has said that in this debate no one had ventured to assert the contrary of the proposition which he laid down, and maintain that Canada could be defended. I should have rather said, after listening attentively to every word of the debate, that until my right hon. Friend rose to address the House all the discussion was on one side, and there was nothing for those who support the Vote to reply to, that the whole argument was in favour of the proposal, and that no one had impugned or contested it except my right hon. Friend. What is the proposal that we make? The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Disraeli) objects to the mode in which the proposal has been made. He says that a document written by a distinguished officer for the information of the Government, ought not to have been produced to the House. It would be a very convenient doctrine for a Government, no doubt, if they could propose Resolutions, as the right hon. Gentleman wished, merely upon the sanction of their own authority, without producing the reasons on which their proposal was founded. But the right hon. Gentleman should remember the peculiar circumstances of this case—that these proposals are addressed not only to this country, but conjointly to this country and to Canada. That distinguished officer, whose paper had been laid on the table, was sent out last autumn by Her Majesty's Government to Canada to confer with the Canadian Government, and the result of his mission is that these proposals are made to this country and to Canada. I think it due to the House of Commons, to the people at large, and to the people of Canada, that there should be some record of the result of that mission, and that the grounds of the proposal emanating from that mission should be presented to the House. The right hon. Member for Calne has drawn, with his usual ability and power, a distinction between those arguments that rest upon authority and those that rest solely upon argument and logic. I think my right hon. Friend will find that argument and logic are sometimes deceptive weapons, which run into the hands of those who use them, and lead masters of argument and logic to conclusions that are not sound, and are not warranted by the results; and I think the House feels that whilst my right hon. Friend has advanced his propositions with great power, and sustained them with great power of argument and logic, he has not carried with him the confidence and support of his audience, and will not even be admired by the community at large. The defence of Canada is a matter which has always been considered must rest partly on the mother country, but mainly and principally on Canada herself. We accordingly addressed to Canada the advice which we thought it was wise and expedient for her to adopt, and we are prepared, now that she has entered upon the adoption of that advice in a cordial and energetic spirit, to do our just part in sustaining her defence. The right hon. Gentleman says it is impossible to defend Upper Canada, and that therefore we need not attempt to defend that part of Canada by fortifying and holding Montreal and Quebec and the river between them; and he has given us an opinion—but he has given us no authority and no ground for that opinion. He has, indeed, based it on his own view of the campaign of 1776. If he looks to the historians who describe that campaign he will find that it was a campaign of unexampled suffering. In the march Arnold's troops were driven by famine to feed on dogs; and when they came before Quebec they were compelled to attempt an escalade because the season would not permit them to resort to the ordinary measures of a siege. The result was the destruction of a large portion of the force under General Montgomery, who was killed, and General Arnold, who succeeded to the command, after sustaining the siege for a considerable time with exemplary fortitude, was obliged to retire, leaving his artillery, arms, and baggage behind him. My right hon. Friend quotes that as a proof that you can successfully carry on a winter campaign, and he says so in defiance of all our military authorities, our military critics here and in America, of the present day. In papers recently laid on the table of the American Congress their officers say the successful defence of Canada in former campaigns, when the French possessed Canada and we were the assailants, was due not to the superior courage of the French troops, but to the superiority of their fortifications. And when we are told we cannot defend Upper Canada, I find that one of the most distinguished officers of the American army, quoted in those papers, speaks rather contemptuously of the opinion of civilians which had been given in America; and he says that it may be possible to come down from Upper Canada to the attack of Montreal and Quebec; but that attempt will never be made if there be firmness in their councils to resist impressions from without, and to pursue the proper military course. He speaks of Montreal and Quebec as the centre and heart of the country, and it is on the means of their defence that the fate of the country will be decided. My right hon. Friend will find that these authorities do not speak of Montreal and Quebec as posts that cannot be defended; but say that an attack on them would be a most difficult and dangerous undertaking. more especially with respect to Quebec; when, they say, they would have to meet the army and the navy of the mother country, and all the resources which can be thrown in for the assistance of the Canadians. I think I may appeal from the reading of history by civilians to the great military authorities of our own country, supported by the great military authorities of America. As to the plan now before the House—three years ago it was not possible to come before this House and ask for a large sum of money to be contributed from the Imperial Exchequer for the defence of Canada, for Canada was then making no exertions for her own defence. But now, what is the position? She has already trained a large number of officers to take the first and most important step, the command of her militia. She is largely increasing the number of military schools, with a view to train a much larger number of officers; she has got her Volunteers engaged, as my right hon. Friend so well said, in actual service at the present time, respected and receiving the tribute of high praise from their inspecting officers, acquiring popularity, and inspiring a military spirit amongst the people around them; she has prepared a militia 80,000 strong, and she has applied for an officer from this country as Adjutant General to train that force on the best and most approved system. You have, therefore, the beginning of a large local force to fill the fortifications and to defend the country. It appears to me that the proposal is in itself a reasonable one, and that it is brought forward at the proper time, because Canada is, upon the opinion of all military authorities, capable of defence; the spirit and energy of her population will induce them to come forward for the purpose, and she is fairly and justly entitled in that spirit to the assistance of the mother country in the effort she is about to make. Under these circumstances, Sir, I am quite sure I only speak the unanimous feeling of the House when I say that at this time, and under these circumstances, every sentiment both of honour and interest, as well as the welfare of the whole British Empire, calls upon us to support the measure that is now before the Committee.

Mr. BRIGHT: Sir, I shall ask the attention of the House for a very few minutes. If the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) should divide the House I shall go into the same lobby with him. I am afraid that in making that announcement I shall excite some little alarm in the mind of the hon. Gentleman. I wish, therefore, to say, that I shall not go into the lobby with him agreeing in all the statements he made in his speech on this question a few nights ago. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) approached the military question, he said, with great diffidence—and I am very glad to see any signs of diffidence in that quarter. But after that expression he asked the House, with a triumphant air, as if no one could contradict him, if there was any difficulty in defending a frontier of 1,000 or 1,500 miles, and if that were to be a new doctrine in warfare? To have 1,000 or 1,500 miles of frontier to defend in the centre of your power is one thing; but to defend a frontier of 1,000 or 1,500 miles at a distance of 3,000 or 4,000 miles from the centre of your power is another thing. I venture to say there is not a man in this House, apart from the consideration of this Vote, or a sensible man out of it, who believes that this country could undertake the successful defence of Canada against the whole power of the United States, if we were to go to war with that country. I said the other night, that I hoped we should not talk folly and hereafter have—to be consistent—to act folly. We know perfectly well that we are talking folly when we say that the Government of this country would be able to send either ships or men to make an effectual defence of Canada against the power of the United States, supposing war to break out. Understand I am not in the least a believer in the probability of war; but I would discuss the question for a moment, just as if I thought war was possible. I suppose there are some men in this House who think it is probable; but if it be possible or if it be probable you have to look this difficulty in the face—there is no extrication from it but in the neutrality or in the independence of Canada. I agree with the Members of this House who say it is the duty of the Government of a great Empire to defend every portion of that Empire. I agree to that general proposition, though hon. Gentlemen opposite, and some hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, do not apply that rule to the United States. But I admit that rule; and admitting it, supposing that the catastrophe should happen, and we are on all points unprepared for it, may we not, as reasonable men, look ahead and try if it be not possible to escape that catastrophe? [An hon. MEMBER: To run away?] No, not to run away. But there are many circumstances in which a brave man may run away; and you may get into difficulties on the Canadian question that may make you look back and wish you had run away long ago. I object to the Vote on a ground which I believe I have not heard stated by any speaker in the present discussion. I am not going to say that the expenditure of £50,000 is a matter of great consequence to this country, or that its expenditure is to be taken by the United States as a menace. I do not think it can fairly be said that the building of fortifications, that may be useless or not, at Quebec, will enable this country to overrun the State of New York. The United States, I think, will have no right to complain of this expenditure. The most it can do will be to show them that some persons here, and perhaps the Government, have some little distrust of them, and so far it may be of some injury. I complain of the expenditure and of the policy announced by the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary, on grounds which I think should have been stated by the noble Lord the Member for Wick (Viscount Bury), who is a sort of half-Canadian. He made a speech to-night which I listened to with great pleasure. He told the House many things which some of us did not know. But if I were connected with Canada as he is, I would have addressed the House from a Canadian point of view—and that view has not been taken. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the city of Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) says, in reference to the expenditure on the proposed fortifications, that a portion of that expenditure is to be borne by this country, but the main portion is to be borne by Canada. I venture to tell him that if there be any occasion to defend Canada at all, it will not come from anything that Canada does, but from what England does; and therefore I protest altogether against the doctrine that the Cabinet in London may get into a difficulty, and ultimately into war, with the Cabinet at Washington, and because Canada lies adjacent to the United States, and may become the great battle-field, this United Kingdom has a right to call upon Canada for the main portion of that expenditure. Suppose you spend this £50,000 and the £150,000 that are supposed to follow, but which perhaps Parliament may be indisposed hereafter to grant—what is the proportion that Canada is to bear? If we are to spend £200,000 at Quebec, is Canada to spend £400,000 at Montreal? If Canada is to spend double what we spend, is it not obvious that every Canadian will begin to ask himself, what is the advantage to him of the connection between Canada and England? Every Canadian knows very well—and no one better than the noble Lord who spoke from the Ministerial Bench—that there is no more prospect of a war between Canada and the United States alone than there is of a war between the Emperor of the French and the Isle of Man. If that be so, why should the Canadians be taxed beyond all reason, as the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary proposes to tax them, for a policy that is not Canadian, and for a calamity which, if it occurs, must arise from some transaction between England and the United States? There are Gentlemen here who have been a good deal in Canada. I hear the voice of one behind me, who knows perfectly well what is the condition of the Canadian finances. We complain that Canada levies higher duties on English manufactures than the United States levied before the commencement of the present war, and much higher than France does now levy on our manufactures; but when we complain to the Canadians of this, and say it is very unpleasant usage from a part of our own Empire, the Canadians say—and for all you know quite justly—our expenditure is so much, our debt is so much, the interest upon it is so much, and we are obliged to levy those high duties. If Canadian finance is in this unfortunate position—and her credit is not very first-rate in this market—if she has these difficulties during a period of peace, what will be the difficulties of the Canadians if the doctrine of the Colonial Secretary be carried out—namely, that whatever expenditure is necessary for the defence of Canada, we must bear a portion, but that the main part must be borne by the people of Canada? It seems that the conclusion is inevitable that every Canadian will say, “We are here close alongside a great nation—our parent State is 3,000 miles away; there are litigious, even warlike people in both nations; they may get up between them the calamity of a great war; we here, a peaceable people having no foreign politics, may be involved not only in the war, but whilst the great cities of Great Britain are not touched by a single shell, or one of her fields ravaged, there is not a city or village in Canada in which we live that may not be open to the ravages of war from our powerful neighbour.” Englishmen generally have more common sense the further they go from their own country, and unless the Canadian is differently constituted, and has even less common sense than the Englishman at home, he will be driven to confess that if he is to live under the doctrine announced by the Secretary for the Colonies, he had better disentangle himself from the foreign politics of England and become the citizen of an independent State. I suspect from what has been stated by official Gentlemen in this Government and in previous Governments that there is no objection to the independence of Canada whenever the Canadians shall wish it. I have been glad to hear this statement, because I think it marked an extraordinary progress in sound opinions in this country. I recollect the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office having been very angry in this House at the idea of making a great Empire less; but a great Empire may be lessened territorially, and yet the Empire itself may not be diminished in its power and authority in the world. And I believe that if Canada now, by a friendly separation from this country, became an independent State, choosing its own Government—if it liked a monarch, having a monarchy; if it liked republicanism, having a republic—it would be not less friendly to England than at this moment—that the tariff would be no more adverse to our manufactures than it is now; that, in case of a war between England and America, Canada would be a neutral country unscathed by the calamity of that war; and that the population of the country would enjoy greater security—one very great security being that there would be no risk of war—than they will find in the theory advocated by many Members of this House, and which the Government have adopted by recommending a system of fortifications in that country. I object, therefore, to this Vote, not because it is throwing away £50,000—though that would be a sufficient reason—and not because it causes some distrust, or might cause it, in the United States—though that, too, might be a very good reason—but I object mainly because I think we are commencing a policy which we shall either have to abandon because Canada will not submit to it, or which will bring upon Canada a burden in this fortification expenditure which will make her more and more dissatisfied with this country, and which will lead rapidly to her separation from us. To that separation I do not in the least object; I believe that it would be better for us and better for them. But I think of all the misfortunes that could happen between us and Canada this would be the greatest—that their separation should take place in a period of irritation and estrangement, and that we should have added on that Continent another element in some degree hostile to this country. I am sorry that the noble Lord at the head of the Government and his Colleagues have taken this course, but it appears to me wonderfully like almost everything the Government does. It is a Government apparently of two parts—one is pulling one way, and the other is pulling the other way, and the result generally is something which does not please anybody, and which does not produce any good effect in any direction. They propose now a scheme which has just enough in it to create distrust and irritation—enough to make it in some degree injurious—and they do not propose enough to accomplish any of the objects for which, according to their own statement, the proposition is made. Somebody asked the other night whether the Administration was to rule, or the House of Commons. I suspect from the course of the debate that on this occasion the Administration will be allowed to rule. We are accustomed to say that the Government does this upon its responsibility, therefore we will allow them to do it; but the fact is, the Government knows no more of the right of this question than any other dozen Gentlemen in this House. They are not a bit more competent to form an opinion. They throw it down on the table, and they ask us to discuss it and to vote it; and I should be happy to find that this House, disregarding all those intimations that war is likely, and anxious not to provoke Canada to an expenditure and burden which she will not bear—and which, if she will not bear, will throw the entire burden on us, by breaking off suddenly the connection between us and Canada, which would make the future relations between the two countries most unsatisfactory—would reject this Vote. I do not place any reliance on the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire. Not because he cannot judge of the question just as well as I can, or any of us can; but because I notice in matters of this kind that the Gentlemen on that Bench, whatever have been their animosities with the Gentlemen on the Bench on this side of the House on other questions, shake hands, and though they may tell us they have no connection with the House over the way—yet the fact is, their connection is most intimate; and if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire were now sitting on the Bench on this side of the House, and the noble Viscount were sitting on the Bench on the other side, he would give the same support that he is now receiving from the right hon. Gentleman. It seems to me that the question is so plain, that there is so much on the surface appealing to our common sense, and that there are in it such great issues for the future, that I am persuaded that it is the duty of the House of Commons on this occasion to take the matter out of the hands of the executive Government, and determine with regard to the future policy of Canada, that we will not ourselves spend the money of the English taxpayers, and that we will not force upon Canada a burden which I am satisfied she will not long consent to bear.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I am sorry that we shall not have the vote of the hon. Member for Birmingham; but I thank him for the compliment which he has paid to the Government. He says that the present proposal is a specimen of the usual conduct pursued by us—that is to say, we have made a proposal which I think the result will show is supported by the great majority of the House, and therefore I accept the compliment which he pays us—namely, that our usual and general course is so shaped as to receive their usual and general support. Sir, I should hope that the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) who has moved this Amendment might think, from the course which the debate has taken, that it would be well for him not to ask the House to come to a division upon it. He himself, if I did not misunderstand him, did not maintain that we ought not to defend Canada, or deny that we are bound in honour and in interest to do so; all he wished us to do was to postpone the present Vote for further information or for some other inquiry which he desired should be made. But I think he will have noticed that, with only three exceptions or so, the Vote has met with the general approval of all who have participated in the discussion. My right hon.

Friend behind me the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) has, indeed, taken that which, if I were not afraid of being accused of a play upon words, I should say was a very low ground. He, I think, the hon. and gallant Gentleman beside him (Major Anson), and the hon. Member for Birmingham were the only speakers who seemed inclined to oppose the Vote; but I must correct myself even as to that, because my right hon. Friend said that, notwithstanding all his objections, he would vote for the Motion. But the general tone and line of argument were so much in favour of the Motion, that I think it would be very undesirable on this occasion that there should appear to be a difference of opinion in the House. Sir, this is not a Canadian question—it is not a local question—it is an Imperial question. It is a question which affects the position and character, the honour, the interests, and the duties of this great country; and I hold it to be of the utmost importance to the character of the nation in a case like this, and when the great majority of the House seem to be of the same opinion, that it should not go forth to the world that there has been a difference of opinion on this Motion; but that it should be seen to have been accepted by an unanimous House of Commons. Sir, there are one or two points raised in the course of this debate with regard to which I think it right to express my dissent from some doctrines which have been laid down. Many Gentlemen have argued this question as if there was a general impression and belief that war with the United States was imminent, and that this proposal of ours was for the purpose of meeting a sudden danger which we apprehended to be hanging over us. Now, I think there is no danger of war with America. Nothing that has recently passed indicates any hostile disposition on the part of the United States towards us; and, therefore, I do not base this Motion on the ground that we expect war to take place between this country and America. But is it necessary that when you propose to put a country in a state of defence you should show that war with some powerful neighbour is imminent and likely soon to take place? Why, the whole practice of mankind is founded on an entirely different assumption. Every country which is able to do so fortifies its frontier if its neighbour is a powerful State which might if it thought fit attack it. But it is said that you cannot defend Canada.

Viscount Palmerston

Now, I utterly deny that proposition. I think that is assuming a conclusion which no man is entitled to assume. Does the example even of the war now going on tend to justify that conclusion? The territory of the Confederates is vast and extensive. Have they attempted to defend every portion of that territory? No. They have fortified certain important points, and those important points, although the rest of the country may have been overrun, have resisted attack—some of them even to this day, and others for three or four years of the contest. Look at Richmond; is Richmond taken? Has not Richmond been attacked for a great length of time? And what are its defences? Why, chiefly earthworks, with a force behind them; and, though that force is inferior in numbers to the force which threatens it, it has hitherto remained in Confederate hands. The mere occupation of territory by an army that traverses through it without reducing its fortresses is no conquest. The conquest is limited to the ground that the invading army occupies; and when that army passes to another part of the country its conquest passes away with it. But all countries fortify particular points, and when those points are secure they trust that the general bulk of the territory is safe from any permanent occupation or conquest by any enemy who may attack it. It is urged that Canada has an extended frontier; but are no other States similarly placed in that respect? What country has the largest frontier? What is the extent of our own frontier? Why, the whole coast of the United Kingdom; and we might as well say that it would be necessary for the security of this country that we should line our whole coast with defensive works, because we may be attacked at any point of that great and extensive frontier as that we should defend the whole frontier of Canada. I maintain, therefore, that there is nothing that has passed, nothing that is now passing between the Government of the United States and our Government, which justifies any man in saying that the relations between the two countries are likely, as far as present circumstances go, to assume a character of hostility leading to war. But, then, the hon. Member for Birmingham says that any danger which might threaten Canada and our North American provinces must arise from political disputes between England and the United States. And, therefore, the hon. Gentleman says, the Canadians will find that their best security is, not in fortifications or in British support, but in separating themselves from Great Britain, and becoming either a separate republic or some other kind of independent State. Now, in the first place, that happens not to be the wish or inclination of the Canadians. The Canadians are most anxious to maintain the connection with this country. They are proud of that connection; they think it for their interest; they are willing to make every exertion that their population and resources enable them to achieve, and, in conjunction with the efforts of this country, to preserve that connection and prevent themselves from being absorbed by a neighbouring Power. Is it not, therefore, alike the duty and interest of this country, for the sake of that reputation which is the power and strength of a nation, when we find the Canadas and our other provinces desirous of maintaining the connection, to do that which we may have the means of doing in assisting them to maintain that connection and remain united with Great Britain? But, Sir, is it true that the only danger which a smaller Colonial State runs from a more powerful and larger neighbour arises from quarrels that may exist between the mother country and the foreign State? I say that is a total fallacy. Suppose these provinces separated from this country—suppose them erected into a monarchy, a republic, or any other form of Government. Are there no motives that might lead a stronger neighbour to pick a quarrel with that smaller State with a view to its annexation? Is there nothing like territorial ambition pervading the policy of great military States? The example of the world should teach us that as far as the danger of invasion and annexation is concerned, that danger would be increased to Canada by a separation from Great Britain, and when she is deprived of the protection that the military power and resources of this country may afford. If these American Provinces should desire to separate, we should not adopt the maxim that fell unconsciously from the hon. Member for Birmingham, who maintained that the North was right in suppressing the rebellion of the South. We will not adopt his maxim, and think that we have a right to suppress the rebellion of the North American Provinces. We should take a different line, no doubt; and if these provinces felt themselves strong enough to stand upon their own ground, and if they should desire no longer to maintain their connection with us, we should say "God speed you and give you the means to maintain yourselves as a nation!" That has not happened; but, on the contrary, they much dislike the notion of annexation to their neighbours, and cling to their connection with this country. And I say that it will be disgraceful to this country—it would lower us in the eyes of the world; it would weaken our power and leave consequences injurious to our position among the nations of the world, if, while they desire to maintain their connection with us, we did not do what we could to assist them in maintaining their position. I think that the Government are perfectly right in proposing this Vote to the House. We are of opinion that all those examples which my right hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Lowe) has adduced are not applicable. We all know that in winter the snow is so deep in Canada that if an army should march it could only be in one beaten track, and that it would be impossible to carry on siege operations in winter. We know that warlike operations must be limited to the summer months, and we think that we can, by the fortifications now proposed—some to be made by the Canadians and some by this country—put Canada into such a state of defence that, with the exertions of her own population, and assisted by the military force of this country, she will be able to defend herself from attack. My right hon. Friend the Member for Calne argued in a manner somewhat inconsistent with himself—for what did he say? He says that you cannot defend Canada because the United States can bring a military force into the field much superior to that which you can oppose to them. Yet the right hon. Gentleman says we ought to defend Canada. You ought not to relinquish the connection, he says, but you should defend Canada elsewhere. Where? Why, as you are not able to cope with the United States in Canada, where you have a large army and where you can join your forces to those of the Canadians, you should send an expedition and attack the people of the United States in their own homes and in the centre of their own resources, where they can bring a larger force to repel our invasion. If we are unable to defend Canada we shall not have much better prospects of success if we land an army to attack New York or any other important city. I really hope that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bentinck) will be sufficiently satisfied by proposing this Amendment, and that he will not think it necessary to disturb, what I think I may call the unanimity of the House by insisting upon our going to a division.

MR. BENTINCK said, the noble Lord had correctly construed the statement with which he opened his remarks. There was no man in that House more fully impressed than he was with the conviction that both the honour and interest of this country were bound up with the defence of Canada. The question between him and the Government was not as to the end but as to the means. He still retained the opinion he originally expressed; but he had discovered during the debate that a large majority of the House were of a contrary opinion. He had also to thank the hon. Member for Birmingham for the perfect frankness with which he had let the cat out of the bag, and let him understand the position in which he was placed. He found, after the hon. Gentleman's speech, that if he proceeded to a division he would be placed in two positions, both of which he strongly deprecated. In the first place, he would be giving a vote which would be open to great misconstruction, because he would find himself in the lobby with a number of distinguished Members of the House giving the same vote, but having entirely different views on the subject. Another position was, that he would be obtaining the support of those Gentlemen under false pretences. He deprecated both positions. He must decline on that occasion to ask the Committee to go to a division, and if hon. Members on the other side of the House forced a division, in order to save himself from misconstruction he would take no part in that division. The hon. Member in conclusion, said, he would, with the leave of the House, withdraw his Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the House that the Motion of the hon. Member for West Norfolk be withdrawn? [Cries of "No, no!"]

THE CHAIRMAN then put the Question,

"That the Item of £50,000, for the Improvement of Defences at Quebec, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 40; Noes 275; Majority 235.

(List of Division in next Column.)

Original Question again proposed.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

COURTS OF JUSTICE CONCENTRATION
 (SITE) (re-committed) BILL—[BILL 71.]
 COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

SIR GEORGE BOWYER objected to proceeding with the Bill, and stated that not one of the three Members of the Committee to which the Bill had been referred who had been nominated by the Committee of Selection, had ever attended the Committee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL begged his hon. and learned Friend would not persevere in this opposition. The House was well aware that this Bill was only a portion of a great measure. All the financial arrangements had been very fully discussed, and the finance Bill had passed through all the stages and had gone into the other House.

MR. SELWYN said, the question referred to the Select Committee was very important—namely, to decide on the site for the courts. Several of the Members of the Committee were consistently absent, and the evidence given was all on one side.
 He understood that the "small number of houses" at first contemplated as necessary to be pulled down on the site chosen amounted to 343, besides other buildings, and no provision had been made for the accommodation of the large number of people who would be dispossessed of their residences. It appeared, also, that the courts would not be concentrated under one roof, but would be divided by a street, and 2½ acres of ground where houses were now

standing would be converted into streets. It had been stated that the Land Register Office would be excluded, as well as the Courts of Bankruptcy and the Central Criminal Court. It was also stated by a witness who came before the Committee that there would be no room for an additional Judge or Vice Chancellor that might be appointed, and that there was no provision for the meeting of the fifteen Judges in the Great Exchequer Chamber. When all the old houses were pulled down that were now contemplated, the access to the new building would be so imperfect that some further demolition of houses would be absolutely indispensable. It appeared to him (Mr. Selwyn) that these matters ought to be more carefully considered than they could be at the late hour at which they had now arrived.

MR. HENNESSY said, after the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman, a Member of the Committee, he thought it was the duty of the House to adjourn this debate, and he therefore begged to move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Hennessy.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he never heard a speech at which he was more astonished than that which had just been made by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Selwyn). It might be concluded from that speech that the Government had employed a person to draw out plans, and that he had been brought before the Committee, and gave full details as to what the Government intended to do. The fact was that a clause had been introduced into the Bill to the effect that a Commission should be appointed for the purpose of determining in what manner the space should be used, and what should be the plan of the buildings, and to decide other questions relating to them. The Government, therefore, had not employed, and could not have employed, any person to make a plan of the building, or to determine in what manner all the courts were to be accommodated. What the Government did was simply to make a prima facie case as to the propriety of the site, and the sufficiency of the ground for the general purposes for which it was intended. The architect of the Board of Works, Mr. Pennethorne, was produced as a witness before the Committee, and the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Selwyn), who had been a persevering opponent of this measure from the beginning, had taken Mr. Pennethorne in hand, and had put to him a great many questions. Mr. Pennethorne had a plan of his own, and gave his own ideas upon the subject, some of which might be open to criticism; and there might or might not be courts necessary, which he had not taken into account. But he expressly stated that other persons might lay out the ground in a different manner; and that, by different arrangements, any courts or offices might be accommodated, which were not included in his plan. It was quite consistent with his evidence that there would be ample accommodation for all the courts on the site proposed. Mr. Pennethorne answered all the questions as well as he could under the circumstances; but having no instructions to prepare any plan, he could not give the Committee positive information as to whether this or that court would be accommodated, or how the building was to be constructed.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER thought the Attorney General had given sufficient reasons why the House should not proceed with the measure now. The Committee appeared to have had no information at all about the courts brought before them.

MR. BOVILL wished the debate to be adjourned.

MR. COWPER said, it was only a question of site, and there had been ample information brought before the Committee and they were unanimous in recommending the site now fixed upon. The subject was of so much importance that he hoped it would not be delayed.

MR. LYGON believed the more the question was considered the more clearly would it appear that the Carey Street site was not that which was best adapted for the new courts. He therefore was of opinion that further delay was desirable, and should vote for the adjournment of the debate.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR also maintained that the Bill ought not to be hurried through the House, adding that the expediency of selecting the Thames Embankment as a site had not been sufficiently discussed.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY also supported the proposal for an adjournment of the debate. He believed that the question of the site of the Thames Embankment had never been sufficiently considered.

LORD JOHN MANNERS thought that the debate might be adjourned, and that the terms of reference to the Committee ought to be enlarged.

Motion agreed to.

DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT OF
ORDERS CONFIRMATION BILL.

[BILL 82.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

COLONEL DUNNE objected.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

The House divided :—Ayes 123; Noes 72: Majority 51.

MR. HENNESSY rose to address the House; but was met with cries of "Order!"

MR. SPEAKER: The House has ordered the Bill to be now read a second time, and that order must be carried into effect.

MR. HENNESSY: I think, Sir, I am now in order in rising to order. The House has resolved by a large majority that the Bill should be now read a second time, and as it has not been seen by a single Irish Member, I move that it be read by the Clerk at the table.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed for Monday next.

QUALIFICATION FOR OFFICES ABOLITION BILL—[BILL 62.]

THIRD READING.

MR. HADFIELD begged to move that this Bill be now read a third time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Hadfield.)

COLONEL GREVILLE: I beg to ask, Sir, whether we are considering the Drainage Bill, which was ordered to be read a second time, or the Qualification for Offices Abolition Bill?

MR. SPEAKER: The Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Provisional Orders Confirmation Bill has been read a second time. ["No, no!"] The Bill has been read a second time, and the Committee has been fixed for Monday.

MR. HENNESSY: With great submission, Sir, I venture to point out the fact that this Bill had not been printed by the Government and was not in our hands, and I called upon the Clerk at the table to perform the old custom in such cases and read the Bill. That was a point of order.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Has not the Order of the Day been read for the third reading of the Qualification for Offices Abolition Bill? ["No! no!"] I do not ask the noble Lord or the hon. Baronet, but I ask you, Sir, whether the Order for the third reading of that Bill has not been read, and whether, therefore, the hon. Gentleman is in order in discussing the Irish Drainage Bill. ["Chair, chair!"]

MR. SPEAKER: It is perfectly true that the Bill was ordered to be read a second time; and it was read a second time in the ordinary and regular course of procedure. There is no doubt that, according to a usage which is quite obsolete, the Clerk may be called upon to read a Bill; but the Bill has been read in the regular, usual manner, according to the ordinary form of the House.

COLONEL DUNNE rose to move that the Committee (of the Drainage and Improvement of Lands Bill) be fixed for that day six months; but being informed that the Committee had already been fixed for Monday next, said he would move that the House do now adjourn.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Perhaps Mr. Speaker will have the goodness to tell us what is the Question last put from the Chair.

MR. SPEAKER: It appears there has been some misunderstanding in the House. The next Order has been read by the Clerk—the Clerk has read the next Order.

MR. LYGON: I submit, Sir, that whatever may have been read by the Clerk at the table cannot be held to have been read until the point of Order raised by the hon. Member for the King's County has been disposed of. That point of Order ought to be disposed of either by you or by the House, and it is not competent to the Clerk, not perhaps conversant with the point raised, to get rid of it by reading another Order. If ever a question of Order was fairly and legitimately raised this one has been so raised by the hon. Member for the King's County, and it must be disposed of before it is competent to the Clerk at the table to read the next Order. ["Chair, chair!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I have already stated to the House that in my opinion, according to our usages at the present day, the Drainage of Lands (Ireland) Bill has been read a second time.

MR. CRAUFORD rose to put a question, but his voice was drowned in cries of "Hadfield, Hadfield!"

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member (Mr. Hadfield) has moved that the Qualification for Offices Abolition Bill be read a third time.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON wished to ask Mr. Speaker, whether the Motion for going into Committee on the Bill on Monday next had been put, as he and several Members in his neighbourhood had not heard it.

MR. SPEAKER said, that that question had been disposed of.

MR. HUNT desired to offer a few remarks upon the extraordinary scene which they had just witnessed. He could not help thinking that such scenes did not contribute to the dignity of the House. He had no feeling whatever with regard to the Bill in question, but he had voted against its second reading, upon the principle that it was undesirable that Bills should be read a second time before they had been placed in the hands of the Members. If the rule that the Clerk should read the Bill on such occasions were not obsolete, Members would be careful to have Bills printed before the Motion for the second reading was brought before the House, because they would know that it would be practically within the power of any Member to stop the second reading of a Bill. He hoped that the scene which had taken place this evening would be a warning to them for the future, and prevent any Member from bringing Bills before the House for second reading until they had been printed. He hoped that the House would consent to the adjournment, because he believed that in the present excited state in which Members now were, it would not be wise or well to discuss such an important measure as that of which the third reading had been moved—the Qualification for Offices Abolition Bill. He, therefore, thought it would be well that the House should consent to adjourn.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN had been assured that the Bill was merely a formal measure, and in accordance with that assurance, he had voted for its second reading.

MR. BRIGHT said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had moved the adjournment of the House had, he presumed, done so with a view to prevent the House going on with the second reading of the Qualification for Offices Abolition Bill. ["No, no!"] He was very glad, then, to find that that was not the case. He did not think that the passing of the Bill that night was a matter of overwhelming importance, but he thought there were good reasons why it should not be adjourned. The House had already in previous Sessions passed a similar Bill no less than five times. During the present Session it had been referred to a Select Committee, who very fully discussed it, and who by a very large majority agreed to it as reported to the House. He would, therefore, ask hon. Gentlemen whether, considering the persistent course which his hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) had taken with regard to it, and the course taken by the House in five previous Sessions, as well as the fact that it was a question in which half the population of England and Wales were interested, it was not fair now to allow the House to divide upon it? As to the excitement under which the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hunt) said the House was suffering, he (Mr. Bright) did not feel the slightest symptom of it; and he (Mr. Hunt) was not, he thought, so highly excited but that he would find his way into the lobby in the division upon the Bill, and that he would take care to turn in exactly the opposite direction to that which he (Mr. Bright) would take. The House might divide without further discussion, as the Members knew the purport of the Bill, and had pretty well made up their minds as to which way they should vote. He therefore asked the hon. Member for North Staffordshire whether it would not be a graceful thing to allow the division to take place, and not bring his hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, who had charge of the Bill, down to the House night after night to attend to it.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that there had been two distinct misunderstandings as to this Bill, otherwise it might not probably have been sent to a Select Committee. It had already been six times rejected by the House of Lords, and that was a very good reason why a decision should not be hastily forced upon the House. He should vote for the adjournment.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Colonel Dunne.)

Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. MOWBRAY, as a member of the Committee by which this Bill had been considered, begged leave to remind the hon. Members for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) and Birmingham (Mr. Bright) of the circumstances connected with the Bill. Those hon. Members should recollect the Church Rates Abolition Bill, which, after being passed by a majority, had ultimately been rejected, the time afforded for reflection by the action of the other House having induced a change of opinion. Therefore, it was not altogether safe to rely upon the fact that this Bill had been adopted by the House on former occasions. The hon. Member for Birmingham relied upon the fact of this Bill having been referred to a Select Committee, with the assent of the right hon. Gentleman the late Member for North Wilts (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt), whose loss they all regretted. It was true that that right hon. Gentleman did recommend that course; but in doing so he did not foresee the course that would be adopted. The Committee only sat for two hours, and he attended it, believing that the advocates of the measure were willing to listen to some fair terms of arrangement or compromise. The hon. Member for Sheffield based his Bill upon two grievances; first, he complained that, under the Act of 1828, it was necessary that all the minor officers in the service of corporations should make the declaration, and he complained that in Manchester the Act was in very bad odour, as a great number of nightsoil men and scavengers were brought under its operation. In order to meet that objection, he (Mr. Mowbray) proposed that such minor officers as the hon. Member referred to should be relieved from the necessity of making the declaration, and that it should be required only for mayors, town councillors, town clerks, and recorders. The other complaint was that whereas all high officers of State were allowed six months before they were called upon to make the declaration, all municipal officers were required to make it immediately upon entering into office. To meet that objection he proposed to place municipal officers upon the same footing as the high officers of State. Those propositions, however, did not meet the views of the advocates of this measure, whose real object was, he believed, not so much to get rid of practical grievances as to erase from the statute book a declaration that the Church of England was intimately and permanently connected with the State. Some such compromise as he had proposed might have made the Bill acceptable elsewhere, but his propositions were not adopted, and the only change made by the Committee was in respect of three words in the preamble. Under the circumstances he should recommend his hon. Friend not to divide, seeing that from the last division it appeared there was a majority prepared to support the Bill without understanding its effect; and although if his hon. Friend did divide he should feel bound to vote with him, yet he thought it would be better to allow the third reading to pass rather than to allow it to be supposed by the public from the majority that the House had changed its opinion as to the merits of this measure.

MR. NEWDEGATE, pursuant to notice, moved that the Bill be read a third time that day six months. He explained that he had declined to act upon the Select Committee, to which the Bill had been referred, because the Bill consisted so entirely of principle that a Select Committee could not by merely altering the terms of its provisions alter the scope of the Bill; the result had proved that he was not mistaken, since the Bill had come practically unaltered from the Select Committee. The proposal to refer this Bill to a Select Committee had been founded upon some expressions which fell late one evening from the right hon. Member for Wiltshire (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt), during the Session of 1860—five years ago. He (Mr. Newdegate) had subsequently represented to that right hon. Gentleman that it would be useless to refer the Bill to a Select Committee for the reasons he had already assigned, and, on reading the Bill again, Mr. Sotheron Estcourt fully concurred in this view. The House had, in fact, been entrapped into a useless proceeding, which seemed merely intended to disguise the purport of the Bill, which was to break up the compact of 1828 that had been framed by the late Sir Robert Peel, and Earl (then Lord John) Russell. When Dissenters were admitted to corporate offices, the effect of the declaration, the necessity for making which this Bill would repeal, was to require the members of municipal corporations to declare that they would not use the influence and power to which they became entitled by their office for the purpose of weakening the Church of England, as by law established, or to deprive the bishops and clergy of the property to which they are by law entitled. The House of Lords had not acted unreasonably in six times rejecting the Bill — which, in fact, was an attack upon the Established Church. The great majority of the Dissenters were content with the law as it now stood; and the Bill was brought in on the plea that the majority of Dissenters felt aggrieved by the present state of the law; such, however, was not the fact. The truth was that a very few Dissenters had the conscientious scruples, to satisfy which was the ostensible object of the Bill. It was an exaggeration, a misrepresentation, to say that the law prevented the proposing motions in vestry and elsewhere against church rates. The Bill involved principles which meant a disruption of the union between Church and State; and he considered it his duty to press his Amendment to a division.

DETENTION OF MR. DOCKRALL.

QUESTION. MOTION FOR PAPERS.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that in consequence of information he had received, he thought it his duty, as a Member of Parliament, to ask Her Majesty’s Government for further information with respect to a case of great hardship and injustice arising from the illegal detention of a person named Dockrall in the Lunatic Asylum at Sedgefield, in Durham. The statement he was about to make to their Lordships was based on information which he believed to be derived from trustworthy sources, and had been corroborated by his own inquiries. It appeared that a most respectable man, named Dockrall, a bookseller, residing at Chester-le-street, Durham, aged thirty-six, was, by the order of Colonel Johnson, a local magistrate, taken from his house and confined in a lunatic asylum, where he remained five days. Colonel Johnson, it was clear, had acted illegally—in the first place, by consulting only one medical man as to the state of mind of the alleged lunatic, while the Act of Parliament requires two; and secondly, in his written order he stated that he had personally examined Mr. Dockrall, whereas he had not seen him at all. After Mr. Dockrall had been confined five days, it became evident to the medical man in charge of that asylum, that he was perfectly sane. This was represented to two magistrates, who went to Sedgefield Asylum, and after an examination which lasted two hours, being convinced that he was perfectly sane, restored him to liberty. Mr. Dockrall was a poor man, but this act of the magistrates created a great deal of stir in the neighbourhood. Mr. Reade, an author of whom their Lordships had, no doubt, heard, sent him to consult his (Mr. Reade's) solicitors, Messrs. Bellfrage and Middleton, a highly respectable firm. These gentlemen advised Mr. Dockrall to take means to obtain redress by bringing an action at law; also by an application to the Court of Queen's Bench, the order for Mr. Dockrall's confinement in the asylum was quashed. He then brought an action against Colonel Johnson for wrongful imprisonment, laying the damages at £5,000. The case was set down for trial at the Summer Assizes in 1864 (the imprisonment having taken place in October, 1863), but the pressure of business was such that the Lord Chief Justice, although most anxious to try the case, was obliged to leave for another assize town before it could be heard. Under these circumstances, the unfortunate man, naturally of an excitable temper, and having undergone great afflictions in the loss of his children, and through domestic differences with his wife, was so overcome by this disappointment, following on his incarceration in the lunatic asylum, and on his unsuccessful applications for redress to the Home Office, that he committed suicide in October last. In order that their Lordships might understand the cruelty of the case, and the grounds on which he believed there was a prima facie case against the Home Office of neglect of duty, he must trouble the House with some documentary testimony. His Lordship then read a letter from the father of the deceased, who said—

“That his unfortunate son had been seventeen years a clerk in the Customs and was in the receipt of a small pension. He had three sons of the respective ages of four, seven, and nine, but that just previous to this transaction they were attacked by typhus fever and two of them died. This grieved him very much and made him very sad, which was natural, as he was fondly attached to them. He accused his wife, who was a very bad woman, of being in a conspiracy with the magistrate to get him placed in a lunatic asylum, and he was dragged in a most brutal manner from his house to the asylum, where he was confined among the really mad people for five days. His son had applied to the Home Office for redress, and prayed that at least the magistrate should be suspended until a full inquiry was made, but that

Sir George Grey and Mr. Waddington took no notice of this very reasonable and moderate request. Seeing that no justice could be obtained by means of the Government he took prussic acid and died.”

The father's letter also made the imputation—

Into that question, however, he would not enter. When he (the Earl of Malmesbury) received that letter he wrote to a noble Lord now present (the Earl of Shaftesbury), who had passed his life in resisting oppression and in assisting those who were suffering. He was one of the Commissioners in Lunacy, and he sent to him (the Earl of Malmesbury) a report of the case as it appeared at the time, which corresponded with the facts he had already stated. He was also in possession of a letter from Mr. Spring Rice, the Secretary of the Commissioners in Lunacy, to Mr. Dockrall, in which that gentleman stated that the matter was one which came more properly within the province of the Home Office, but that the only legal remedy Mr. Dockrall had was by an action at law. The Lunacy Commissioners had very restricted powers, and he (the Earl of Malmesbury) did not think them to blame in the matter. He would not trouble their Lordships with reading all the affidavits before the Court of Queen's Bench, but he begged to call attention to this point—that Colonel Johnson, being in the commission of the peace, and in the exercise of his functions as a magistrate, had, in dealing with a case brought before him, signed his name to a statement which was not true—namely, he had signed his name to a statement that he had personally seen and examined the alleged lunatic—which was contrary to the fact. It was impossible that the Home Office should have been ignorant of what had occurred in this case. There was no doubt that the unfortunate man was sane when he was sent to the asylum. He quite admitted that a magistrate might, by mistake, act illegally, and if there had been nothing more in this case than that Colonel Johnson acted upon the certificate of one medical man instead of two he should have said nothing on the subject; but he could not understand how a magistrate, when discharging one of the most important functions committed to him, could by mistake sign a certificate stating that he had personally examined an alleged lunatic when such was really not the case. The case itself was one of immense importance, and he thought he had stated sufficient to show that it required the fullest investigation. The noble Earl concluded by moving an Address for—

“Copies of all Correspondence and Information in Possession of the Secretary of State for the Home Department with respect to the Detention of the late Mr. Dockrall in the Lunatic Asylum at Sedgfield.”

EARL GRANVILLE admitted that the noble Earl was quite right in calling their Lordships' attention to the subject, for no one could deny that it was most undesirable that any person should be confined in a lunatic asylum on the ground of insanity who was not really insane. He could only say, on the part of the Government, that they had no objection that the case should be investigated; while as to the conduct of the Home Office he did not see how the authorities there could have taken any other steps than they had done with respect to it.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that the conduct of Colonel Johnson was altogether without excuse, and unwarrantable. No man had a right to sign his name to a document declaring that he had done in accordance with the statute law that which in reality he had not done. He was called upon by law to declare that he had himself personally seen and examined the person whom he was about to commit to a lunatic asylum. Now, in this case it was not true that the magistrate had personally seen and examined the alleged lunatic.

EARL GRANVILLE asked how that appeared.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, the order for committal had been brought before the Court of Queen's Bench, and quashed as invalid on that ground. If matters of this kind were to be overlooked, it was to no purpose that Commissioners were appointed, Inspectors sent out, and laws passed for the protection of these unhappy persons. If the law was to be boldly and impudently evaded, as it had been in this instance, things had come to a position in which Commissioners and Inspectors might as well resign their offices, and the Legislature repeal all the Acts of Parliament upon the subject. The Commissioners of Lunacy were in no way chargeable with blame in this matter. Their jurisdiction over county asylums was very slight indeed—amounting only to power to make an annual visitation and report what they saw. Notice was sent to them of the admission of patients; but in this case it happened that the notices of admission and of discharge arrived at the same time, and therefore there was nothing to call for their intervention. After the patient had been liberated, he called upon them to complain of his treatment; but the only answer which they could make was, that the matter was totally beyond their jurisdiction, and that if he had any grievance, as he seemed to have, he had better apply to the Secretary of State for the Home Department. After that time they heard nothing more of the case. He must again press upon the House the absolute necessity that some opinion should be pronounced upon this great abuse of magisterial functions. Many of the magistrates in England were most admirable men, and rendered the Lunacy Commissioners very great assistance in the administration of the law; but there were a great many who rendered no assistance, and in some measure offered obstructions to its enforcement. In this especial county of Durham the Commissioners had more trouble in getting an effective visitation of the asylums than in any other in the kingdom. Some of the magistrates did their duty well, but others did none at all. When they discovered a case in which a magistrate sent a man to a lunatic asylum, declaring that he had personally seen and examined him, when, in fact, he had done no such thing, it was time that that House should express a feeling that the law ought to be placed upon a better footing for the defence and protection of lunatics throughout Her Majesty's dominions.

THE EARL OF DERBY wished to know whether, when the reference was made to this magistrate, he was asked to reply to the two allegations—one that he had committed this man to a lunatic asylum upon the certificate of only one medical man, and the other that he had made a declaration that he had personally visited him and satisfied himself with regard to his insanity, the fact being that he had not seen him at all; and, if not, why the Home Office had abstained from making such a requisition.

EARL RUSSELL said, that being imperfectly informed of the facts, he could not give the noble Earl the information which he desired. The regular course, certainly, appeared to be that the Home Secretary should have asked the magistrate for an explanation of the circumstances; and if the magistrate was unable to deny that he had acted upon one medical certificate instead of two, and that he had not seen the alleged lunatic, the Home Secretary should have represented the matter to the Lord Chancellor.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY, in reply, said, that he would accept the papers which had been offered to him by the Lord President; but he should expect to be told exactly what took place between the Home Office and Colonel Johnson, and in what position Colonel Johnson now stood—whether he had been rebuked or not. The impossibility of learning anything from the Government at present was another illustration of the inconvenience which their Lordships suffered from the distribution of offices in the present Administration, in consequence of which all the information which they received from certain Departments, such as the Home Office, the Board of Trade, and the Poor Law Board, came to them second-hand. Had the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack any information on this subject?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that he knew nothing about this case; but if the noble Earl would send him the papers the subject should receive his attention.

LANARKSHIRE COUNTY PRISON BOARD BILL—(by Order).

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he contended that on public grounds this Bill ought not to be proceeded with. The object of the measure was to enable the Prison Board of Lanarkshire to enlarge the gaol at Glasgow, and to allow them to extend the cost of the undertaking over a number of years. They had not, however consulted upon that subject the Commissioners of Supply, or the other county authorities. It was not consistent with the practice of Parliament to carry out by a Private Bill any measure which could be effected by a general Act. By the 2 & 3 Vict. power was given to assess Scotland generally for the purpose of building prisons, and in addition there was a power which enabled the Local Boards to assess themselves further, and so liberally had that privilege been acted upon that £200,000 or £300,000 had been raised in different counties by the voluntary assessment of the Commissioners of Supply. He contended that the proper course to be taken was that full communication should be made to all parties concerned, and that nothing should be done without the consent of the Commissioners of Supply being previously obtained. This Bill was a proposal to place in the hands of the Prison Board the absolute power to make this assessment without the sanction of those parties, and he therefore opposed it. If this Bill were passed, though the assessment could not be made without the assent of the Commissioners of Supply, yet a Parliamentary sanction would be given to a particular proposal, which had never been fully discussed, and the House would throw upon the counties the odium of rejecting it without having had the opportunity of discussing any rival project. He objected to the Bill on principle, and hoped the House would reject it, and the more so because the Lord Advocate had a notice on the paper to bring in a Bill on the subject. He begged to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

LORD ELCHO said, that he seconded the Amendment solely as a matter of principle. As a Scotch Member, and having a Prison Board in the county which he represented, which might, perhaps, at one time or another take it into its head to act as the Prison Board of Lanarkshire had thought fit to do, he was of opinion that it would be well to stop the practice in limine. The case lay in a nutshell. An Act of Parliament gave Prison Boards certain powers, but the Lanarkshire Board not being able to raise a particular sum for the enlargement of Glasgow prison, without the consent of the Secretary of State and the Commissioners of Supply, they had brought in a Private Bill to enable them to do what the public Act would not admit of.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now" and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Sir Edward Colebrooke.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, there was one monstrous injustice contemplated by the Bill. Lanarkshire was divided into three wards, and, though the district with which he was connected had not for a number of years sent a single prisoner to Glasgow, the Prison Board of that city, without consulting the proprietors of the county, took upon themselves to bring in a Private Bill in direct opposition to all the principles upon which such Bills ought to be founded.

MR. DALGLISH said, the county of Lanark was divided into upper, middle, and lower wards, but it was not a Local Board, but the county Board, nominated by the Commissioners of Supply and the proper authorities in the county, which promoted this Bill. He could say that, as far as regarded the amount of assessment, the city of Glasgow was not adequately represented by the county Board. The county Board resolved that a certain addition to the prison should be made, but it was found that they had no power under the general Act. The county Board took the best advice they could, and this Bill was the result of their deliberations. The people of Glasgow had no desire to increase the prison, it was a matter of necessity, and this mode of doing it was considered the best. He hoped, then, the House would allow the Bill to be read a second time.

Sir Edward Colebrooke

MR. BLACKBURN said, he opposed the Bill on the ground that the Board had been elected to discharge certain duties, and that they were not entitled to go beyond them. He wanted to know if they were prepared to give power to the Prison Board to assess and do as they liked, without consulting the wishes of their constituents.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he wished to ask would the House allow that to be done by a side wind which Parliament in its wisdom had not permitted under the sanction of the public Act? Ought they not rather to look at the question from a public point of view, and hear first what the Lord Advocate had to say when he should introduce his Bill for altering the very section out of which the present difficulty had arisen?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the promoters of the Bill had agreed to make the exercise of their powers dependent on the Commissioners of Supply. He thought it would have been better if the Prison Board, before coming to Parliament, had communicated with the Commissioners of Supply. However he should not oppose the measure. He (the Lord Advocate) was about this evening to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the general law, and if that law was altered so as to allow the Prison Board to spread their assessment over a period of years and to borrow upon their security, there would not be any need of other legislation, as that would meet the difficulties which had arisen.

The House divided:—Ayes 39; Noes 95: Majority 56.

Words added. Main Question as amended, put, and agreed to.

COUNTY DOWN ASSIZES—CHIEF JUSTICE MONAHAN.—QUESTION.

SIR THOMAS BATESON said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he was aware that, in addition to the unwarrantable and censorious observations made by Chief Justice Monahan, reflecting on the character of gentlemen in the county of Down in their magisterial capacity, that Judge had in open court, when a Magistrate was endeavouring to explain the facts of the case, interrupted the Magistrate and refused to hear him, making use of these words, or words to the same effect, "G— d— it,

Sir, it's all stuff and nonsense." It was generally credited in the county of Down that those words were used, and a great sensation had been consequently caused?

MR. COGAN said, he rose to order. He wished to know, before the hon. Baronet proceeded further, whether he had given notice to Chief Justice Monahan of his intention to bring so serious a charge against him.

MR. SPEAKER: Let the hon. Baronet ask his Question.

SIR THOMAS BATESON said, that he had given notice to the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland and had made him acquainted with the words which he believed could be proved to have been used. The people of the county of Down were primitive enough not to understand the use of such language from the Judicial Bench. He also wished to know whether Chief Justice Monahan had made to the Irish Government any explanation, justification, or retractation of the words censured by the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary, on a former occasion, in terms for which he (Sir Thomas Bateson) begged to thank him, and whether the Chief Secretary was aware that the Magistrates on the Rathfriland Bench, in the county of Down, were acting in the case of "The Queen v. O'Hare and others," under the advice and instructions of the Law Advisers for the Crown?

MR. COGAN: I should wish to ask the right hon. Baronet, in addition, If Chief Justice Monahan has made any Report of this case to the Irish Government, and whether he has communicated with the right hon. Baronet with reference to the observations made by him on this affair, and if so, whether, in fairness to the Chief Justice, he will lay those communications on the table of the House, so that this House, which has heard the charges against this distinguished Judge, may hear the explanation of the circumstances connected with them?

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I think it would have been infinitely better if, after the answer I gave the other night, this question had not been put. It is true that the Magistrates did consult the Law Officers of the Crown, and that they confirmed the judgment of the Magistrates in this matter. Chief Justice Monahan has written to me with respect to what an hon. and gallant Member of this House (Colonel Forde) said with reference to these remarks. Chief Justice Monahan states to me—

"Colonel Forde mentioned to me that some people in the County Down were of opinion that I had accused the Magistrates there of administering justice partially. I have written to say that I do not remember exactly what observations I made, but certainly I had no intention of making any such charge."

I am not aware what expressions were used by Chief Justice Monahan, and I am unable to say whether the charges are true or not, but I am only expressing the general opinion when I say that there is no more impartial or upright man upon the Irish Bench, and it was only yesterday that Lord Downshire came to me and said, "I do not know what the conduct of the Chief Justice may have been at Downpatrick, but I do not know any more just and upright man who goes circuit than Chief Justice Monahan." Those who know Chief Justice Monahan know that he is a little hasty and impetuous at times, but that he bears the character of an upright, frank, honest man. It is quite possible that in the heat of his observations he may have given way to some expressions which many might condemn, but I have no authority to state, without referring to him, that he did make use of the expressions attributed to him by the hon. Baronet.

MR. COGAN: I beg to ask the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland, whether Chief Justice Monahan has reported to the Irish Government with reference to this case; and secondly, whether such Report, if any, contains any reference to the epithets unjustifiably used by Chief Justice Monahan?

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I beg again to state that what I said the other night was, that so far as my information went Chief Justice Monahan was not warranted in making the remarks he had made. The Chief Justice has written to me, and I think that if he had known all the circumstances which occurred at the sessions he would not have made use of the observations which fell from him on the occasion referred to.

MR. COGAN: I must again appeal to the right hon. Baronet to give some reply to the two Questions I have put to him. Has Chief Justice Monahan reported upon the administration of justice in the county of Down? [SIR ROBERT PEEL: He has reported.] Will the right hon. Baronet lay that Report upon the table of the House?

COLONEL FORDE said, that having the honour of representing the county of Down, he wished to make a few observations on that subject, and to place himself in order he would conclude by moving the adjournment of the House. He begged to tender his thanks to the Chief Secretary for Ireland for the prompt manner in which he had come forward to vindicate the magistrates of the county of Down; for there was no doubt that the words attributed to the Chief Justice in the local papers had been used by him. The expressions of Chief Justice Monahan in charging the petty jury in the case in question were—

"Gentlemen, you have heard the whole of the evidence in this case; and I must say that I am very much disgusted with the way in which justice is administered in the county of Down."

The learned Judge also added that the very idea of having peace in the county when matters were conducted in that way was utterly out of the question. Now, it was not for him to justify the magistrates of the county of Down in what they had done, for their conduct was above reproach, and no body of gentlemen could administer justice more impartially than they had done. The magistrates might have done wrong in taking action in the matter. They wrote to Lord Dufferin, who was in London attending to his official duties, but his Lordship had not answered their letter when the hon. Gentleman the Member for Devizes gave notice of his question. When the hon. Member for Devizes had given his notice relating to this matter he himself wrote on behalf of the magistrates of the county of Down the following letter to Chief Justice Monahan, dated March 18:—

"My Lord,—Having had an opportunity this day of conferring with some of the magistrates of the neighbourhood (whose names I annex) upon the subject of your Lordship's observations when charging the petty jury in the Rathfriland riot case, as reported in the Belfast News Letter of the 11th inst., a copy of which I send you, we beg respectfully to know if this is a correct report, as, if so, we conceive the magistrates of the county are accused of administering 'partial justice,' and that any reproach cast upon them is likely to act injuriously to the maintenance of peace. A reply, at your Lordship's earliest convenience, will greatly oblige."

On the Tuesday morning, when he should have had an answer to that letter, he was returning here and he called on the Chief Justice at Belfast, and the learned Judge expressed himself as truly sorry that any observations which he had made should have been construed in any such way; and certainly, from what the learned Judge said, he thought that perhaps his letter which followed might have been a more ample expression of his regret for what had happened than it was. He would now read to the House the letter he received from the Chief Justice—

"Belfast, March 22.

"My dear Colonel Forde,—I was detained so late in court last evening that I was unable to write to you by last night's mail, as I intended. As I stated when I had the pleasure of seeing you yesterday, I took no note of the observations made by me at the late trial at Down, nor can I recollect with accuracy what they were; but of this I am certain, that I had not any intention of stating that I considered the magistrates of the county capable of administering 'partial justice,' which you mention as the inference drawn by some from the report of the trial. Any observations I made had reference to the case then at trial, in which, from the evidence before me, I was of opinion that a serious mistake had been committed in sending for trial some of one party accused of riot, when from the evidence before me it appeared that the other party were, to say the least of it, equally culpable. It may be, as you stated yesterday, that if the facts appearing at petty sessions had been brought before me, my opinion would have been different.

"My dear Colonel Forde, yours very truly,

"JAMES H. MONAHAN.

"Lieutenant Colonel Forde, M.P.,

"Carlton Club, London."

He thought it was only fair to the magistrates of Rathfriland that he should state very shortly the case as it came before them. The case, he would say, was brought before the Judge in a very bad manner; the evidence was not properly placed before him. There happened to have been two riots on that occasion, and the Judge, unfortunately, mixed them both up together. The case was that of "The Queen v. Edward O'Hare and others," and the following was a statement of the proceedings upon it at Rathfriland Petty Sessions:—

"On the 3rd of March, 1865, the adjourned case against Edward O'Hare, John Hillen, and John M'Evoy, for riot at Aughnavallog, on the 10th of February last, was proceeded with at Rathfriland Petty Sessions. For the prosecution it was proved that a riot had taken place at Aughnavallog, about one mile from Rathfriland, between half past five and six o'clock on that evening, and that O'Hare, Hillen, and M'Evoy were present, two of the accused being stripped to the shirt, and one of them using party expressions. That at same place, and about same time, a mob attacked and beat inoffensive individuals, some of whom were seriously injured. For the defence it was proved that previously to this, in the town of Rathfriland, a riot had taken place, in which were two party mobs throwing stones. No evidence was offered against any one of either party for the riot at Rathfriland, and the Justices of the Peace unanimously agreed to return to assizes informations against the three persons identified as being in a riotous mob at Aughnavallog that day."

He thought it would be seen that the Chief Justice had been misinformed in the matter, and he hoped that it might be a warning to Judges to be more careful in the observations they made at the different counties in their circuits. The advice tendered by The Times the other day to a young Lord who aspired to a seat in that House (Lord Amberley)—namely, to think twice before he spoke once—was, he believed, very applicable to the present case. The hon. and gallant Member concluded by moving the adjournment of the House.

COLONEL GREVILLE: I rise to second the Motion for the adjournment of the House in order to ask the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland if he will answer the question put to him by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kildare (Mr. Cogan) namely—whether he will lay on the table the Report he has received from the learned Judge upon this subject. The right hon. Baronet has read a passage from a letter, but he has not stated to the House whether that letter is addressed to him personally, or whether it is the Report forwarded by the learned Judge to the Government.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Colonel Forde.)

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I read a passage from a private letter. I do not think it will be advisable to produce the Report.

MR. HENNESSY: I think it is very advisable that we should have the Report. That report implicates not the magistrates of the county Down but the Law Officers of the Crown, and that is the reason why Her Majesty's Government will not produce it. The hon. and gallant Member, who has communicated with the learned Judge, has told us that he (the Chief Justice) had no fault to find with the magistrates. The fault rests with the Law Officers of the Crown. The informations were in their hands for several days, and they sent down two Queen's counsel and two junior counsel to prosecute the prisoners. It was a Crown prosecution, and not instituted at the instance of the magistrates, and consequently they were not to blame.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the proper course to take was, for the hon. Member (Mr. Hennessy) to give notice of moving for the production of the Report. Certainly it was very unusual to produce confidential Reports of the Judges. His right hon. Friend, when pressed for an answer, properly said he would not undertake off hand to produce a document which according to general rule was not produced. An arrangement was made to enable Members to call attention to questions on the Motion to go into Supply on Friday evenings, and that was the second time in which Members, though possessed of the power to bring forward their questions on the Motion to go into supply, moved the adjournment of the House for the purpose of doing so. He considered that that was contrary to the Rules of the House, and he hoped the practice would not be continued.

ARMY—THE WAR OFFICE.—QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished to ask, Whether the Government, on resuming Supply on the Army Estimates, propose to take Vote 18 before the House has in its possession the Report of the Committee which has inquired into the War Office?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that if it were the wish of the House that Vote 18 should not be taken till the Report of the Committee had been presented, he would not object to its postponement, although, of course, its postponement would be attended with some inconvenience.

EASTER RECESS.—QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, he would beg to ask the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, When it is probable the adjournment will take place for the Easter Recess?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I think, Sir, if the state of public business admits of it, the best course will be to adjourn as of late years on the Friday before Good Friday.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE IONIAN ISLANDS—PENSIONS TO OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he rose to put the Question of which he had given notice to the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Pensions assigned under Schedule B of the Convention of the 29th March, 1864, between Her Majesty and the King of the Hellenes, have been paid in accordance with that Convention, and whether Her Majesty's Government intends to take any steps for the security of the recipients of these Pensions by placing those British subjects who served Her Majesty under the late Ionian Constitution on the same footing as Pensioners of the British Crown? The subject was one which claimed the attention of the House, not only because of the great injustice that had been done to a large class of gentlemen serving under the British Crown, but because it appeared by some recently published papers which had been placed in his hand that the conduct of the Government during the cession of the Ionian Islands had been of a somewhat extraordinary character. It was only now by means of papers which had recently arrived in this country that they had become fully acquainted with the whole of the negotiations which had been carried on at the time of the cession. The House would agree with him that it was of the utmost importance that good faith should be kept by Government with those officers who took service under them. Nothing surprised him more at the time than that so important a step as the cession of the Ionian Islands should have been taken without exciting more than one short debate. The details of that measure, all the circumstances connected with it, were not brought before the House. The papers were doled out to them, and they were never in a position to discuss the question. But that was at an end; the Ionian Islands, to their great misfortune, were ceded to Greece; and an hon. Member had informed him that when he asked a resident how soon the people there had begun to repent the change, the reply was, "One quarter of an hour after the British flag was pulled down." But what he wished to point out was that a great injustice had been done to a number of persons. The officers in the late Ionian service were divided into two classes, distinguished by Schedules A and B. Those included in Schedule A were gentlemen who had been employed for a number of years, some dating back as far as 1828, others to 1836. Many of them had been fifteen years in retirement, enjoying their pensions, not as servants of the Ionian Islands, but of the British Crown. They had been appointed by the British Crown, and were as much servants of the British Crown as the Lord High

Mr. Baillie Cochran

Commissioner himself. These gentlemen had subscribed to the superannuation fund, which had amounted to £75,000, but which was taken possession of by the Government at a period of great distress in the islands. These gentlemen had not only a claim on the Government, but they were to be paid their pensions and guaranteed by the British Government. Schedule B comprised officers who served in the Ionian Islands at the time of the cession, and whom it was thought right to indemnify for the loss they sustained by being turned out of the position they held without any fault of their own. It did not appear that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had acted with perfect fairness towards these gentlemen. The officers who had pensions under the British Government previous to the cession of the Ionian Islands were permitted to hold any office in England under the Crown but not in Greece. When the question of cession was first mooted by the lamented Duke of Newcastle, he advised them to allow their pensions to be placed on the revenue of the Ionian Islands or Greece, because if so placed they would be enabled to hold office under the Crown. Two or three gentlemen, one a Consul at St. Petersburg, and another in Asia Minor, were then in the enjoyment of their pensions, and still employed under the Crown. There was a positive understanding between these gentlemen and the late Duke of Newcastle, and it was by the advice of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this understanding was broken. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: No!] The right hon. Gentleman said "no," but it appeared from the blue-book, published at Athens, containing the negotiation and correspondence respecting the cession, and which had only recently reached this country, that in an interview between Mr. Gladstone and the Greek Minister in London, the former declared—in reply to the application of the latter—that these sums should be charged on the British Exchequer—

"That Parliament would not vote a credit for this purpose; but he was of opinion that the amount agreed on for this object might be reduced; that the payment of the compensation might cease on any one entitled accepting a salaried office under the British Government."

And in accordance with this suggestion a proviso was inserted in the Convention of the 29th of March, 1864, and ratified in direct contravention of the promise made by the Duke of Newcastle and of the Ionian Statute Law, and without any previous intimation to the recipients of such promise. Therefore he was justified in saying that it was by the advice of the right hon. Gentleman that this breach of faith had been committed. The statement he had made to the House was made upon the authority of the gentlemen interested. One gentleman who was pressed by the Crown to take office in the Ionian Islands accepted office there upon the distinct promise that his pension would be secured to him. Two other gentlemen, who were known to the hon. Gentleman opposite, the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and who knew how much they had sacrificed in going to the Ionian Islands, had no idea at the time they accepted office there that the island would be ceded to Greece, and that thereby they would lose their pensions; but they went there with the positive understanding that they were in the service of this country. He could prove to the House that the Greek Government implored Her Majesty's Government not to press for these pensions being charged against them, for the simple reason that they were not in a position to pay them, their financial difficulties were so great. He thought the House would agree with him that that was an extraordinary fact. The justice of the claims of these officers had been fully admitted by Lord Russell. His Lordship said, "I must not leave these men unprotected. I must see that justice is done." On February 10, 1864, M. Tricoupi wrote to say that Lord Russell stated with regard to the Greek Government—

"We showed but little [gratitude to England for the great benefits she had conferred upon us in opposing a just indemnification to the English employés, who, without any fault on their part, lost a promising future by the cession of the Ionian Islands on the part of the British Government."

It was astonishing that Lord Russell did not see the proper way of meeting the claim—namely, by putting the pensions on the English Government. The Minister of Foreign Affairs at Greece (Mr. Delyannis) wrote to this effect—

"We cannot accept the proposal to indemnify individuals on account of loss of salary in consequence of the cession of the Ionian Islands, because such a principle is not based upon justice."

Mr. Scarlett, the English Minister, also wrote to say that he could not strongly support these clauses of the treaty, referring to the pension of these officers, but expressed his opinion that it was not the interest of Greece to dispute them so pertinaciously. Then, Mr. Delyannis proposed, instead of a pension, we should fix a sum for an indemnity once for all. Why was that not accepted? The despatches which he had been referring to clearly proved that the difficulty had been pointed out to the Government from the first. When he gave notice of this question two months ago, the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State telegraphed to Greece and made every effort to obtain the payment of these pensions, and the pensions were then paid; but he (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) believed he was right in saying that these pensions would not be continued by the Government of Greece. Owing, he believed, to the mismanagement of Her Majesty's Government, Greece was on the eve of another convulsion. He never saw such a state of anarchy as prevailed there at present. Was he not justified in asking the right hon. Gentleman opposite whether, considering the importance of keeping good faith with the servants of the Government, they would not declare that in future the pensions of these officers, who had served them so well, and had given up professions and emoluments in this country to do so, should not be guaranteed by this country in the future?

MR. LAYARD said, that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) had complained that the question of the cession of the Ionian Islands had not been fully discussed in that House; but, considering the interest the hon. Gentleman took in the question, it was strange that he did not bring some Motion forward on the subject and have it fully discussed. He would not follow the hon. Gentleman through the arguments he had adduced as to the policy of the cession of the Ionian Islands. He did not think the hon. Gentleman had made out his case—namely, that the Greek Government had justly protested against the payment of these pensions; or, at any rate, that it was a very great hardship to Greece, that upon the cession of the Ionian Islands, a most valuable territory, she should be saddled with the payment of pensions which had accrued to persons in the service of the Ionian Government and not in the service of the British Government. The hon. Gentleman wanted to know whether these pensions had hitherto been paid to the persons entitled to them. He could inform the hon. Gentleman that the pensions had been paid, and if the hon. Gentleman had waited another day he would have learnt from the papers, which he (Mr. Layard) had just laid upon the table, the reasons of the delay which had taken place in the payment. It would be seen from the correspondence that the delay partly originated in the fact that the Minister at Athens (Mr. Erskine) had been under a misapprehension as to the course to be pursued with reference to the periodical presentation of the list of pensioners to the Greek Government. Shortly after the lists were presented the pensions were paid. The hon. Gentleman had complained that the Government had not got early information on the subject, but that was in consequence of an interruption in the telegraph to Athens, which was still interrupted, and it was ten or fifteen days before they could get an answer to the inquiries which we had made. He (Mr. Layard) thought it was not consistent with the respect due to a foreign Government that we should make the charge of insolvency against Greece, and anticipate that these pensions would not be properly paid. They had hitherto been paid, and he trusted the Greek Government would show their good faith in paying them regularly. If that House were to say that the English Government were prepared to pay these pensions, it would not be an encouragement to the Greek Government to pay them. The hon. Gentleman was no doubt prompted to bring this matter forward. Two gentlemen had not received their pensions at the time the money was paid over to the British Minister, but one of these, Sir Patrick Colquhoun, was determined to be a martyr. That gentleman would not go through the regular forms for the purpose of obtaining his pension. Sir Patrick Colquhoun was an old friend of his (Mr. Layard), and with every respect for him he must say that he was not justified in taking the course he had taken. He (Sir Patrick Colquhoun) had come to the Foreign Office and claimed not only his pension, but also the interest on money, which he might have received at once by writing to Athens. He (Mr. Layard) thought it was hard both upon the Greek and English Governments that they should be accused of breaking faith to Sir Patrick Colquhoun because he would not take the trouble of going through the form which the other officers went through in order to receive their money, that of appointing an agent at Athens to receive it.

Mr. Layard

The hon. Gentleman had alluded to the case of persons who, having earned their pensions previously to the cession of the Islands, had since taken service under the British Government, and were declared to have thus forfeited their right to receive their pensions. No doubt this was a case of hardship, but hitherto only two persons had been exposed to that hardship. Both had been submitted to the Greek Government, and they had very properly agreed to pay these gentlemen their pensions. He had every reason to believe that these pensions would be paid in future regularly by the Greek Government.

MR. KINGLAKE said, the gentlemen to whom he was anxious that justice should be done were far distant from this country, and were not aware of any proceedings going on in that House with reference to them. He could not think the question raised by his hon. Friend (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) had been satisfactorily answered by the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. These officers had been invited by the Government in England to take service in the Ionian Islands, and it was a most miserable quibble to say that these officers were the servants of the Government of the Ionian Islands. They were employed by the Imperial Government, and when that Government thought right to bring to a close the period of service of these officers in the Ionian Islands, by withdrawing from the protectorate of those islands, the Government felt bound to give them a compensation, which had always been given in similar circumstances. The moral obligation was incurred not by the Government of the Ionian Islands, but by the Government of England. It was, he knew, perfectly competent for the Imperial Government to negotiate with the Ionian Islands and say when certain arrangements took place the English Government would be at a certain expense, and therefore the Government of the Ionian Islands should recoup the amount which the Imperial Government would have to pay by way of compensation to these officers. To hand the officers over to the Greek Government was to say, "We admit our moral liability, but will not give you our cheque, but that of a young friend of ours, and we hope it will be soon honoured." It turned out from the statement of his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Layard) that although the money had been paid this year, it had not been paid at the right time, so that the future satisfaction of those just claims in reality depended upon the precarious income of Greece. It could not, however, be fairly urged that these gentlemen ought to depend for their compensation, on account of being withdrawn from other careers, upon a precarious income. He could quite understand that when the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs answered for his Department, he felt himself bound to give that answer in a departmental sense, and he was not, therefore, astonished when his hon. Friend declined to give any guarantee to those gentlemen. He would, however, ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government whether he would allow a substantial claim of this kind to be defeated by handing over these gentlemen to a Government which might or which might not pay them, and whose finances, as we knew, were in a dubious state of solvency. He did hope that one way or another these gentlemen would receive an assurance that their claims would be provided for.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the speech of his hon. Friend was not founded upon any hardship which had accrued to these gentlemen since the cession of the Ionian Islands. It was in reality an objection to the arrangement under which that cession had been originally made. The question as to the pensions or compensations of those gentlemen was fully settled and considered at the time, and he did not believe that the House would be very much disposed to re-open a matter upon an argument which in reality should have been urged at the time when the original measures were deliberately taken. On that occasion this question was raised by an hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite, whom he perceived in his place, and the intentions of the Government which were distinctly announced met, as he regarded it, with the approbation of the House. At all events the House so far sanctioned the policy of the Government that Her Majesty's Ministers had no occasion to come to the House for a Vote of money after the decision at which the House had arrived. The time did arrive when the course of Government should have been challenged if that course were objected to, but that challenge was not made. His hon. Friend (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) had said that he wondered that the cession of the Ionian Islands had not occasioned more discussion in the House; but his hon. Friend should remember that the cession of those islands was not made in secret. The intentions of Her Majesty's Ministers were announced to the House at a very early date, and attracted a good deal of attention. If that cession, however, attracted less attention than it deserved, his hon. Friend, among others, was to blame, because it was competent for him to have expressed his disapproval of the conduct of the Government, especially as the matter was debated at considerable length. His hon. Friend who spoke last said that he felt convinced the noble Lord at the head of the Government would guarantee the payment of the pensions to these gentlemen when he perceived the justice of the case. That guarantee, however, it was not in the power of his noble Friend to give. A Bill could be introduced by the Government into the House with a view of effecting the object desired by the hon. Gentleman, and that would no doubt be done if the Government could see that such a course was necessary to procure justice to these gentlemen. But that was just what they were unable to see. No stratagem was more convenient in Parliamentary oratory than the introduction of a parenthesis of this kind into a sentence, because it enabled the speaker to elude the point upon which the whole thing depended. It was just that moral obligation, alluded to by the hon. Member, which had always been denied—or at least had never been admitted—by Her Majesty's Government. The argument of his hon. Friend really amounted to this, that this country, with her multifarious colonial relations, was bound to compensate every man who was appointed to an office in the colonies—in other words, that Lord Monck in Canada, or the Governor of any other of our colonies, had a claim upon the Consolidated Fund of this country if the colony which was indebted to him refused to perform its obligations in paying the salaries and allowances of these officers. That doctrine was an entirely new one. It had never been suggested to the House as an abstract proposition, and it would, he believed, be unwise to lay it down as such. He was not there to say what would be the decision of Parliament when any case of personal hardship was made out, but to grant the principle that a British subject appointed to an office abroad, dependent upon a Treasury different from our own, was to have a guarantee from our Government, could not, he believed, be claimed with any degree of justice by the person himself, and would certainly be incompatible with what was due to our own taxpayers. His hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) had brought a serious charge against the late Duke of Newcastle and himself, no doubt unintentionally, which would have had a considerable sting in it but for the kind and mild manner in which he had always introduced his views to the House. It would be inferred from his remarks that the Secretary for the Colonies of the time entered into a private engagement that compensation should be guaranteed to those officers on certain terms, and afterwards that he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) caused those terms to be overruled. For his own part he did not know that any such agreement had ever been entered into by the Duke of Newcastle, nor had his right hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, by his side, ever been made acquainted with it. He must say that he possessed so much confidence in the honour of the late Duke of Newcastle that he felt convinced that no such agreement ever existed. Knowing, as he did, that no man of higher or purer honour ever took service under the Crown, he could not help saying that it was perfectly incredible that that nobleman should have receded from any engagement of this kind.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, that he did not allege that the Duke of Newcastle had receded from his engagement. The change was made while the Duke was out of office by his successor, and the engagement to which he referred was overset, he repeated, on the advice of his right hon. Friend himself.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he had not described the words that had fallen from the lips of his hon. Friend. He had simply shown him what was the nature of the charges which he had made. His hon. Friend, however, was in error, because it was not true that the Duke of Newcastle was out of office when the change was made. The matter was completed during the administration of the noble Duke. If the Duke made any engagement of this kind it was his duty to have carried it out, and the statement of his hon. Friend, therefore, amounted to a charge that the Duke had receded from his engagement. He was quite sure that the hon. Gentleman never intended to make a charge against the Duke of Newcastle, and he was simply pointing out how, no doubt unintentionally, the hon. Gentleman's observations had that effect.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, that he had never intended to imply anything of the kind.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, his hon. Friend had not laid before the House the grounds upon which he asserted that the engagement he stated had been made. What the Government had done was this:—They had insisted that the Greek Government should grant to certain gentlemen pensions or compensation for loss of office, upon a scale which was totally unknown according to the habits, usages, or institutions of any country but our own. In fact, it was only England which showed such liberality. While enforcing the necessity of performing these engagements upon the Greek Government, the English Government thought it but fair that they should have such abatement as was provided by the law of this country in case of the resumption of office by these gentlemen under the Crown. They felt it was only right that they should insist on the rule which had prevailed in this country, that officers accepting offices in other Departments should only receive so much pension as was in excess of their salaries. That arrangement he believed to be a perfectly just one. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, not only did not admit the moral obligation which his hon. Friend had urged so strongly, but they were persuaded that the course which they had pursued was founded alike upon policy and principle, and any hon. Member who disapproved their conduct could avail himself of his privileges and challenge that conduct in the House.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he denied that the great number of these employés in the Ionian Islands were employés of the Greek Government at all. They were, in fact, employés of the English Government, as much so as any right hon. or hon. Gentleman in that House. They were taken from employments in England and placed in office in the Ionian Islands. The British authorities there did not require the consent of the Ionian Government in any manner whatever to their appointment, and, what was more, they were put under the regulations which prevailed in this country with regard to deductions from their salaries. A deduction was made from their salaries for the express purpose of furnishing retiring pensions. True it was that that fund had been taken possession of, not by the Greek Government, but by the Government of England. Most surprised, then, was he to hear the Chancellor of the Exchequer of this country repudiate the obligation on the part of England to pay these pensions. If there ever was a moral obligation to pay a retiring pension that obligation rested in this case on the English Government. It was the British Government that took possession of the fund formed from deductions from the salaries, and used it for their own benefit; and that was his answer to the right hon. Gentleman who now repudiated this moral obligation. He only hoped the Greek Government would fulfil its obligations. He was happy to hear that the pensions had hitherto been paid, and he trusted that the payments would continue to be made. As for the islands themselves, from his heart he pitied them. The anarchy existing there had been the result of the abandonment of our protectorate. Last year, at the end of the debate on this subject, he received an assurance, as far as any Government could give it, that if the Greek Government did not pay the pensions the English Government would, to some extent, recognize the claims. He had no doubt that this would be found in Hansard, and how the Chancellor of the Exchequer could now repudiate the moral obligation to pay went beyond his comprehension.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, that in the debate of last year it was made abundantly clear that the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in this matter was much looser than that of the Government of a great country like this ought to be. His hon. Friend (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) never intended to charge the Duke of Newcastle with having departed from any pledge which he had entered into; but there was reason to fear that the Members of the present Government were not so liberal as the Duke of Newcastle. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary knew perfectly well that there was a document at our Foreign Office which asserted in a manner which would hardly admit of contradiction that such a pledge had been given. He believed it would not be denied that a statement, made on the 18th of April, 1864, from which the following was an extract, was in the hands of the Foreign Office. [Mr. LAYARD: By whom?] The hon. Gentleman had better hear it read. This was the extract—

"When——saw the Duke of Newcastle on the subject of the pensions and compensations to be granted to British subjects, either as pensions acquired by them under the Ionian law, or as compensations for loss of office, or both conjointly, his Grace declared on more than one occasion, not only that the British Government would undertake to see these pensions paid, but pointed out the superior advantage of a Greek over a British pension, because it would be in addition to and tenable with any future employment under the British Crown, and he added that he would place his opinion in record on this point, in such a manner as should bind his successors."

The hon. Gentleman could easily ascertain who the person that made the statement was, for he (Sir James Fergusson) was not sure that he was at liberty to mention his name. The hon. Gentleman had twitted his hon. Friend with not having brought on the subject at the time of the cession of the Islands. But the reason was because the facts were not known to Parliament. It was only within a short time that the papers containing the correspondence of the British Government upon these points had been laid before the Greek Parliament, and the Greek Government maintained that to throw the burden upon them was in the first place unjust, and in the second place more than they were able to bear. Over and over again the Greek Government declared that they could not undertake to indemnify our officials. On the 31st of January, on the 1st of February, and again in March they refused to accept the obligation. And when at length they did decide on accepting the extraordinary expenditure, of the legality of which they said they were not convinced, they were unable to meet punctually the demands of the pensioners, or if they did meet them it was with great difficulty. Was it too much to say that, surrounded with difficulties as the Greek Government was, they would not for the future be able to meet the claims of those gentlemen? Were they, therefore, to be utterly thrown adrift and never to receive the payment which they had a right to expect? How could it be said that they had no claims upon us when there was in the Foreign Office a statement which distinctly showed that a pledge had been given to them?

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he had heard the Under Secretary of State for the Foreign Department with great astonishment, because the hon. Gentleman made no reference to the original appointments. Sir Patrick Colquhoun, Sir Charles

Serjeant, and one or two others, were most certainly officials of the protecting Power, their appointments being made under the Constitutional Charter of 1817. By Articles 4 and 5 of that Charter, the justices of the Supreme Court were to be appointed by the protecting Power, and paid, not by the Ionian Government, but out of a sum of money, amounting to £13,000 per annum, which was set apart out of the revenues of the Ionian Islands, and was paid to the protecting Power, not to the Ionian Government. These officers were appointed and dismissed by the Colonial Office of the protecting Power, and the Ionian Government had no power to interfere. These officials were therefore not the officers of the Local Government; they were not appointed by the Local Government; their salaries were to be paid by the protecting Power, and to that Power, therefore, they ought to look for their pensions. Neither the Ionian Government nor the Greek Government, to which the powers of the Ionian Government had been transferred, were liable for the payment of the retiring allowances. He said, then, that there was not only a moral obligation on England to see these pensions paid, but a legal obligation also. Did the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that those gentlemen would have taken office had they known that in a short time the Islands would have been ceded to Greece, and they themselves left to the tender mercies of the Government of a bankrupt kingdom? Of the right hon. Gentleman's comparison of these appointments with colonial appointments in general he would only say it was a quibble. There was no independent Member who did not admit the claims of these officers. He hoped that Her Majesty's Government would take them into consideration, and that justice would be effectually done.

DIGEST OF PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. W. EWART, in moving for a Select Committee on this subject, said, that hon. Members might well be forgiven for feeling a good deal of dread of blue-books, because of late years it had rained blue-books — Pelion had been piled on Ossa, and Ossa on Olympus. It had been sarcastically remarked that if you wanted to hide a question the best plan was to bury it in a blue-book—you might then defy anybody to excavate it. And if you were praised in a blue-book your fate was certain—

“Cum scriptore meo capsa porrectus aperta, Deferar in vicum vendentem thus et odores,
Et piper, et quidquid chartis amicitur ineptis.”

The subject had been repeatedly considered, not only by Committees of the House but by the House itself, and the desirability of such an arrangement as he was about to suggest had been universally admitted. In submitting the Motion on the paper he had in view two objects—one being the convenience of Members, and the other the diffusion among the people of sound information on political questions. The difficulty consisted in having two sets of blue-books, the one containing the original documents in extenso, and the other simply the substance of the information contained in them carefully abridged and condensed. There was at present an immense waste of public money in printing blue-books, which were for all practical purposes wholly useless—the public never looked into them, and their end was to find their way to the waste-paper dealers. One suggestion for preventing the useless accumulation of these blue-books was, that they should be stopped in initio, and abridged before they were printed. No doubt it was important to abridge as much as possible in this stage, but it was also important that too much should not be cut away. He believed that their librarian, Mr. Vardon, to whom hon. Gentlemen were so much indebted, did curtail these voluminous publications, to which Commissions of Inquiry seemed to contribute very largely. He believed that one of those Commissions had given in 39,000 questions, and on being expostulated with had said they had intended to have sent 80,000. Mr. Hume had devoted himself to the Printing Committee of the House of Commons, and Mr. Tufnell moved for a Committee with a view to circulate these blue-books among mechanics' and other institutions. Little, however, had been done, and indeed you could hardly expect that the members of these institutions should read with attention such ponderous volumes. On the other hand, efforts had been made by private individuals to provide condensed abstracts of these papers, somewhat similar to what he now asked for. He should much prefer, if possible, that it should remain a matter of open competition; but these abridgments, though executed by men of great talent, had not been successful in a pecuniary point of view. There was an able publication called The Parliamentary Record, by Mr. Charles Ross, which was exceedingly well arranged, and as well digested as a book could possibly be. He did not know whether the book was still issued, but while it was issued The Parliamentary Record was a very valuable publication. Mr. Toulmin Smith also issued a valuable publication, The Parliamentary Remembrancer, which gave much information as to current political literature; and Messrs. Smith and Elder published a third book, called The Annals of Legislation, which was edited by Mr. Leone Levi, was much consulted by foreigners, and was a most useful publication. Although, however, these gentlemen had devoted their time and talent to the work, he understood that, owing to their peculiar nature, they had not been successful in a pecuniary point of view. Mr. Hansard came under a different denomination. A certain number of copies were taken from him by the Government and distributed among the public offices, and this support, along with that of private purchases, enabled him to carry on his undertaking. Now he (Mr. Ewart) did not know for what use we had a statistical department of the Board of Trade if it was not to render service in such matters as this. This department issued yearly a valuable paper called the Statistical Abstract, which was known to and highly valued by foreigners as well as Englishmen; and if they were able to furnish so good an article in respect of figures, he thought they might furnish an equally good article in respect of facts. It was the opinion of the late Prince Consort that the statistics issuing from the various Departments should be combined and issued in a condensed form, avoiding the repetitions which now frequently occurred owing to their issue from different departments. He thought that the convenience of the Members of the Legislature would be greatly consulted by the issue of such digests as he proposed; and he thought also that if the English people were really to be worthy of the political franchise, they ought to be supplied with the means of political education, and with information which was now often unavailable in blue-books. He trusted that some assurance would be given that the Board of Trade was not so inert as people supposed, and would employ itself in the useful work he had suggested.

MR. KINNAIRD, in seconding the Amendment, reminded the House that two Sessions ago a Committee was appointed to consider the expediency of providing a compendious Record of Parliamentary Proceedings for the use of Members. The Home Secretary, Mr. Massey, the hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), and other Gentlemen of experience served upon that Committee, and after evidence had been taken a unanimous opinion was expressed as to the extreme inconvenience of the system under which these blue-books were now piled upon the House. Certain practical suggestions were then made—as, for example, that this House should procure the Journals of the Lords, which were now generally one or two years in arrear. An amazing amount of useless literature was at present forthcoming; but what was really wanted was some guide to current political literature, an alphabetical register of the publications and the business of the Session, giving the dates of each proceeding. The Report contained some very useful suggestions on this and other points; but nothing was done, and he hoped the attention of the Government would now be turned to the subject, and that the result would be some practical measure.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is expedient that a digest or abridgment of Parliamentary Papers and Blue Books be provided from time to time, and consolidated into one or more volumes at the close of each Session, under the authority of the Statistical Department of the Board of Trade, for the convenience of Members and for the diffusion of information among the public at large,"—(Mr. William Ewart,)

MR. J. R. YORKE, as a young Member of the House, thought that nothing was more depressing to the spirits and trying to the temper than the attempt to extract a few simple facts out of the mass of documents which now encumbered one's rooms. Last year he found that nearly 1,000 of these Parliamentary Papers were issued, containing upwards of 50,000 pages, at a cost of £67,000. It was lamentable to reflect what a large proportion of this expenditure might be said to be entirely thrown away, for the great mass of these volumes found their way to the waste-paper dealers. He would suggest that the large number of copies now printed in extenso were not necessary, and that if a small number were printed and deposited in the British Museum, the public libraries, and other places, so as to be readily accessible for reference, that would be quite sufficient for all public purposes. If a digest giving something like a history of the various matters to which the documents referred were provided, it would greatly further the convenience of Members, and would also effect a considerable saving of public money. If such a plan could be adopted, there arose the further question—by whom was it to be carried out? Supposing that the Government were to undertake the duty, he believed that in practice the fairness of the extracts given would be called in question. The undertaking would offer few temptations to private enterprise, as unfortunately but little public interest was exhibited in respect of public documents to hold out the prospect of a profitable return. For that distaste on the part of the public, the House probably had itself to blame for presenting facts in so repulsive a form as at present. Another suggestion was that the Speaker should be intrusted with the superintendence of the work; but he doubted whether the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair would be willing to add to his already arduous duties such a novel responsibility. The only practical plan appeared to be for the Government to follow the example of Hansard's Debates, and to guarantee to the publisher the sale of a certain number of copies, which would encourage private enterprise to undertake the task. It would, of course, be necessary that the work should be intrusted to competent hands, and if any particular person could be indicated, as well qualified for the duty, he might mention the name of Mr. Leone Levi, who for the last seven years had been conducting the Annals of British Legislation, a very valuable work. He thought the Motion was a very useful one, and he hoped the Government would give it their support.

MR. PEELE said, that as his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade wished to reserve himself for a question that was to come on later in the evening, he would say a few words upon the Motion. There was no doubt that, under certain circumstances, a work of the nature indicated by the hon. Member, well executed, and brought out promptly, would be an advantage, inasmuch as they would have presented in a portable shape the information now spread through voluminous Returns, but it could not effect any saving in the expense of Parliamentary printing. The hon. Gentleman desired to have an abridgment of Parliamentary papers; but that pre-supposed that the Parliamentary Papers were first printed. Even if the abridgment were to precede the printing, he should doubt whether it would prevent the necessity of printing in extenso all the documents that were called for by Parliament, or were presented by command. No abridgment could be made so authoritative as to dispense with the papers in full. It was possible that such a work as that proposed might have the effect of reducing the number of copies of documents that were printed; but that at present the Printing Committee of either House considered themselves at liberty in the case of subjects of minor and local importance to reduce the number of copies of papers to be printed. But had the hon. Gentleman considered how small a proportion of Parliamentary papers were of more than ephemeral interest, and were worth the labour of being abstracted? The House would remember that in respect of a considerable number of Parliamentary Papers—those relating to commerce—a most valuable abstract was already to be found in the Statistical Abstracts of the Board of Trade. There were also the copious Indices to Hansard, which were very well prepared. So that the Motion of the hon. Gentleman would apply principally to Foreign Office papers, of which it would be difficult to prepare a satisfactory digest. Then, supposing that such a digest was desirable, there came the question, by whom should it be prepared? It might be done under the authority of the House, by a Department of the Government, and reference had been made to the recommendation of a Committee which sat in 1862 upon the subject of another work, which was a digest of Parliamentary Proceedings. But there was a great difference between a digest of the Proceedings of Parliament and a work which professed to be an abstract of all the papers presented to Parliament, which was a far more difficult work. The Committee referred to recommended that the assistance given should be limited to a certain subsidy in aid of private efforts. The work of Mr. Leone Levi which had been mentioned was, no doubt, a valuable work, but it had not been a profitable undertaking in a pecuniary sense. An abridgment of Parliamentary Papers was also to be found in the Annual Register. All those works were, no doubt, deserving of public favour, but it would be a disagreeable task to select one to be supported by a public grant. As the hon. Gentleman's proposal now made varied from the Notice on the paper, he trusted that there was no intention to press it, but that the hon. Gentleman would be satisfied with the discussion which he had originated.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS suggested that the Government had the power of limiting the number of papers that were presented, and thereby of reducing the expenditure under that head. He especially referred to the class of "unopposed Returns," which were moved for and granted without attracting any notice, which cost sometimes large sums of money and great expenditure of time to prepare, and which, after all, were never read by anybody. An hon. Member might move at a late hour of the night for an unopposed Return, it was put and carried, and the whole proceeding occupying about half a minute; but the printing of the Return might cost £1,000. It was no argument against a digest of valuable papers to say that a vast number of the papers that were laid upon the table were useless.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY thought the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury had rather overrated the difficulty of complying with the suggestion of the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Ewart). At present they had annual Reports on the Post Office, Inland Revenue, Customs, Board of Health, and Poor Law Board, and these were most satisfactorily abstracted in Mr. Leone Levi's publication. What was really wanted was something like the abstract information comprised in Mr. Leone Levi's valuable work. Hansard, useful as it was, could not be carried on without a subsidy in the shape of a subscription for copies. Something of this sort might be done with regard to the suggested abstracts—at any rate, it was worth consideration.

MR. HENLEY said, the question seemed to be taking two forms. It was said that a great many Parliamentary Papers were printed that were useless; and then, on the other hand, it was proposed that somebody should have something for printing digests of these useless papers. But Parliamentary Papers, to be really useful, must be full. Suppose they had set a wise man to digest the Danish Papers. What would he have had to do? Would he have had to come to a conclusion upon them? In that case his digest might have lauded the Government or exonerated them. Again, when a Committee presented its Report, it recorded its conclusions, and perhaps they were arrived at by a very narrow majority, after numerous divisions. Then immediately hon. Gentlemen turned to the evidence to test the value of those conclusions. But were they to set some one to digest that evidence over again, perhaps bringing out a Report directly opposed to that of the fifteen gentlemen who had sat on the Committee? Unless they proceeded carefully they might get into a great deal of useless expense; they would be saddled with the same material twice over — once in extenso, and again in little. In talking about printing useless Parliamentary Papers, hon. Gentlemen forgot the multiplicity of subjects which engaged the attention of Parliament. The House of Commons was like a pack of hounds—one hunted one thing, and another hunted another; and they were not like a good pack either, for they would never go off together on one scent. Directly one took up a subject somebody else took up the other side; then they wanted all sorts of information, that they might pick out their points and battle over them, and by this means the truth was got at. No doubt the Statistical Abstract was a very valuable document, and it was prepared very much from Parliamentary Papers; but the principle of that Abstract would not apply to the Reports of Committees and Commissions, the printing of which was the chief expense. These abstracts might do for people who merely took a cursory view of things, but they would not be used as authorities, nor could they be put into anybody's hands to make them authorities. However well the digest might be made, whoever wanted an authority must go direct to the fountain head. He would give no opinion as to taking a number of copies of a publication, in order to assist private undertakings of works of this nature, but he hoped the House would not be deprived of the means of obtaining the information they now got from the blue-book.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART hoped that the Secretary of the Treasury would endeavour to carry out the idea of the hon. Member for Dumfries, which he thought was exceedingly useful and would be the means of diffusing a great deal of valuable information throughout the country. He would suggest that means might be found by restricting the number of blue-books and Parliamentary Papers now printed to what might absolutely be required.

MR. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE said, he had found Mr. Levi's publication of great use to him in following out the course of legislation, and he had no doubt that a digest of Parliamentary information would be of great utility; but he doubted whether a grant of public money ought to be made for preparing it. In 1854 a Committee had recommended that selections from the Parliamentary Papers should be presented to mechanics' and other institutions in the country; but it had been found impossible to make these selections on account of the voluminous nature of the papers. The House was bound to carry out the suggestions of the Committee. He thought this was a public view of the matter which the House might consider. The expense would be small, and the value immense. No one who had read the digest which had been referred to could say that there was any party spirit running through it. It was a wise way of giving the public the knowledge of the general course of legislation which Parliament was pursuing. If it was found that there was any party spirit pervading this selection of papers it would be open to the House to stop the small subsidy, and throw the matter into the market for others to undertake. He was sure this would be of great value, and he trusted the Government would not refuse it.

MR. W. EWART said, he would withdraw the Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE THAMES AND ISIS NAVIGATION. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. MALINS said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the Petitions of the General Committee of the Thames and Isis Navigation, and the Mayor and Corporation of the Borough of Wallingford, presented to this House on the 7th of March; and to put a question to the President of the Board of Trade relating thereto. He said the object of these petitions was to point out the present state of the navigation of the upper portion of the river Thames above Staines, and to show that the locks and weirs had fallen into a state of decay; and unless something was done the navigation of that great river would become a thing of the past. Since the establishment of railways the traffic of the

Thames above Staines had decreased; and of course the revenue had decreased. In the petition of the Commissioners it was pointed out that in 1845 their revenue was £14,000. In 1846 it fell to £11,000; and it had gone on diminishing year by year until in 1864 it only amounted to the insignificant sum of £3,097. The consequence of this was that it became absolutely impossible for the Commissioners to discharge the duties imposed upon them by keeping up the navigation of the river. He ought to explain that the part of the navigation of the Thames of which he spoke was not under the Thames Conservancy, whose powers stopped at the City stone, above the bridge at Staines. At that point commenced the control of these Commissioners, and it extended to Cricklade or to Lechlade, beyond which the river was not properly navigable. Along this line, between Staines and Lechlade, there were thirty-five locks, and of course weirs and other works, to be maintained, which were maintained by means of the revenue raised from tolls. The Commissioners had been empowered by various Acts to borrow to the extent of £100,000. Their present debt was £88,000. That originally carried interest at the rate of 5 per cent. They were obliged gradually to lower the interest, and now the interest had ceased altogether to be paid. The consequence was that the creditors who had lent this money were dissatisfied. Some of them wished to take possession of the navigation, and would, if anything could be made of it. But so far was it from being possible to make anything of it that the Commissioners in consequence of want of money, had been compelled to discharge all their workmen, and the river was unproductive. There were 170 miles from Staines to Lechlade in this state of decay, the locks and weirs from non-repair being almost useless. It was, therefore, to be apprehended that the water would no longer be kept within its proper channel, and that by floods and otherwise the river would be diverted from its present course and become a succession of deep pools and shallows. It was not only with reference to the navigation he was speaking, but with reference to the supply of water for the various purposes of life to which this river was applicable; and this being the river which communicated with London, the great metropolis of England, the question was whether the Government could acquiesce in the present state of things. He contended it would be a disgrace to England if they allowed this magnificent river and important water highway to fall into decay. He and many of the hon. Members present, including the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the hon. Members for the City of London, although he might not be aware of the fact, were ex officio Commissioners; and he thought they ought to sympathize with the acting Commissioners in their difficulties. But he was afraid none of the ex officio members of the Board had done their duty. The petition stated that the Commissioners were ready to do everything they could, but they could not find the funds. The question which he wished to put to the President of the Board of Trade was, whether he was prepared, on the part of the Government, to recommend the appointment of a Royal Commission, or a Committee, or to take any other step, with a view of remedying this lamentable state of things? Either private or public money must be found for the purpose. The Chancellor of the Exchequer shook his head at the suggestion of public money being found; but were the Government to see this great highway in a state of ruin for the want of a few thousand pounds? Mr. Leech, the Surveyor of the Thames Conservancy, in his Report stated that all the locks and weirs were falling into decay. A deputation which he had the honour to introduce to the President of the Board of Trade last summer stated that at that time £20,000 would be sufficient to put the whole in a complete state of repair, and that if an arrangement could be made with the old lockowners for a uniform rate of toll the revenue might be raised to such an extent as to be sufficient to pay the Government interest at the rate of  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, also to pay the creditors and the expense of keeping the navigation in repair. The Commissioners had a difficulty to contend with owing to there being certain private lockowners, who, though their locks were not used, under an Act of George III. were still allowed to charge the same tolls as they were entitled to receive when the traffic passed through their locks. The Commissioners had for several years past been trying to induce the old lockowners to reduce their tolls, and in June last they made another attempt at an arrangement based on a system of payment in one sum for all through traffic at greatly reduced rates. They obtained the assent of a majority of the owners, but the arrangement fell through because a small minority stood out. The revenue of the river had dwindled from £14,000 a year in 1845 to £3,000 in 1864, and in the present year it would probably be still less. The banks were rapidly falling into decay; and he wished to know whether the Government were prepared to take any steps to prevent the navigation from continuing in a state which was a reproach to the nation?

COLONEL KNOX said, that the locks in certain parts of the river were entirely gone, and if any serious flood took place it was impossible to tell what damage might not be caused to the various properties on its banks. A large portion of the water supply of London came from the works at Teddington, and they were now constantly precluded from working the mills on the banks of the Thames by the want of water. A great waste of water arose from the locks being out of repair and not performing the functions for which they were intended. That great water highway ought no more to be suffered to go into decay than any highway in the country. He made a suggestion last year which he thought worthy the attention of the Government and the House. The locks might easily be kept in good repair by means of a very infinitesimal rate, the fractional part of a penny in the pound, upon the property in the counties through which the river passed; and if the Government would bring in a Bill with that object he was sure it would meet with the approbation of all those counties, for it was essential to the water carriage of their coal, timber, and other materials that the navigation should be maintained. He trusted that if the Government would not take the matter into their own hands they would at least allow a Committee to be appointed to inquire into the subject.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that a deputation who had waited upon him at the Board of Trade had stated very much what his hon. and learned Friend had done, and they had informed him that the upper navigation of the Thames from Staines to Lechlade was almost in a hopeless condition, and that it would probably be destroyed unless something was done. He certainly thought that the navigation of the Thames was a very important matter, and that if it were possible it ought to be maintained, but it ought to be maintained like other navigations — namely, by the proceeds from the traffic. His hon. and learned Friend had stated that the railways had interfered with the traffic on the river, and that, in consequence, the income of the Commissioners had been brought down to virtually nothing, and that they were now unable to pay the interest on the money borrowed. But he would ask whether any steps had been taken for the purpose of enabling the river navigation competing with the railways? He believed that nothing had been done. The tolls now charged were of the same amount as of old, tolls too high to allow the traffic to increase and give a chance to a canal or river to compete with a railway. He believed that on the lower part of the river—from Staines to London—which was under the control of the Thames Conservancy Board—a very material reduction in the tolls had been made, and that the consequence was an increase in the tonnage over that carried before the construction of the railway. The Commissioners, in their petition, stated that if the works necessary were executed, the tolls which would be received would be amply sufficient to maintain the works and leave a surplus. No doubt the situation of the Commissioners was a very difficult one, and they could do nothing without the assistance of Parliament. They must come to terms with the old lock-owners, and they must make better arrangements in the management of the river. The Government would agree to the appointment of a Committee, who should inquire into the condition of the navigation of the river, and see whether any measures could be devised by Parliament to enable the navigation to be self-supporting. Nobody could tell what the produce of the tolls would be when some new system were adopted. He could not say that this Committee was to have the power of recommending that the navigation should be maintained at the public expense; but if it could be shown that there would be a fair and proper security for advancing money in a mode similar to that adopted in connection with public works, why of course that would be a different matter. He wished it to be distinctly understood that the Government would not consent to the appointment of the Committee with any understanding that there might be a recommendation that the river should be a public burden. He was sorry to say that he had been informed by competent engineers that the original construction of the locks was defective. They were so shallow that they would not admit barges passing through drawing a sufficient depth, that was, barges suited to carry cargo sufficient to be profitable. That was an unfortunate state of things. It was something beyond the mere question of keeping the locks in repair. However, as he had said before, the Government had no objection to the appointment of a Committee of Inquiry.

MR. HENLEY said, he was glad to hear that the Government were willing to accede to an inquiry, but thought it would be better that it should be conducted by a small Commission instead of by a Committee of that House. Such a Commission, with proper scientific aid, would obtain for them more valuable information than they could hope to get by a Committee, before which, he feared, they would only have persons bringing up a crowd of witnesses from Reading, Oxford, Wallingford, Merton, and other places on the river, all intent on establishing a case for their own particular localities. Full information on the whole subject was indispensable before they could have any sound legislation on that matter. A Commission would also be less expensive than a Committee. When they looked at the Thames in its course from Lechlade to the Thames Conservancy it would be seen that there were parts of the river which might be maintained as a navigation, and other parts which ought to be given up. Then there were conflicting interests, such as the old locks, the Commissioners locks, and the mills, to be considered. He believed that a Royal Commission, small in number, containing a due scientific element, would obtain a mass of information which would enable the House and the Government to come to a sounder conclusion than a Committee of that House, which must call before it a crowd of witnesses from the respective localities. He agreed with the President of the Board of Trade that the present was not a case for aid by public money. The navigation ought either to be self-supporting or ought to be abandoned, but if these interests were not to be kept up it became a question how they were to be let down. These works were maintained under Parliamentary sanction. All the magistrates of all the counties through which the river ran were, he believed, Commissioners, and they formed together a body as numerous, he supposed, as that House itself. The river was divided into districts, and now that the Commissioners had got no money the works were going to wreck and ruin.

Mr. Milner Gibson

Something must be done, and the Government might fairly be called upon to ascertain the facts by inquiry. If they would see the way to a remedy they would not only confer a great benefit on the public, but obtain a great deal of credit for themselves. He must, however, protest against the suggestion thrown out by an hon. Member of levying a penny in the pound on the counties for the maintenance of the navigation. The only effect would be to give a bonus to canal navigation against the railways. He believed that the transit from Oxford to London by this navigation occupied some six weeks, and even more, in the summer months, and that the cost was two or three times as much as was charged by the railways, which did the work in twenty-four hours. There were, however, parts of the Thames not near to railways where there was a heavy timber and coal traffic, and here the river navigation might be profitably kept up. If a Select Committee were appointed they must summon witnesses before them, and the expense of these witnesses would be paid by the public. The Commissioners, on the other hand, would go into the various localities, and would obtain the necessary information a great deal better and more cheaply.

MR. LOCKE said, that as one of the Commissioners, he concurred in the opinion that a Royal Commission was far preferable to a Select Committee, because it would be absolutely necessary to go into the districts and to see the locks and weirs in order to enable them to give an opinion that might be relied upon. He was told that the navigation from the Severn to the Thames was in such a state that the tolls alone between Bristol and London amounted to more money than the whole charge for the same goods by railway. If so, it was by no means extraordinary that the goods traffic on the Thames should be so much diminished. If locks fit for these barges were made, it would be still doubtful whether the river navigation could compete with the railways. If they could not, who was to pay for the works, and would it not be necessary that the counties should have a rate levied upon them? They were all agreed upon one thing, that the river must remain navigable and that the banks must be kept up. The question of the pollution of the river deserved attention in connection with this subject. If a Board composed of a smaller number were to be set up in the place of the present 800 Commissioners, its duty might be more clearly defined, and some regulations must be laid down for preventing the discharge of the sewage of towns into the river. That was as important a matter as the repair of the weirs. The whole question ought to be referred to the Commissioners, who should inquire and report the names of the towns and places the sewage of which now polluted the stream above Staines. The Thames Conservancy had recently been most advantageously remodelled upon the recommendation of a Committee of that House. They obtained an injunction to prevent the discharge of the sewage of the town of Kingston into the Thames. The sewage works were consequently stopped, and the question would shortly be argued before Vice Chancellor Sir Page Wood. If the learned Judge should declare the emptying of the sewage of Kingston into the Thames to be illegal, a first and important step would be taken for the purification of the river.

MR. NEATE said, he was very glad to hear that the Government recognized the great importance of this subject. It was, indeed, a branch of one of the most important questions that could be brought under their consideration. The Thames Commissioners were not a trading body, but they had discharged the duty cast on them, so long as they had the means, to the best of their power. When their revenue was taken from them, they were wholly unable to discharge that duty. Their revenue had been taken by the effect of past legislation. There ought to be an inquiry either by a Committee or a Commission. He did not think they would be able to dispose of the whole question without a Commission; but it might be very desirable to begin with a Committee, as the House already possessed a considerable amount of information on the subject. The most important and pressing point was to vote some money. They could very soon come to a Resolution on that subject. They wanted a considerable sum, and the body had undoubted claims on the public. They wanted an advance of money, not as a gift but by way of loan, and they would be able to offer for it very reasonable security. He thought the appointment of a Committee would be the best mode of dealing with the subject in the first instance.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that as representing one of the towns (Reading) immediately interested in this question, he wished to say a very few words upon it. The case, he thought, was very analogous to that of bankrupt turnpike trusts, which often came before the House. No doubt it involved a great many important questions. It was not only a question of traffic, but of the health of many of the towns on the banks of the Thames. He believed the traffic would be found to pay if the tolls were diminished. He had been informed that a part of the town of Reading was likely to be flooded if the locks were suffered to pass into decay. He trusted something would be done in this matter even during the present Session.

MR. WALPOLE said, he was not connected with any of the towns on the banks of the Thames, but as a member of the great community here, he could not but feel a deep interest in this question. It was, as stated by the hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate), a branch of the greatest question that could occupy the attention of the House in a social point of view. He could not compare it to the case of a bankrupt turnpike trust, because the burden of maintaining the highways had been thrown on parishes. He agreed with his right hon. Friend (Mr. Henley) that it would be hardly just to throw on the county rate the duty of keeping up the highway of the Thames. It was not the inhabitants of the county that benefited. The whole of the inhabitants of England benefited by the keeping up the highway of the Thames. The navigation of the Thames was only one part of the question. It was a very important part; but so long as there were railways it would be found impossible to compete with the quicker mode of transit, except for heavy goods. What had been stated by the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) was very important—what was to be done with the drainage which ran into the Thames above the metropolis? Even that was not the only question. He earnestly entreated the Government to consider the necessity of keeping the fullest supply of water they could in great navigable rivers for the use of the community. If they established water companies to supply London and the suburbs, they drew so much water away from the Thames, and were thus constantly diminishing the volume of water. He believed it would be found on inquiry that the effect thus produced on the river within the last twenty-five years had been very material, and if the volume of water was diminished they could not have that reserve of supply they required for the growing wants of the community. It became, then, a very grave question how the metropolis was to be supplied with water. He thought nothing but a Commission could properly deal with this question. The Commission should be small, consisting of scientific and skilful persons, well acquainted with the subject, who could inquire into the effect of the different works going on, draining, and the abstraction of water, the failure to keep up the weirs and locks; and when that information had been got they would be able to determine what was best to be done.

MR. AYRTON said, he thought the question was one very easy of solution. In former times the conservancy of the Thames had been intrusted to the Justices of the Peace for the county in Quarter Sessions, but below Staines that duty was intrusted to the City of London. But when the trade and commerce of the City increased to a vast extent, the duty was vested in a Board, which was empowered to keep the river in order from its mouth to Staines. What was required, then, was to make the Board more efficient as regarded that part of the river above Staines. If the Thames Commissioners could not perform their duty the matter should be put into the hands of the justices of the counties through which the river flowed, and they could appoint committees of conservancy to take care of the river, and among other things to see that it was not polluted by sewage from the towns on its banks. Unfortunately, the present Board, in consequence of a decision of the other House last year, had not all the powers with which the House had desired to invest it. The heavy tolls paid on the rivers led to the traffic being transferred to the railways as soon as these were established; but now that the rivers had lost their value for purposes of navigation it was clearly according to the principles of the Constitution to put them back into the hands of the local magistrates, who would form admirable Boards of Conservancy in their several districts. Having the whole of the county funds at their disposal, they could be at no loss for means, while the tolls which were obtained from the river would, of course, be applied in diminution of taxation. There was no great need for inquiry; some practical proposition of the nature he had suggested could easily be worked out, the local magistrates having the example of the metropolis before their eyes, and if energetic measures were taken in this direction, the river would soon be in the condition which everybody desired to see. He did not think the view taken by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) was quite accurate. Instead of having drank the Thames dry, the fact that it was lower at some seasons than it used to be was, he believed, attributable to the system of thorough drainage. Instead of rain being absorbed in the soil, and gradually filtering back into the river, it now passed off very rapidly, and there was no longer the same storage of water in the ground to maintain the supply which there used to be in old and exploded systems of farming. Some misapprehension, he thought, existed as to the actual state of the Thames. Some time ago he was talking to a farmer living on the banks of the river, who maintained that the water was not so good for agricultural purposes, and did not fertilize so much as it used to do. His reason was that the moisture, instead of soaking downwards, and carrying with it dust and soil to the river, passed straight down to the drains, and no longer carried with it the same amount of nourishment. The argument might be worth much or little, but anyone looking at the Thames could judge for himself as to the cleanness of the water. He had often been along its banks, and he knew that it was one of the finest and purest rivers flowing in the world. River water had the power of purifying itself to a very great degree, but alarm was created by people calling themselves chymists who got water and kept it in a bottle till it began to smell disagreeably, pursuing with regard to it a course exactly opposed to that of the Thames itself, the waters of which were always running. More mischief was done by a few stagnant ponds here and there along the Thames than by the whole volume of water in the river itself from end to end of its course. It was important to bear these facts in mind, because a great deal of feeling had been excited by the Report of the Royal Commission appointed by the Government. Royal Commissions always started a theory and endeavoured to get up a cry with the object of persuading the country that the Commission ought to be permanent and every one of the Commissioners in receipt of good salaries. Some Royal Commissions had been guilty of most extraordinary proceedings. One which took up the subject of experimental farming, when questioned as to the operations undertaken, admitted that they had been pursued regardless of expense; and he believed the Commissioners were now being sued by the landlords for spoiling the land which they professed to farm. These results were achieved, of course, with the object of instructing the country. The recent outcry about the state of the Thames he believed to be perfectly unfounded, but it was very desirable at the same time that the management of the river should be in good hands.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he must protest against the doctrine laid down by the last speaker that the management and conservancy of the Thames ought to be paid for out of the county funds. There were some counties of which the river only touched the border, and in which the ratepayers consequently could have little interest in the solution of this question compared with residents in the metropolis. He believed that there was no more important question for consideration than the drainage of river basins; and his conviction was that if such basins were properly drained they would be much more fruitful, and that the public health would be promoted. The cost of such works, however, should not fall upon the county rate, but upon the inhabitants of the district drained.

CANADIAN RAILWAYS.—QUESTION.

MR. AYTOUN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is the intention of the Government to ask the sanction of Parliament, during the present Session, for a guarantee of a sum of money required to complete the railway from Halifax to Quebec. Even if the Government had no such present intention, he should like to know the reasons which were considered to justify such a guarantee at this or at any other time. He was induced to ask the question because he was informed only a few months ago that surveys for the purposes of the proposed line were going forward. In order to complete the line from Halifax to Quebec, he believed that 400 miles of railway must be carried through a most difficult country, in which the hills were composed of rocks, and, the rivers being numerous, engineering difficulties of magnitude presented themselves. It being tolerably evident that the works never could prove remunerative, it became important to ascertain on what grounds the Government imagined that a guarantee might be granted hereafter. Two reasons had been given for the guarantee in the correspondence — one that it would be useful for commercial purposes, and the other that it would be useful for military purposes, by carrying troops on their way from this country to Canada. The line, however, passed through a strip of the country between the St. Lawrence and the United States sixty miles long and thirty-five broad, so that the railway would be within two days' easy march of the American frontier; and therefore he could not understand how the line could be useful for military purposes. For commercial purposes it would be useless for six months in the year, because it could not compete with the St. Lawrence when that river was open to navigation; and he had been informed by an engineer who knew the country that such a line could not pay its working expenses. Why should we guarantee money to make a line to carry our goods to Canadian Custom Houses, where they would be more heavily taxed than they would be on entering France. It was only by asking questions upon isolated subjects like this that the House was able to ascertain in what direction the policy of the Government was tending. He asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it was the intention of the Government to ask the sanction of Parliament during the present Session for a guarantee of a sum of money required to complete the railway from Halifax to Quebec, or whether the idea was abandoned, and upon what ground, and if hopes were still held out to the colonies that ever such a guarantee could be recommended by the Government of this country? He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would also state upon what grounds he thought such a guarantee could be defended.

MR. CARDWELL said, the whole of the information upon this subject was already on the table. It must be perfectly well known to his hon. Friend that the greatest interest was felt in the North American Colonies in the completion of the communication by railway between Halifax and Quebec. He must know, also, that proposals had been made by the different Colonies, and the Duke of Newcastle, in the name of Her Majesty's Government, entered into certain engagements which were to be carried out upon certain conditions being fulfilled by the colonies. The whole of the correspondence referring to these proposals was upon the table. If, within a period of about two years, according to the terms of this correspondence, the colonies should come forward and fulfil their conditions, he (Mr. Cardwell) should feel it his duty, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, to fulfil the obligations which Her Majesty's Government had contracted, and make a proposal to the House, and he hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. Aytoun) would think that the proper time for stating to the House the reasons for that proposal would be when the period arrived for making it. As at present advised, he (Mr. Cardwell) had no intention to make any such proposal in the present Session of Parliament. At the same time, he must guard himself to this extent. His hon. Friend knew that when the conference at Quebec proposed to adopt that most desirable scheme, the union of the provinces of British North America, one of the conditions which were kept in view was the completion of the intercolonial railway. Her Majesty's Government, in giving their cordial approval of the scheme of the confederation, had given also their cordial approval to the Resolution with regard to the railway. If the colonies put themselves into a position to complete the railway the time would come when Her Majesty's Government would be called upon to fulfil their engagements. When the time arrived, however, he should be perfectly ready to state his reasons to the House for the proposal.

QUESTION.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, if he will promote a Labour Ordinance for India, or certain parts of India, similar to that now in force in Ceylon; and if he will cause to be remedied the great want of roads in the important district of Wynaad? The tea and coffee plantations in India had become a most important branch of industry, and an increasing amount of revenue was being obtained from them to this country. The planters in India, however, experienced a difficulty which was not felt in other of Her Majesty's colonies. There was no proper law existing between master and servant in that country, and the planters had no power to compel labourers to keep their contracts. When the planter in Ceylon brought his Coolies from India, as he constantly did, he knew exactly what his expenditure would be, and he could compel the labourers to perform their contracts; but, strange to say that in India, where there were millions of acres of magnificent land lying waste, with her population going east and west to cultivate land in other countries, there was no labour ordinance to give security to the capitalist. When an Englishman went out to India and bought an estate for the purpose of cultivating it, he found, after going to the expense of gathering labourers from various places on that vast continent, that upon any day they might all leave him bodily, and there was no law to protect him. A meeting of the planters of the southern districts of India had been recently held upon this subject of labour ordinance, and they were unanimously of opinion that the labour ordinance which existed in Ceylon, and which had worked so well for the last twenty years, ought to be extended to India. When a gentleman in India invited a guest to dinner, the butler came in—not to announce that the dinner was ready, but that the cook had resigned. This was a very serious question. A planter might have 200 or 300 labourers, and he would find some morning that they had been bribed, and had gone to gather in some other person's crop. There were 1,000,000 acres in the south of India upon which tea and coffee might be grown; each acre would cost £100 to bring it into a proper state of cultivation, so that £100,000,000 of capital might be well employed in that part of India alone. The profits of the planters in the southern districts were represented at about 50 per cent, and as there was a deficit in the exchequer of India, he thought it would be a matter of interest to the Secretary of State for that country to encourage as far as possible the expenditure of capital in India. English capital and English energy were bid for in every part of the world, and they were taken to America, Australia, and every other part of the civilized and uncivilized world except India. Considering that the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Wood) would have in the course of a month or two to announce a deficit in the Indian budget, it would surely be worth his while to compete a little for that English energy and capital which went everywhere except to India. It was surprising that a labour ordinance had not been introduced into India long ago. In many parts of the country the planters were leaving for want of that support which the Government had it in their power to give them. The local governors in India dismissed all complaints in a very summary manner, as they knew their superior would not find fault with them, and that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State was many thousands of miles off. Nor was he particularly well disposed in favour of a European population in India, and the consequence was that the revenues of the country had not been so productive as they ought to have been, and the land remained to a considerable extent untilled. The meeting of planters to which he had referred was also unanimous as to the want of roads in the district. This had been a want felt for the last ten or twelve years, and they had always been assured by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India that roads were being made. Roads were always being made, but, somehow or other, not a single road had been completed. He could not understand how it was that such a want of energy should be displayed by the authorities in India, or why they should so neglect those sources of wealth which were open to them. It could not be because they had an overflowing treasury, for when his right hon. Friend paid off somewhat too prematurely two millions of Indian debt he little, in all probability, anticipated that he would have to come down to the House of Commons and announce a deficit in the course of the present Session. He might, however, have paid off that debt to the extent which he had done, had he only availed himself of the inexhaustible resources which India offered. He seemed to think, however, that there was some undefinable danger in expending British capital in India, and the result was that India remained unexplored, and the Indian Exchequer unreplenished to the extent which otherwise might be expected. A deficit existed in the Indian revenue. He believed that deficit would be diminished by the construction of reproductive works such as those which he then recommended. There were men who spent forty years of their lives in India, and who returned from it quite fresh, and he therefore saw no reason why the district to which he referred should not be colonized by Europeans, if the matter was only taken up by the Government in a proper manner. Such colonization had answered perfectly well in Ceylon, but, be that as it might, the waste lands which his right hon. Friend had promised should be sold had been for some inexplicable cause left unbought. He should like to know what stood in the way of the sale, for it appeared that in Assam a considerable portion of land had been purchased. Those were all matters which deserved the most serious consideration of the Government, and he hoped they would receive their deliberate attention.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, his hon. Friend urged him to incur a very considerable expenditure with a view to increasing the Indian surplus or diminishing the deficit. He could not, however, see how that object was to be attained by heavy expense for the construction of the roads which he advocated. He (Sir Charles Wood) admitted that the execution of the roads referred to was most desirable and necessary, and regretted that they were not more rapidly made. He believed that the roads had been made piecemeal, and he feared they were not well done—but orders had been given which he trusted would remedy that evil. He so far concurred with his hon. Friend that after the Report of Sir W. Denison, who had gone out to India last autumn, he had given instructions that roads, which he quite granted were very much needed, should be proceeded with in a more systematic way, and should be completed within a certain time. With respect to the coffee and tea districts, he found that there was an increase of about 2,000 tons a year in the production of coffee, and that the Assam tea, the production of which also was, he believed, on the increase, commanded a very good price in the London markets. His hon. Friend, however, adverting to another subject, complained that there was no law in India placing on a proper footing the relations between master and servant; but the fact was, that the question having been considered by the Law Commission in this country it had been placed upon that footing which the most able jurists deemed to be the best. Beyond that, the question of importing labour from one part of the country to another had been carefully considered with reference to the tea districts of Assam, for the introduction of labour into which a special Act had been passed two years ago. He regretted, however, to say that the result had not realized the expectations which had been formed, owing to circumstances over which legislation had no control. It should, in dealing with the subject, be borne in mind that the introduction of labour into small islands like the West Indies or

Ceylon, and the control of the arrangements for the Coolies, was a comparatively easy matter; but that when labourers were brought into a vast and perfectly wild country, to the sort of life prevailing in which they were unaccustomed, those regulations were attended with considerable difficulty. In the former case the labourers were easily placed under a system of supervision which in the latter they naturally became much less manageable. Into the particular district of Wynnad almost all the labourers came from Mysore; and, as they generally went there only for two or three months, that permanent sort of contract to which his hon. Friend alluded could not well be established. They regarded their new employment only as a temporary matter, from which they returned to their own homes as soon as the coffee harvest was completed.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR observed, that all he said was that a law ought to be passed under the operation of which a servant could not, as at present, leave his master the very next morning after he had engaged to enter his employment. He would have a servant, if he failed to keep his contract with his master in India, punished by imprisonment in the same way as in Ceylon and other colonies of the British Empire.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he understood his hon. Friend to have cited the case of Wynnad, and to have contended that a law with regard to labour similar to that which prevailed in Ceylon should be introduced there with the view of producing similar results. The circumstances under which labour was obtained both in Ceylon and the West India Islands was altogether different. The experiment had been tried in Assam, where a special law had been passed authorizing a system of Coolie labour precisely analogous to that which existed in Ceylon, and entire failure had been the consequence. Indeed, the operation of the law, so great were the cruelties practised under it, amounted almost to enforced labour. In reference to the deception practised on Coolies, he would read the following extract from a letter of the Commissioner of the Decca division to the Secretary to the Government of Bengal:—

“The deception lies in this, that a Coolie from the upper part of India has no idea of the country to which he is going when he enters into his contract in Calcutta, and the utter wretchedness of life in a plantation only opens to him when he reaches his destination. He naturally tries to escape, and the planter in his duty to himself and his employers of course tries to prevent him, and as the planter has a contract into which the Coolie is supposed to have entered voluntarily he is not likely to listen to the Coolie's plea of ignorance."

If these poor fellows complained to the magistrates they were treated as if they had absconded. The existing state of things was thus described by Deputy Commissioner Cachar's assistant—

"But in too many gardens the labourers are flogged with frightful brutality, and for offences of the most trifling description."

He would not now go into details as to what took place under the management of these people. He would simply read the following extract from a communication made by a magistrate of great experience:—

"The magistrate was opposed to the maintenance of the Act, on the ground that the power given by it was liable to be much abused, so as to become a powerful engine for enforcing slavery."

The object of all this was to introduce a modified system of what, to use the mildest terms, might be called forced labour. The people of America, in going into the back-woods, had no necessity for legislation to enforce labour, as they were able to hold out sufficient inducement to procure the services of people willing to work for them. He believed it would be found that kind treatment and good wages would be far more effectual in keeping the labourers on the estates than the enforcement of any system of pains and penalties which could be suggested.

ARMY—DEPOT BATTALIONS.

EXPLANATION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, before you leave the Chair, Sir, I wish to say a word or two in explanation of something I stated a few nights since in reference to the subject of Depot Battalions, because I regret that what I then said should have occasioned some misapprehension in the minds of the Inspector General of Infantry and of some of the officers in command of these battalions. I said on that occasion that I believed that officers in command of regiments generally preferred that young officers and recruits should join the head-quarters of their regiments at once, instead of going first of all to the depot battalions, because, when they joined their regiments, they had frequently to spend some little time in unlearning what they had previously acquired at the depot. Now, I did not in the least mean to say that recruits or young officers usually learnt anything at the depôts which was in any way injurious or contrary to the principles of the drill to which they would afterwards be subjected. All I meant was that regimental officers generally had their own system, and that they liked their recruits to fall into that system as soon as possible. If an absolute uniformity of drill and discipline prevailed in the British army, then the depot battalions or some such system would be necessary, but in the ordinary relations of our army such absolute uniformity does not exist. Therefore, without in the least degree discrediting the exertions of the Inspector General of Infantry and the officers in command of the depôts, I think that the efficiency of the British army will not be injured by the abolition of the depot system. I only wish to state now that nothing could be further from my intentions, and from the opinions of the Secretary of State and the Commander-in-Chief, than to impute the slightest fault to the Inspector General of Infantry or to the officers in command of depot battalions, because I believe that they are not only most excellent officers but that they admirably discharge the duties of their office.

CANADA—DEFENCES OF QUEBEC.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD ELCHO said, that he had given notice of a Motion in Committee of Supply to call attention to what was reported to have been said in the Canadian Parliament relative to the Vote for the defences of Quebec. He had been told as a matter of form he could not bring on the Motion in Committee of Supply, and that it would be convenient for him to do so on the Motion for going into Committee. It had been suggested to him that as it was an important subject, bearing, as it did, upon the whole question of our defences, the opportunity for bringing it before the House would be on the bringing up of the Report on the Votes which they were to consider that evening. As he understood that there was no objection to this course, he should call the attention of the House to the subject on Monday evening next, if the Report were brought up at an hour sufficiently early to enable him to raise a discussion on the subject. If the Report, however, were not brought up until late,

he should give notice the first night on going into Committee of Supply.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY considered in Committee:—

(1.) Original Question again proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £811,400, be granted to Her Majesty to defray the Charge of the Superintending Establishment of, and Expenditure for, Works, Buildings, and Repairs at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1888, inclusive."

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he wished to learn from the noble Marquess the reasons which induced the Government to increase their barrack accommodation while they contemplated a reduction in the number of our troops. He perceived that there was an Estimate for the purchase of Warley barracks. Those barracks were sold to the East India Company, and he wished to know whether they were to be purchased back from the Company, and, if so, whether at the same or at an increased price. There was also an item for the purchase of land and additions to the infantry barracks at Windsor upon which he should like to receive some information. Those barracks were only required for the accommodation of Her Majesty's Guards. But as there was to be a reduction in the number of men in the battalions of the Guards, and as the barracks were considered large enough for that portion of our army when they were maintained at their full strength, he wished to know why additional accommodation was now required for them. There was an item, too, for the conversion of Haslar barracks into a hospital. He never knew any barrack that was more unfit for conversion into a hospital than Haslar Barracks. The expense would be £7,500, and he saw no necessity whatever for this step. Under the head of Woolwich a sum of £26,000 was taken "for erecting stabling for the military train and for converting the garrison hospital into a barrack." He should like to know what would be the cost of each of these operations, and what troops the hospital, when converted, was to receive. He regretted that Parliament had given its assent to the erection of a new hospital at Woolwich; because the old hospital had been considered to afford ample accommodation for the sick of the garrison, even in times when the amount of sickness was above the present average. Then as to items abroad. Under the head of Bermuda there was a sum for the defences of the dockyard and for the naval anchorage. He remembered the importance of that item being pressed on the House, and no one who knew the importance of these defences could doubt the advisability of granting the money now asked for readily. He found that £35,000 was to be voted in the present year, and a much larger sum hereafter; but if there was a pressing urgency for the completion of the defences of Canada it was still more necessary that Bermuda should be put in a good state of defence, so as to be able to receive and protect our vessels in case of damage. He thought it behoved the Government to press these works forward with as much zeal as the works in Canada. Then there was a sum of £10,300 for officers' quarters at Gibraltar. They ought to know for what these quarters were required. Then there was a Vote for officers' quarters at Fort Ricassoli, at Malta, and some explanation ought to be given of that Vote. For the defences of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, the total Estimate was £190,000, of which £45,000 had been expended, and £35,000 was to be taken for the ensuing year, leaving £110,000 to be hereafter voted. These were works of vital importance, and ought to be pressed forward with all possible speed. Would the expenditure of £35,000 render these colonies defensible, or would it only go towards making the defences complete at some future day? The mere collection of stones and other materials would do little or nothing for immediate defence. Money enough ought to be taken to enable those materials to be applied to defensive purposes at the earliest period. The Government ought to take as much money as could be rendered available for the progress of the fortifications between this time and the corresponding period of next year. It had been said that there was a scarcity of skilled labour; let that be supplied by sending out some companies of engineer soldiers which are composed almost exclusively of artificers. The defences of Mauritius were so nearly completed that it would have been as well to have taken this year the £19,000 which was needed to finish them, as the £10,000 which the House was asked to vote. Upon the defence of commercial harbours we have already expended £154,000, leaving with the £10,000 asked for this year £280,000 to be spent. The House ought to know whether the Government intended to lay out the whole of that sum upon the works originally contemplated; and especially what they intended to do at such harbours as Newhaven—which the Duke of Wellington described as one of the most important points along our coast as a harbour for gunboats, occupying as it does so important a position immediately opposite the coast of France. As to the Clyde and the Tyne, he regretted that they should be left so defenceless, for in case of war, if our fleet were worsted, there would not be room to refit them in the Government basins and docks of the Channel, but they would have to be taken into the commercial rivers or into the Medway. He should be glad to hear something from the noble Marquess as to the intention of Government with respect to these rivers.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, that in referring to the item of £10,000 for stabling of a more permanent character than that at present existing in camp at Aldershot, he wished to know whether Government intended to make any change with regard to that military station. Nothing could be more useful than to have a camp of instruction during the summer. But it was the universal feeling among the officers of the army that a sufficient amount of training for the troops might be obtained by placing them under canvas during the summer months, without compelling them to undergo the inconvenience and discomfort of living in huts during the winter, especially considering the short period the troops had to remain in England. The hardships undergone by the soldiers at Aldershot were regarded as one of the greatest objections to a military life; and, therefore, he was desirous of knowing whether it was the intention of Government to perpetuate the occupation of Aldershot, as would appear to be the case by their proposal to erect permanent stables there. He further asked to be informed why the general commanding the forces at Aldershot was obliged to rent a house two or three miles away from the camp, while there were three empty huts in its proximity suitable for his accommodation, reserved for the use of high official personages. He thought it a pity that the commander should not live on the spot, for, to compare the practice here with that of France, he (Sir Harry Verney) had visited the camp at Chalons, and not only did the general live within the camp, but the Emperor stayed there when he paid the army a visit. He could not agree with the hon. Gentleman who had objected to the erection of the Military Hospital at Woolwich, as he regarded that building as being one of the greatest boons to the army. So far from its being unnecessary it was a fact, that at the time when it was decided to build that hospital, the invalids were living in tents around the other hospital, from want of accommodation. The sanitary condition of the army was now so very much improved that there was reason to expect that in future the average would only be 4 per cent of sick in hospital. It was now between 3 and 4 per cent, whereas it used to be between 6 and 7 per cent, and at that time the authorities required provision to be made at the rate of 10 per cent. The Herbert Hospital at Woolwich, together with Netley, would go far towards perfecting the general hospital system, and he was happy to find that it was intended to erect a third at Devonport. With regard to the defences of Canada, he should like to know whether Colonel Jervois's plan had received the approval of that able officer Sir John Burgoyne. The army felt that any system of defence which met with Sir John Burgoyne's approval must be one of the greatest value and importance.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that he objected to the system adopted by the War Department of increasing the amounts originally voted by the House for specific works by certain additional sums which, as no notice was given of them, might be passed over without due inquiry. He also objected to the throwing away £3,000 for improving the defences of the Tower of London, which could be riddled through and through by guns from batteries placed above them, say at the Trinity House, which were exposed to musketry fire from every store, and St. Katharine's Docks, and which could not exist an hour if attacked by modern artillery. He had himself some years since, when Clerk of the Ordnance, with the assistance of the Secretary at War, put a stop to these ridiculous works. He did not know whether barracks were wanted there, but he was glad to see expenses were to be incurred for drainage and other works at Gibraltar, which he trusted would include the supply of water to Point Europa, where some years since the soldiers were compelled to buy it.

He also called attention to the insufficient hospital accommodation at Bermuda, where in 1853 great mortality had been caused by the yellow fever. Although the attention of Government was then called to this fact—by a special Report forwarded to the War Department condemning the hospital and suggesting various sanitary improvements—no steps had been taken to alter the state of things, and the result was that the disease had again broken out a short time since, when no less than 100 men were lost out of the regiment stationed there. Out of a total expenditure of £800,000 for the defences of the Empire, only £37,000 was devoted to the defence of Ireland; and yet Ireland was called on to pay more than her proportion of the £5,000,000 raised for fortifications. Would it be asserted that in case of war Ireland was not to be defended, or that Ireland was indefensible, were America to attack us? Was it to be doubted that Ireland was the point where she would attempt invasion? In the French war Ireland had been attempted at more than one point. At Bantry Bay the army of Hocke had only not succeeded, and yet all the fortifications for its defence were mouldering or in ruins, while sums were thrown away in erecting useless batteries merely for Volunteers to practice gunnery. He might ask, was Ireland to be considered a part of the Empire, or to be delivered to an enemy in time of war? In that country they would not trust the militia with the custody of arms, nor were Volunteers to be enlisted—yet he well knew, and the Government could not deny, the most distinguished officers commanding in Ireland had made Reports to the Government of the necessity for better defences in that part of the Empire. He hoped the noble Marquess would direct the attention of the Secretary for War to this among other points that had been mentioned in the course of the discussion on the Army Estimates.

COLONEL DICKSON said, that he concurred in the remarks which had been made as to the enormous sums spent at Aldershot. There had never been any system more mismanaged than our camp system, and for our army it was one of the greatest curses that had ever existed. There was one point which particularly struck him in the Army Estimates year after year, and that was the increase in the establishments. Great credit had been taken for reductions, but the reduction in the Army Estimates for the year had not been caused by any economy in the Departments, but simply by a reduction in the number of men, because he believed we could not get them. In the present Estimates there were items that did not appear last year. The charges for the allowances to three officers of the Royal Engineers, temporary draughtsmen, &c., and the establishment of clerks at the War Office, exceeded by nearly £2,000 the charge of last year.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Before the noble Lord answers the various inquiries that have been put to him, I wish to ask him a question with reference to the items charged in the Estimates for the defences of Bermuda and Halifax. I find both in the Army and Navy Estimates an unusual number of Votes of the greatest possible importance to the defences both at home and abroad. The Estimates, on account of which these Votes are to be taken, include in the aggregate a very large sum of money, especially for our home defences; but I find that in almost every case insignificant sums only, comparatively speaking, are taken for the present year. And I cannot help regarding with some suspicion the motives of the Government in asking this year for portions of those Votes, so entirely insignificant both with regard to the magnitude of the objects in view and with the total sum to be expended. A worse or more unworthy policy I can hardly imagine than that when a Government has decided that a large sum ought to be expended in constructing important works for the defence of the country—and they have no reason to suppose that Parliament will take exception to them—they should be spreading the Votes over a great number of years; and I can suppose no other reason for anything so unprecedented of itself than timidity of swelling the Estimates for the current year. It is both unwise and impolitic, and there can be no doubt that a desire to keep down the expenditure is the reason for proposing so small a Vote for the defences of Canada. I now find there is a Vote of £35,000 for Bermuda, and also a Vote of £35,000 for Halifax, and what I wish to ask the noble Marquess is, whether or not he is prepared to state upon his official responsibility that these two sums are as much as can be properly expended in the current year? If he is not prepared to do that, I think the Government are failing in their duty in not asking for a larger sum. I will accept the noble Marquess's assurance in the face of Parliament on his official responsibility that more than is asked for cannot be expended in the current year, but if he cannot give that assurance, why then I say that the Government are failing in their duty in not asking for a larger sum.

MR. AYRTON thought that the Government was to be commended for not making a larger demand for those works. It appeared to him that the course they had taken was a very natural one, especially in the last Session of a Parliament. The Government would shortly have to account to the constituencies, and therefore it was natural that at the present moment they should be more than usually mindful of the public interest. The Government were not to be blamed for not proposing to expend more on these very unsatisfactory establishments abroad, in order to gratify hon. Gentlemen opposite.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that with reference to the "allowance to those officers of Royal Engineers especially employed," increased from £766 last year to £1,150, it had been caused by the fact that this year we had undertaken new works at Bermuda, in Canada and at Halifax. For the same reason there was a charge for additional draughtsmen who must be employed at the commencement of those works to prepare the plans necessary for the contractors. It did not follow that they would be employed during the whole progress of the works. The increase in the Vote for clerks at the War Office was occasioned by the transfer of those charges from Vote 18 to this Vote. Objection had been taken to the Vote of £60,000 towards the purchase money of Warley Barracks, which formerly belonged to the Indian Government. It was resolved at the amalgamation of the Indian and Imperial armies to take those barracks for the Crown. He could not give the former history of these barracks, or answer the question whether they had been originally built by the Indian Government, but the price paid was arrived at by a proper valuation made by competent persons. Some remarks had been made upon the item for the reform of the eastern defences, Tower of London; but, as the Vote was only £2,000—the residue of £11,500—to complete the work, it was hardly worth while to criticize it. It was not pretended that the work ever would be of the least use for defence against an enemy; but, as all the ancient fortifications of the Tower of London were falling into decay, if it were wished to preserve the character of the building, it was necessary to expend some money upon repairs. The next item which he had to notice was the Vote of £5,500 for converting barracks into an hospital at Haslar. The hon. and gallant Member opposite said that Haslar Barracks were wholly unsuited for an hospital, but that opinion was not shared by the Barrack and Hospital Committee, who had reported that those barracks were peculiarly fitted for the purposes of an hospital. The reason why those barracks had become available was that a considerable amount of barrack accommodation had been provided in the new works at Gosport, but no additional hospital accommodation had been provided for the garrison of those works. With respect to the item—£26,000—for erecting stabling for the Military Train, and converting the garrison hospital at Woolwich into barracks, he might observe that hitherto no barrack accommodation had been provided for the Military Train, who had been quartered in huts for the whole year at Aldershot and at Woolwich, which the House would agree was rather hard upon them. The hon. Baronet (Sir Harry Verney) had explained the reasons which induced the late Lord Herbert to embark in the expenditure upon the hospital at Woolwich. Many statements had been made concerning that hospital, which were devoid of foundation. It had been stated that the building was not adapted for the purposes of an hospital, and also that there were very serious faults in its construction. The truth was that that hospital had been constructed upon the plan of the best modern hospitals in London and in Continental towns, upon plans recommended by a Committee which was appointed to inquire into the subject of hospitals, and upon the plans more directly sanctioned by the Barrack and Hospital Committee in 1858. He believed that the medical profession generally agreed that the hospital was constructed upon the best principles. As to the alleged faults of construction, although it was true there had been a slight slip of earth where a portion of one of the pavilions was built and a small crack had appeared in one of the walls, yet the damage done was very slight, and the foundations had been examined by competent persons, who reported that there was no danger of further accident. The next item to which his attention had been called was that for the defences of the dockyard and anchorage at Bermuda, in connection with which he would take the item for defences at Halifax. Colonel Jervis, who was sent to report upon the defences of Canada, was also instructed to inspect the defences of the harbours of Halifax, and Bermuda. Considerable works had been going on for some time at Halifax, but hitherto none of any importance had been undertaken at Bermuda. Colonel Jervis recommended additional works at Halifax and that they should be proceeded with more rapidly. That officer also made several recommendations with regard to Bermuda, and accordingly an item had been placed upon the Estimates for defensive works at that island. In reply to the question of the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington), he could not say that it would be impossible to spend more money than the Government proposed to spend this year upon those works; but he was prepared to state that in framing the Estimate the Secretary for War had consulted Colonel Jervis as to what sums of money could be properly expended this year at Bermuda and Halifax, keeping in view considerations of economy and completeness. The amount which Colonel Jervis mentioned as required for Halifax had been placed upon the Estimates. Although it would not be impossible to proceed at a faster rate with those works, yet if they did so the cost would be very much increased, as labour could not be obtained in very great abundance on the spot. With respect to the amount asked for Bermuda, it was true there was a slight decrease of the amount recommended by Colonel Jervis. That decrease was very slight, and it was made because, upon further consideration, it appeared that a larger sum could not be usefully expended this year. It was impossible to calculate upon obtaining a sufficient supply of labour on the island. The black population was not very disposed to work, and the white population was well employed in other ways. If labour was imported from this country, unless very high rates of wages were given, the vicinity of the United States would offer a great inducement to cross to that country. If the works were to be carried on at a very rapid rate it could only be done by military or by convict labour. The garrison at Bermuda was at present small, and there was not accommodation for any very large increase of force. It was proposed to carry on the works with convict labour, but there were objections to the employment of convicts upon works of that kind, and the authorities at the Home Office had not yet decided whether they would allow a body of convicts to be sent to Bermuda. In any case, much time would be required to construct huts and to make other arrangements for the reception of the convicts, so that it was not probable that a larger sum than that placed upon the Estimates could be usefully expended this year. With respect to Halifax, it must be recollected that the working season there was short, and, consequently, a smaller sum could be expended in the year than in places where work could be carried on throughout the year. The sum taken for Halifax this year was larger than had ever been taken before, and although it would not complete the works, yet it would be sufficient, added to former expenditure, to place the works in a condition to resist an enemy's fleet. The money taken this year would be expended in preparing the existing works to receive heavier guns, and in providing accommodation for the repair of iron steamers. With regard to the hut barracks at Gibraltar, the site originally fixed was near some officers' quarters; but the site had been changed since the Vote was taken, and it was necessary now to provide officers' quarters. As to the officers' quarters at Malta, they were said to be almost the worst in existence. There had been a great deal of sickness among the officers quartered in them, attributed to their character, and this work was considered one of a pressing nature. The works at Harwich were nearly complete, and the contract for the works at Newhaven had been let. With regard to the Vote for the fortification of commercial harbours, part of that would be devoted to works on the Severn; and it was also proposed to commence a work at Liverpool, on the Mersey, the appropriation for the erection of which would be augmented by a contribution from local funds to be supplied by the corporation of that place. As to the small amount said to be devoted to Ireland, it must be remembered that the sum taken this year in the Estimates for fortifications in the United Kingdom was not large. The expenses of fortifications at home was almost entirely defrayed from the loans. The hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Dunne) was aware that works were going on in Ireland at places recommended by the Commission, and the Committee would hardly think it right that they should begin erecting works in other parts which had not been recommended by any military authority. The decrease in the barrack expenditure in Ireland was owing to the fact that the concentration of troops in camps at the Curragh and Aldershot had led to a great many small barracks being given up.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, that the noble Lord had said nothing about the Windsor Barracks.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, this Vote was owing to the fact that the infantry barracks at Windsor were extremely confined, and not sufficient for the accommodation of troops according to the modern notions of accommodation. They might be made much superior to what they were now, but the greatest fault was their confined space, which rendered it necessary to purchase additional land to expand them.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he must acknowledge that the noble Marquess had answered his questions in a manner which showed that he was thoroughly conversant with the complicated details of these Estimates. Still, the answer he had given to one or two of his questions rendered it necessary to ask him one or two more. He could assure the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) that Gentlemen on that side of the House had not urged the Government to expenditure on these matters; all they had done was, when the Government had stated on their responsibility that such expenditure was necessary for the interests of the country, to suggest that it should not be spread over a period of time thereby causing unnecessary delay. The noble Marquess said that Colonel Jervois had recommended the expenditure of £35,000 at Halifax, but that he had recommended at Bermuda a larger sum than was asked for. What was the difference between the sum actually taken and that recommended? He also wished to know whether the Government had come to any decision as to the employment of convict labour on these works at Bermuda.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he wished to ask why the labour of soldiers—engineers—which was known to be so much cheaper in the erection of such works, was not employed. He believed they could easily be spared.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he thought he had a right, before answering the right hon. Baronet's question, to protest against its nature, though he did not object to answer it. The Committee could not expect that any one representing a Department in that House should be called on to state the precise nature of the confidential recommendations of the officers of the Department in reference to any work of this kind.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, the question was founded on the information given by the noble Lord himself to the House.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he had stated that Colonel Jervois had been sent to Canada to inspect the works there, but did not imagine that the Committee would require the precise nature of his recommendations. As regarded the works at Quebec, Halifax, and Bermuda, Lord De Grey represented to Colonel Jervois that it was desirable no unnecessary delay should occur in their construction, and therefore asked him what amount of money could be expended during this year. £35,000 was mentioned for Halifax, £40,000 for Bermuda, and £50,000 for Quebec. But it was thought by the Government that £35,000 was as much as could be usefully spent in Bermuda this year. The Government were much obliged to the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) for defending them, but they had thought it right to take in every case the largest sum which they thought could be spent in the year.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: What about convict labour?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that question was still under discussion. It had been thought right to refer it to a Committee, which, if it had not met already, would meet in a day or two.

COLONEL DICKSON said, the Government had initiated whatever irregularity there was by publishing Colonel Jervois's Report, and he was surprised they should now object to give information. But why had Colonel Jervois been sent out there at all? We had in Canada the flower of our army, comprising several distinguished engineer officers, and why were not they consulted? Colonel Jervois was one of our most distinguished officers, but then he had seen no service, and had been Secretary of that Defence Commission which had entailed upon us that extraordinary expenditure for fortifications which had made us the laughing stock of the whole world. Just as the currier thought there was nothing like leather, so with Colonel Jervois, there was nothing like fortifications.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he did not in the least object to any questions which hon. Gentlemen might like to put as to the nature of the recommendations of Colonel Jervois. What he objected to was being compelled to answer questions with regard to confidential communications which might have passed between Colonel Jervois and the Secretary of State, on the subject of those works. The hon. and gallant Gentleman was, no doubt, right in saying there were officers in Canada who would be quite competent to make recommendations upon the subject of its defences, but Colonel Jervois had had very great experience, if not in active service, in the construction of works of military fortification. He quite admitted that Colonel Jervois had been Secretary to that Commission whose recommendations had, in the hon. and gallant Gentleman's opinion, been the laughing-stock of the world; but that was not the opinion of the House. The Government, however, were not proceeding upon the unsupported recommendations of Colonel Jervois. His plans had been submitted to General Williams, in Canada, to the Governor-General there, to the Commander-in-Chief in this country, and the principal officers who advised him, and had obtained their entire concurrence. He might say that they had also met with the entire approval of Sir John Burgoyne. The Government, therefore, were not acting on the unsupported recommendations of Colonel Jervois, but upon the best military opinions within their reach.

LORD NAAS was quite aware of the great advantage of employing convicts upon public works wherever it was possible, but he had on a former occasion brought the full question of the Bermuda establishment before the House, and the evils which had been shown to exist were so great that the Government resolved to discontinue the establishment as soon as possible, and they had since done so. If it were intended to send convicts there now, it would be necessary to go to the great expense of providing gaols and establishments for their use, for that House would never sanction a return to the horrors of the hulk system as practised at Bermuda some years ago. He hoped, therefore, whatever Department of the Government had this proposal under consideration would take full time before coming to a conclusion. He believed the expense they would have to go to if they were to send convicts there would be far greater than any possible advantage which could accrue to the public service.

(2.) £163,500, Military Education.

MR. AYRTON said, he was glad to see that the expenditure upon this department had somewhat diminished, and hoped it would still further decrease. The Council of Military Education cost £8,300 a year. He wanted to know whether the 200 cadets whose charge for messing was upon the Estimates formed the whole number at Woolwich. He had taken the trouble of adding up the number of persons who ministered to the education of these 200 gentlemen, and he found that they amounted to 147 in all. That was a very large and expensive establishment for 200 cadets. He did not think the double staff at all necessary. It appeared extraordinary to require a large military staff, who wore red coats, for purposes of discipline, who did nothing, and then a large educational staff, who taught the cadets something. If private persons were to establish a proprietary school they would not think of having a double establishment. It was rather an extravagant educational system when 200 cadets cost the sum of £36,000. There were also about 200 cadets at the Military College, costing for their education about the same sum. He thought the Government might find a more economical mode of doing the business.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that of the £36,000 for the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich the cadets themselves paid £30,960, so that the country only lost between £5,000 and £6,000. The Sandhurst College was not so self-supporting, for it cost the country about £20,000. With regard to the establishment at Chelsea, the schoolmasters which it furnished were the most insubordinate set of men that could be found anywhere, and the consequence was that the officers did not take the same interest in regimental schools that they did formerly. Of the entire Vote of £163,500 the sum of £60,000 was repaid.

MR. KINGLAKE said, with regard to the double staff to which his hon. Friend (Mr. Ayrton) had called attention, it seemed rather strange that when it was thought necessary to effect some retrenchment, instead of reducing the military staff, which was the ornamental portion of the establishment at Woolwich, the reduction was made in the number of teachers. He thought this a most injurious course to take. Nothing could be more satisfactory than the condition of the pupils so far as concerned education, and the teachers had had nothing to do with the difficulties which had occurred with regard to the military branch.

MR. MAGUIRE said, that he had to repeat the complaint which he had made on several previous occasions with respect to the state of the Military Hibernian School at Dublin, which was destined for the education and nurture of the children of soldiers in Ireland. The number in the school was about 400. About two-thirds of these were Protestants, and one-third Catholics. There were seventy officials in the establishment, but not a single person of rank or influence was of the Roman Catholic faith. The whole atmosphere of the place was Protestant. There were eight teachers, not one of whom was a Roman Catholic. This system had been attended with serious practical injury, for on several occasions owing to the influences which surrounded them, Roman Catholic boys had embraced the Protestant faith, and he would mention one or two cases to show how this influence had been exerted. In the year 1861 two Members of the Government stated that when a vacancy occurred on the staff a certain number of Catholic teachers or officers should be appointed. A vacancy did occur soon afterwards, and it was filled up in defiance of the expressed opinion of the House of Commons. He had omitted to mention that a Roman Catholic boy, who had changed his faith, was sent to another institution and brought back as a Protestant teacher. This was a strong inducement to others to change their faith. Other vacancies occurred in November and in January, neither of which had been filled up by Roman Catholics. Nothing could be more injurious in Ireland than to allow even the suspicion of proselytism to attach to any institution under the control of the Government, and supported by Parliament. Great discouragement was given to the introduction of Catholic children, one instance of which he would mention. Colour-serjeant O'Callaghan, who fought in the Crimea and died at Corfu, left two children, one of whom was now serving Her Majesty as a soldier, and the other a boy of tender years. The father was born, bred, lived, and died a Catholic; the widow, who was a Protestant at the time of her marriage afterwards became a Catholic. She was still a Catholic, and applied to have her child admitted into the institution, but the application was refused. Admission was afterwards obtained for the boy as a Protestant, and the Roman Catholic clergyman was refused access to the register in which the child's name was inserted. What would be said in England if the case were reversed? If such a state of things existed he would be one of the first, in defiance of priest, bishop, or Pope, to raise his voice in protest against it. In this college, while a Protestant chaplain was in receipt of £300 a year, the official Roman Catholic clergyman received only £80, and all applications for increase had been refused. An orderly serjeant in the institution changed his faith, and the Roman Catholic clergyman was kept out of his room one hour and a quarter while the man was dying, and was only admitted when the man had breathed his last. In this case a rebuke was administered by the Lord Lieutenant. These things showed the bias of the institution; and he had no confidence that the authorities of the school would give proper protection to Roman Catholic children. On the last occasion when he brought this subject before the noble Lord, in the true spirit of an Englishman, declared that he would not defend the Vote this year if there was not some change. There had been no change. He asked for that change; and he appealed to the noble Lord to urge upon the Lord Lieutenant, as president of the institution, to interfere in the matter and see that justice was done, for the Catholic soldier behaved in the charge, breach, and deadly conflict as gallantly as any one serving in the ranks of Her Majesty's army.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, to the observations of the hon. Member (Mr. Ayrton), that the duties of the Council of Military Education were not confined to the examination of officers for commissions; but included the whole administration of the military colleges, and of the regimental and garrison schools and libraries; and it would be seen by reference to the Return on the table that the gentlemen composing that commission were as fully occupied as any one employed in a public office. As to the Military Academy and Military College, it had been said that what was called the double staff was unnecessary. It was a misapprehension to say that what was designated in the Estimates the military branch was composed of officers employed solely in looking after the discipline of the military cadets. In the military branch of the Royal Academy at Woolwich were included the lieutenant-governor, the commandant, the inspector of studies, the assistant-inspector, and the chaplain—offices which would be necessary in any large educational establishment, and would have to be filled, if not by military men, by civilians. In the educational branch were included the professors only. The only officers employed on purely military duties were the captains, lieutenants, paymasters, and adjutants of the cadet companies; and the salaries of these officers constituted only a very small portion of the expense of the college. No reduction had been made in the military staff; but some reduction had taken place in the teachers, and there had been a consequent reduction in the expense. In reply to the observations of the hon. Member (Mr. Kinglake), he must say that the college had never contained the number of cadets on which the estimate of the number of teachers was originally based. During the last year or two a larger number of cadets had been sent from the military academy than commissions could be given to; and instead of 300 cadets, the number intended originally to be educated at Woolwich, it was found unnecessary for the service to educate more than 200, and therefore the number of professors had been diminished. A like observation would apply to the Military College at Sandhurst. Passing to the question raised by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire), he said it was true that last year the statement which the hon. Member brought before the House with regard to proselytising in the education given at the Royal Hibernian Schools attracted the attention of the Secretary for War, and the noble Earl had brought certain points connected with the management of that school under the notice of Sir George Brown and the Governors of the institution. The hon. Member last year gave him notice of the points to which he wished to call attention, and as far as any intention to proselytise on the part of any one connected with the education at the Hibernian School was concerned, he had shown that there was no real ground for the accusation; or, at all events, that if any indication of an attempt to proselytise the Roman Catholic children had ever been made, it had been checked and rebuked by the Governors of the institution. But he had been compelled to admit that in the educational staff of the college almost the whole—[Mr. MAGUIRE: Entire.]—perhaps the whole of the staff were of the Protestant religion. The Governors, however, assured them that in the selection of the teachers they were not prompted by any religious feeling, and that their invariable practice had been to select those candidates who appeared to them to be most fitted for the posts. He had stated last year that the Government did not consider that that was entirely a satisfactory state of things. They thought that that principle ought not to be strictly adhered to; and Earl De Grey was of opinion that, considering the different religions of the children, the candidates for teacherships should, to a certain extent, irrespective of their other qualifications, be Roman Catholics. That opinion of Earl De Grey was communicated to Sir George Brown and the Governors of the institution, who immediately held a meeting and passed a resolution that in future appointments the religion of the candidates should be considered, and that it should be a rule that a certain proportion of Roman Catholics should be appointed. He made inquiries the other day as to what had been the result of that decision, and the information that he received was that the only vacancies which had since occurred to which Roman Catholics could be appointed were—for one pioneer corporal and three women servants. For these, Roman Catholics had been selected. Also two monitorships, since the 1st February last, had been held open, in hope that the Board of National Education would recommend candidates qualified for the appointment. He was sure that the Committee would agree that, after the declaration of the Governors, no further assurance could be needed that the promise would be carried out. He had no knowledge of the individual cases brought forward by the hon. Member, but he understood that no cases of proselytising had taken place since the last debate. Certainly, if any instances of proselytism had since occurred it was contrary to the spirit of the correspondence between Lord De Grey and Sir George Brown, and without further information and inquiry he could not believe that any such attempt had been made. The hon. Member had referred to the case of a refusal to admit a Roman Catholic child, who was afterwards admitted as a Protestant. Of course, having had no previous notice of the case, he should offer no explanation with regard to it. The facts might be as the hon. Gentleman had stated them, but he did not think the inference that had been drawn from those facts was the correct one. If the child had been refused admission, as stated, he should be inclined to believe it was not because the child was a Roman Catholic, but because there was no vacancy at the time, and that it was the occurrence of a vacancy, not the change of faith, which procured the subsequent admission.

MR. BRADY was glad to have this assurance from the noble Marquess, but when he looked at the largeness of this Vote, extending to £10,000 or £20,000, and that of the officers of the institution not one in the higher positions was a Roman Catholic, he must enter his protest. The institution was entirely a Protestant one in its character. The noble Marquess said there were no attempts at proselytism in that establishment. This assertion might be correct in the sense in which the noble Lord meant to apply it—namely, that no direct influence was brought to bear on the children there to induce them to change their religion; but when the Committee saw that children of tender years were associated in the Royal Military School with persons of a different religion who had an influence over them, it was a natural consequence that those children would receive impressions which would weigh upon their minds. It was a well known fact that no Protestant parent believing in the doctrines of his Church would place his children under a Catholic teacher any more than he would place them under one of the Jewish persuasion, and it would be well that in this institution the Catholic children had not any inducement to become Protestants. The school was established as a boon to the people of Ireland at the time of the Union. It was intended as a boon, and might yet be made a boon if it were conducted aright. But the reverse of this had been the case, and it had provoked irritation in the minds of the Catholics. It ought not to be the policy of the Government further to attempt to estrange the feelings of the people of Ireland from this country. The Government had the opportunity to make amends for the past, and by seeing that this would be conducted in a fair spirit to the people of Ireland, it would tend to diminish that feeling of hostility which the Irishmen who had left for America had entertained, and which arose from the notion that justice had not been done to them at home.

MR. MAGUIRE expressed his acknowledgments to the noble Marquess for the assurance which he had given. He (Mr. Maguire) should be sorry to make a statement which he did not believe, and as an act of justice to himself and the noble Marquess, who had nothing to conceal, he would ask him to grant as unopposed the Returns he had moved for. They might render unnecessary any further appeals to the House on the subject.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he had no objection to give those Returns.

MR. WATKIN called attention to the allowance for the messes of the cadets, and said as there were only 200 cadets, each of them must cost the country £180. This must be an expensive mode of education.

(3.) £88,345, Surveys, &c.

(4.) £107,700, Miscellaneous Services.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to call attention to an item of £5,000 for expenses attending the carrying out of the Act 27 & 28 Vict. c. 85, for the prevention of contagious diseases at certain naval and military stations. It was, he thought, remarkable, after all that was said and done in connection with the moral and intellectual improvement of soldiers, that it should be deemed necessary to propose a Vote of £5,000 for the purpose of ministering to their vices and tempting them into immorality. The proposed expenditure was of an entirely novel character, and he should be glad to know how the money was to be appropriated and what towns were to have the disgrace of participating in its distribution. A more discreditable proposal was never brought under the notice of the House.

MR. LOCKE said, that as a Member of the Committee who sat upon the Bill which had now become law, and on which this Vote was based, he must protest against the extraordinary description which the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets had given of the measure. It was wholly incorrect to talk of that £5,000 as being intended for the purpose of catering to the vices of the soldiers. It was simply intended for their protection; and if a similar measure could be carried out throughout the whole country it would be a very great advantage. The object of the Act was that where a woman was proved to be a common prostitute—a term well known to the law of England—she should be taken care of, and not allowed to be the source of mischief to other people. It was an Act for the protection of the health of soldiers. A kinder or more benevolent Act he could not conceive. The hon. Member (Mr. Ayrton) had objected to it in the Committee because it was not sufficiently extensive, and seemed to think that they ought not to attempt to mitigate the evil because they could not entirely extirpate it. His hon. Friend (Mr. Ayrton) absented himself from the Committee, except on one day, when he expressed his entire dissent from the Bill. The Committee thought they did good service. They were unanimous. They were satisfied with themselves, and they were equally satisfied with his hon. Friend because he stayed away.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that the proportion of teachers to students at the Ecole Polytechnique at Paris was much greater than at the Military College. The hon. Member (Mr. Ayrton) was correct in saying that there were only 200 cadets at Woolwich, but the charge for education was fair and reasonable. With regard to the item of £5,000, it was proposed to extend it in the hire of certain Lock wards in different places; and, although it was not quite decided, yet it was contemplated to commence a hospital in one or two places where no such wards could be procured. The proportion of the grant to Aldershot would be expended either there or in London, to which those persons would be removed. It was the general opinion of persons competent to judge that the Bill would be of great use.

MR. BRADY said, that there was no city of Europe in which public hospitals were not open to this class of patients. They ought to be more general in this country.

MR. AYRTON said, he had attended the meeting of the Committee one day, when he proposed that the law of the land should be put in force for the protection of the soldier.

Vote agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he did not propose to move the next Vote for the administration of the army until the Report of the Committee was received.

(5.) £26,100, Rewards for Military Service.

(6.) £74,200, Pay of General Officers.

(7.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £455,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Pay of Reduced and Retired Officers, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1866, inclusive."—

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—
(Mr. Torrens.)

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(9.) £28,200, Pensions and Allowances to Wounded Officers.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £38,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Chelsea and Kilmainham Hospitals, and the Pension thereof, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1866, inclusive."

COLONEL DICKSON moved that the Chairman report Progress.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to have some information on this Vote. It appeared that only £15 a year was allowed to maintain soldiers' widows, and he wished to know how many widows had applied. Surely that was not the whole sum allotted to this purpose?

COLONEL DICKSON said, that he hoped the hon. Member would not persevere in asking information then, as Progress had been made, and he was only marring the attempt to postpone the consideration of the Vote.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that usually this Vote passed without discussion. He could see no objection to proceeding with it.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that considerable discussion would arise upon the Vote.

MR. WATKIN said, he hoped the Committee would act like an assembly of business men. This was a Vote which everybody approved, and he appealed to the gallant Member not to obstruct business by this mode of objection.

COLONEL DUNNE said, these discussions always arose upon the Estimates, as the hon. Member would have known if he had been as long in the House as he (Colonel Dunne) had. It was the hon. Member's inexperience which led him to make that suggestion.

THE CHAIRMAN proceeded to put the Vote.

COLONEL DICKSON: I thought I had moved that Progress be reported. Really it seems as if the Government are trying to get these Estimates in an unfair manner.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON regarded the proposal as unreasonable, but as they had got already many Votes the Government would give way.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question, That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Colonel Dickson,)—put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported on Monday next.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Monday next.

COUNTY VOTERS REGISTRATION (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 70.]

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Robert Peel.)

COLONEL DUNNE asked for an explanation of its object.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that in 1862 a Bill was introduced for the purpose of limiting the polling in counties to one day, instead of two. It became law. In 1864 a Bill was introduced authorizing the Lord President in Council to make additional polling places by the division of baronies, attaching them to new polling-places. When that Act was passed an omission was made with reference to the preparation of the lists for those new polling places, in consequence of which the Act would not work. Representations had been made by Magistrates of Queen's county and Wexford of the inconvenience there, and it was to remedy the omission in the Act of last Session that this Bill was brought in.

MR. AGAR-ELLIS said, that the Bill would be totally unworkable. The Act of last year did not require amendment.

COLONEL DICKSON said, his suspicion with regard to the Bill was as to the period at which it was introduced. Who were the Magistrates of Queen's County and Wexford who had made representations? It looked very much like a party move?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the Bill was introduced with no such object.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, the real object of the Bill was to supply the omission in the Bill of last Session. It had nothing to do with registration, but was merely for the convenience of voters.

MR. BAGWELL believed that the inconvenience arising from the Bill would be greater than the convenience. He should move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months,"—(Mr. Bagwell.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. LONGFIELD contended that the operation of the Bill would entail a new revision in the districts to which it applied, by means of which not only would expenditure be incurred, but efforts to oust particular persons would be encouraged.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the measure would not have any such effect. Its intention simply was to provide increased facilities for polling. There would be no new registration or revision of voters, and the sole object of the Bill was to provide for the division of the voters into polling districts.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 30; Noes 32: Majority 2.

Words added. Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

UNION OFFICERS (IRELAND) SUPER- ANNUATION BILL.—[BILL 53.]

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 1.

LORD JOHN BROWNE moved an Amendment to include clerks of Unions among the officers who might be superannuated.

LORD NAAS said, he was in favour of the principle of the Bill, but he doubted the prudence of the Amendment, as he thought that the only officers of unions who should be superannuated were those who devoted their whole time to union affairs.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he agreed with the Amendment, adding that he had, in fact, himself given notice of an Amendment of a similar nature, but somewhat wider in its operation, as it included among officers to be superannuated the union doctors, who were a most meritorious class of men.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN hoped the Government would adhere to the clause as it stood, and thus show a due regard for the rights of the ratepayers.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the interests of the ratepayer must be considered. The effect of the hon. and gallant Member's proposal would be to give superannuation to the poor rate collector, and the chaplain, as well as the doctor and the clerk. He thought the principle of the Bill ought to be adhered to, as stated by the noble Lord opposite.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HENNESSY moved an Amendment, including the medical officers and the clerks of the unions in the list of those to whom the benefits of the Bill should be extended.

Amendment proposed, in line 11, after the word "officers," to insert the words "including the medical officers and the clerks of unions."—(Mr. Hennessy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that he could not conscientiously proceed with the Bill if the Amendment of the hon. Member for the King's County were carried, because he never would be a party to to the imposition upon the ratepayers of Ireland of the taxation which it would render necessary. He hoped the Bill would be passed in its present shape.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 11; Noes 42: Majority 31.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3.

COLONEL DICKSON moved an Amendment to the effect that superannuation should be ruled by time of service and not the age of the applicant.

Lord Naas

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, the clause, as it stood, was identical with the English law, and therefore those Irish Members who generally expressed so strong a disapprobation of different legislation for the two countries ought to support the clause.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Tuesday next.

BILL ORDERED. FIRST READING. [BILL 90.]

MR. DENMAN obtained leave to bring in a Bill "to improve and facilitate the trial of disputes relating to the merchant shipping." He said that it was a measure drawn under the direction of the Chamber of Commerce, and was intended to give a cheaper, more expeditious, and better qualified tribunal to settle disputes than now existed.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to improve and facilitate the trial of Disputes relating to Merchant Shipping, ordered to be brought in by Mr. DENMAN and Mr. CLAY.

ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH said, he had to bring under their Lordships' notice a case arising out of an investigation that took place on the 25th of February, before the Petty Sessions at Colooney, in the county of Sligo. The young woman, of whose assault and ill-treatment the magistrates took cognizance, was named Catharine Gaughran. She was a young person of sixteen years of age, born in Scotland of Irish parents. She remained in Scotland until she was about sixteen years of age, when, her parents being dead, she was invited by her so-called guardians, her uncle and aunt, to return to Ireland. She did so, and went to service in a town near Colooney. She had been a Roman Catholic; but having attained to years of discretion, she changed her religion in Scotland and became a Protestant. The manner in which she gave her evidence was such as to convince the magistrates that she was well able to judge for herself. She took service in a Protestant family, and was there visited by her uncle and aunt, who endeavoured to persuade her to change her religion. She refused, and they then called in a Roman Catholic priest, who assured her she was going to hell, and pressed her to return to her own faith; but she still refused, saying that in Scotland she had acquired a taste for reading the Bible. Her aunt thereupon, in the house of this Protestant, violently assaulted her, by kneeling upon her, and otherwise using her most inhumanly. On the 20th of January she was sent on an errand, but was hunted out of the house to which she was sent. Her aunt dragged her by the hair of her head, and other persons assisted to drag her along the broken stones of the road for several yards. Four of the police were present while this was going on, and were appealed to, but in vain, to take her out of the hands of those persons. A sub-inspector, named Burke, was looking out of the window of his house, and saw the assault. He was called upon by a Mr. Simpson to interfere, but he never stirred. "No," said the police, "It is a family matter, and we cannot interfere." The poor girl was hunted into the house of a man named Hart, and was there detained until the evening of the following day. She was then rescued by a magistrate's warrant, obtained by the Protestant minister of the place. An investigation, which occupied four or five days, took place at Colooney, before four magistrates—two Roman Catholics and two Protestants. The aunt was found guilty, and sentenced to be imprisoned for one month, and some of the wretched boys who were concerned in the assault and had been no doubt instigated by the priest were imprisoned for two or four months, with hard labour. Three out of the four constables were found guilty of neglect of duty; the sub-inspector was fined £2, while the magistrates left, as they said, his particular case in the hands of the Government. If a Government really existed in Ireland there could be no doubt that it was bound to take notice of the misconduct of the police; for, if the constabulary were not bound to discharge their duty, irrespective of the wishes of Roman Catholic clergymen, the British dominion in Ireland would be nothing but a myth. But so far from the sub-inspector, who had so grossly misconducted himself, being dismissed, he believed he had escaped punishment altogether, except as to the fine of £2 inflicted by the magistrates. It might be said by some parties that he was sensitive with regard to what he regarded as Roman Catholic encroachments, and he admitted that such was the case; but he certainly never complained without reason. He was of Roman Catholic lineage himself, and had many friends and relatives belonging to that religion. In 1825 and 1826, though not then in Parliament, he assisted the Roman Catholics to obtain that measure of justice to which he believed them entitled; and at that time no form of protestation was too strong for them to make that no danger to the Protestant institutions of the country could arise from the concessions which were then made. But now-a-days men seemed to glory in the overthrow of the Established Church, as a matter which was not only possible, but must be near at hand. Their Lordships had only to look at what was going on around them every day to be convinced that that was the fact. There was the case of Mary Ryan, in which the right hon. Gentleman, whose duty it was to look after such matters, had taken no steps, or shown the slightest disposition, to grapple with the parties who had violated the law. The right hon. Gentleman said the persons—miscreants of both sexes he (the Marquess of Westmeath) would call them—who were charged with taking this helpless woman beyond the seas and burying her alive, had no bad motive for it. If they had no bad motive, why was a law put on the statute book to punish the offence? The fact was that the right hon. Gentleman dived into people's motives for the purpose of saving himself from the trouble of doing his duty. Another recent case was that of Eliza M'Dermott, a girl who was surreptitiously decoyed from her mother and conveyed to one of these pandemoniums. And now this poor girl in Ireland was obliged to leave the country, as she could no longer remain there in safety. Was that no proof of the powerlessness of the law in Ireland? Revise the Liturgy, banish the pews and crinolines into the galleries, which is their proper place. Give up the body of the parish churches to the people, to whom they belong. He would here say a few words with all respect and affection to the right rev. Bench. Revise the Liturgy, conciliate the Independants and the Wesleyans into the Church. Banish the pews and the crinolines out of the body of the parish churches into the galleries, for the body of the church belongs to the people, and pews are an usurpation. Now, the real question which he wished to bring before their Lordships was whether the constabulary in Ireland were or were not to carry out the law irrespective of any private interests or personal influences? In the present case the Lord Lieutenant appeared to have taken no action whatever. If he did not know the merits of the case, he must have allowed himself to be betrayed by the police. Regarding the uselessness of the office of Lord Lieutenant, he had often expressed an opinion. The Lord Lieutenant was in the receipt of £20,000 a year, and he had since he went over to Ireland received something like fifty deputations, every one of which, with a single exception—that upon the subject of the Shannon navigation—asked to be exonerated from some obligation, or for a share of the public money. Such was the way in which the government of Ireland was carried on; and he had deemed it to be his duty to lay the present case before their Lordships—and he would probably have another to bring under their notice before long—in order to warn the Government as to the course which they were pursuing, and to show that, under existing circumstances, the constabulary and its management in that country were a machinery in the hands of the Popish priesthood. It was, he knew, the fashion to attribute the outrages which had taken place in the north of Ireland to the Orangemen; but that he contended—and he was no Orangeman—was a cruel misrepresentation. They were not the cause of the riots in Belfast, for everybody knew that they were excited by a treasonable procession which had a short time previously taken place in Dublin. They had, however, so far as he could see, been guilty of no crime, unless it were a sensitiveness with respect to the support of the Protestant religion as by law established. The noble Marquess concluded by moving an Address for—

“ Copy of the Conviction made at the Hearing of the Magistrates of the Petty Sessions of Collooney in the county of Sligo, on Tuesday the 25th February last, and on the subsequent days, in the Case of the Complaint of Catharine Gaughran against Michael Hart, Wineford Hart, and others, on a Charge of assaulting and afterwards violently putting her in Duress on the 20th of January last, and there detaining her until released by a Magistrate's Warrant; and also of the Conviction of Sub Inspector Burke and others of the Police Force, having been present at that Outrage in open Day and declining to interfere and rescue Catharine Gaughran from the brutal Treatment she was receiving; and for a Copy of the Decision of the Inspector General of the Constabulary upon the Conduct of the Individuals of the Force inculpated upon that Occasion.

EARL GRANVILLE having stated that there was no objection to the production of the papers,

COLONIAL NAVAL DEFENCE BILL.

(No. 39.) SECOND READING.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, its object was to enable several of the colonial possessions of Her Majesty to make better provision for their own maritime-defence. The question was one, he added, which had been under the consideration of the Colonial Office and of the Admiralty for some time, various proposals with respect to it having been made by the Australian Colonies, who had offered themselves to undertake a large portion of the necessary expenditure. Much difficulty was, however, experienced on the subject—not so much in a colonial as in an international point of view; but that difficulty had, he thought, been met by the present Bill, which provided that the whole expense of the proposed defensive operations should be undertaken by the colonies, but that the arrangements for the purpose should be made by them in connection with the Home Government by means of Orders in Council. The effect of the Bill would, in the first place, be to create a Naval Reserve somewhat similar to that which existed in this country, and which would be enlisted in the colonies under similar conditions. At home the measure for the creation of a Naval Reserve had been found very successful, for we had now between 16,000 and 17,000 men, all able-bodied seamen, who were almost all trained to gunnery. Something of the same kind would, he hoped, gradually grow up in the colonies. There was also a provision enabling officers in the naval service in this country to take service there, with the consent of the Admiralty. These officers would be invaluable for training and commanding this force; and in that way a most effective source of colonial defence would, he thought, be provided. The Government, he might add, had lately received a proposal from the colony of Victoria for building vessels in this country of a large class as well as of smaller vessels on the turret principle to enable them to defend their harbours. Provisions calculated to further these proposals as well as the others to which he adverted constituted the main features of the Bill, which, he trusted, would be found fully to answer the purpose.

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup>, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

LORD HOUGHTON moved to insert in line 1 the words, "both Houses of Parliament," with the object of extending the power of awarding costs in certain cases of Private Bills, to Committees of the House of Lords; and other consequential Amendments in the several clauses of the Bill.

Amendments agreed to.

(No. 43.) REPORT.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

THE EARL OF LONGFORD moved, to reinsert a paragraph which had been omitted from the end of the second clause during the progress of the measure through that House. His object was to save the shareholders of two small railway companies in Ireland from being devoured by lawyers by providing distinctly that they should not be liable for more than the amount of their shares.

Moved, after ("thereunder") p. 1, line 19, to add—

"It being however hereby declared that no Person, Company, or Body Corporate, by reason of his or their being a Shareholder of any Railway Company made bankrupt under any such Adjudication of Bankruptcy, is or shall be liable to pay or contribute any Sum beyond the Extent of his or their Shares in the Capital of the Company not paid up at the Time of such Adjudication."

LORD CRANWORTH said, he should oppose the Amendment.

EARL ST. GERMAN'S supported it on the ground that it would restore the Bill to the condition in which it was originally submitted to that House, with the sanction of the Irish Law Officers and of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, that the Select Committee had recommended that the Bill should be passed in its present form, after hearing an exposition of the law as it now stood, from a learned Gentleman who was a Member of the other House.

LORD DUNSANY trusted their Lordships would assent to the Amendment. As the law stood at present, a very grievous hardship was inflicted upon shareholders who had invested their money in Irish Railway Companies in the belief that no alteration could be made in the law affecting their liability.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, the Bill now before the House proposed to remedy an omission in the Bill of 1857. Since that period hundreds of thousands of pounds had been invested by shareholders in railway companies in the belief that they would be liable only to the amount of their shares. Several gentlemen of fortune who had become shareholders on that supposition were now on the verge of ruin.

LORD CHELMSFORD hoped the House would support the decision come to by the Committee, and reject the Amendment proposed by his noble Friend.

On Question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 18; Not-Contents 21; Majority 3.

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE COLONIES.—QUESTION.

MR. DUNLOP said, he would, pursuant to notice, beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether, looking to the recent decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Bishop Colenso, by which, with reference to Colonies with representative Legislatures, or in which the Church of England has not been established by Law, Patents for the erection of Episcopal Sees therein, purporting to confer ecclesiastical jurisdiction, are pronounced to be contrary to Law, it is the intention of the Government to advise Her Majesty to abstain henceforth from issuing any more such Patents for Colonies so situated; and also from nominating successors under the existing illegal Patents to Bishops who may die or resign, leaving the voluntary associations of which such Bishops are the chief ministers to provide successors according to the rules and canons they have adopted or may adopt for the government of their own non-established Communities; and particularly whether this course will be recommended in reference to Canada, where, by an Act of the Canadian Legislature to which the Royal Assent was duly given, all connection between Church and State has been expressly abolished?

MR. CARDWELL said, with reference to Canada, the practice of issuing Letters Patent for the appointment of a Bishop had been for some time discontinued. The practice in Canada now was that the Bishops were selected by the clergy of the colony, and those Bishops derived their civil rights from the Legislature of the colony. With respect to issuing Letters Patent for other colonies, he begged to assure his hon. Friend that this very important subject had been brought under the consideration of the Government by the recent decision of the Privy Council, and was receiving the careful attention of the Government. No Letters Patent would be issued to any colony until the subject was fully disposed of by the Government.

MR. DUNLOP said, he would now beg to ask Mr. Attorney General to what extent and effects, if any, Patents erecting Episcopal Sees in colonies having representative Legislatures, or in which the Church of England has not been previously by law established, and purporting to confer ecclesiastical jurisdiction, are valid and operative; and also to inquire under what statutory or other authority the Queen, as Sovereign of the United Kingdom, issues Patents for the erection of Episcopal Sees, in accordance with the religious system established by Law in only one part of the United Kingdom—England—in colonies which never were, at any time, colonies of England, but have been from their origin British colonies.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir,
It is very much more easy, especially after the recent decision, to say what is not the effect of these Letters Patent, than to say what is. I will, however, endeavour to answer my hon. Friend's question according to the best interpretation I can put upon this decision. In the first place, I understand it to be determined that no legal dioceses are created by those Letters Patent in the colonies to which the question has reference. Secondly, that these Letters Patent create no legal identity between the Episcopal Churches, presided over by these Bishops, and the United Church of England and Ireland. Thirdly, that the Letters Patent do not introduce into those colonies any part of the English Ecclesiastical Law. Fourthly, that they confer on the Bishops no legal jurisdiction or power whatever, and add nothing to any authority which the Bishops may be legally capable of acquiring by the voluntary principle without any Letters Patent or Royal sanction at all. There remains nothing, therefore, in the Letters Patent, except it be, as I understand, simply to incorporate the Bishops and their successors as a legal corporation, with the ordinary incidents of a legal corporation. But even as to that, I see it stated in the recent judgment, that these Letters Patent are not valid for the purpose of establishing any ecclesiastical corporation whose status, rights, and authority the colonies could be required to recognize.

MR. DUNLOP: The hon. and learned Gentleman has not answered the second part of my question.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: I beg pardon. I thought my hon. Friend would understand from my answer that the maximum operation of these Letters Patent in the colonies would seem to be to incorporate the Bishops and their successors, not as an ecclesiastical corporation, but simply as a common lay corporation, which it is the ordinary prerogative of the Crown to create, and for which no statutory power is required.

UNION CHARGEABILITY BILL—[BILL 31.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS rose to move that the Union Chargeability Bill be now read a second time, and said, Sir, having endeavoured on a former occasion to explain the purport of this Bill, and believing that it has found favour with those whom it concerns, it will not be necessary for me to detain the House at any length on the present occasion. As, however, some opposition seems to be intended, I venture to impress on the House again that there is no new principle involved in this measure, that it is in strict conformity with the principle of the New Poor Law, and that it is only taking another step in the direction in which legislation has proceeded lately. The scheme of the New Poor Law was the adoption of a larger area than the parish as the basis for the management of the poor; a course which had already been recommended by considerable experience acquired in former years, as essential to obtain that judgment and intelligence in the management of the poor, which was rarely to be found in a single parish or township. It was, moreover, recommended especially by the disclosures which took place on the great inquiry into the operation of the Poor Law consequent upon the agricultural disturbances that occurred in 1830, an inquiry which seemed to establish more completely than was ever done before the utter failure of what is called the parochial system. The promoters of the New Poor Law then certainly intended that the union should, in every respect, supersede the parish as well for rating and charge, as for the administration of relief; and their expectation of success was indeed chiefly grounded upon this supersession of the parochial system. But the authors of the Act were defeated in their efforts to carry that measure by views and interests similar, probably, to those which will be represented by the movers and supporters of the Amendment this evening; and the New Poor Law was launched under the obvious disadvantage of being a combination of the two systems—that of the union and that of the parish. This disadvantage having been submitted to, it was feared that the mischiefs of the old law would soon reappear, and the authors of the Act inserted a provision enabling the guardians themselves to constitute the union one parish for the purposes of rating and settlement, should they be able to secure unanimity on that subject at their Board. Expectations, however, were still entertained that there was something wanting in the measure to secure its success; and certainly these expectations were completely verified by the result. The parochial system was, to a certain extent, retained, and the House will easily see why the law failed in many respects in consequence of its retention. While the parochial system existed each parish had in its discretion the entire management of what was called its own poor; and the result was that there were some 15,000 districts each with its own system. Thus every variety of system and practice existed, which were generally alike detrimental to the poor and injurious to property. Under the New Poor Law the guardians by their mode of administering relief undoubtedly prevented some of the more gross abuses of the former system; but in consequence of the parochial liability being retained, and the power of dealing with their own poor being still in the hands of the parish officers, the parishes had the same motive as before for "keeping down their poor" as it was called; or, in other words, for getting rid of their poor. The object of the parishes after the Act passed, was to reduce the number of their poor, in order that they might have to pay as little as possible. The guardians, by their officers, administered the relief, but the parishes paid for it, and were desirous, therefore, of keeping the charge as low as they could. The great source of chargeability for the poor in parishes, springs from their residence in them. The poor may have acquired settlements at some time, owing to their residence there, and then their families derive their settlement from them. It has always been a great object, therefore, in particular parishes, in order to keep down the poor, to prevent them residing in those parishes; and for that purpose their dwellings are pulled down, and no new cottages are built. This is one way of what is called managing parishes. But where the poor have got dwellings in a parish, the next best thing is to get them out, and into a neighbouring parish in order to shift the burden there, and yet not lose the benefit of their labour. That used to be a favourite practice under the old law, and it was the mistake of retaining the parochial liability under the new system that the officers of parishes have the same motive for displaying their zeal and discretion in keeping down the poor as they had before. Many of the complaints, therefore, that are still heard of in the working of the Poor Law are thus to be accounted for, it being still observed that the labouring poor live in wretched dwellings, and sometimes far from the place at which they work, being the only place where they can find habitations, and that the same struggle goes on between different parishes, each trying to get rid of their poor, and varying in success according to the circumstances of the parish. Parishes, it is well known, vary in character almost as their number, and may differ alike in size as in the disposition of those who reside in them. A parish owned by one, two, or three proprietors may be able to get rid of its poor in the way I have described, and an adjacent parish may be in such a position that it cannot help receiving the outcasts from the proprietary parish. Hence the great complaints raised during the last twenty-five years as to the manner in which the poor have been dealt with and the capricious and unjust distribution of the burden of their maintenance, some parishes being compelled to pay far more than they ought, while others are pretty nearly exempt. This, as we know, during that period, has led to Committees, Commissions, Inquiries, and Reports without end, all having reference to the mischievous bearing of the law on the poor, and the evil to those who contribute to their support. As far back as 1839—with in five years of the enactment of the New Poor Law—the Commissioners, in their Report to this House, state their regret that no step had been taken for carrying into effect the provision by which, they believed, a great improvement could have been effected in the management of the poor, namely, the provision by which guardians, if unanimous, might at any time constitute the union into one parish. There was a difficulty, no doubt, in carrying out that provision, because as the unions are constituted, there are generally one or two close parishes in them, which have the interest of escaping the charge by confining the area of liability; and as one is quite sufficient to prevent the unanimity required by the Act, one for that purpose would never omit to attend and resist the change, that would distribute the rate more equally. A few years afterwards Sir George Lewis was at the Poor Law Board, and Sir James Graham at the Home Office, and no two men were ever more anxious to prevent the failure of the New Poor Law by bringing about the very system of union rating and union settlement which I am submitting to the House. It is well known that they both deemed it essential to its success. In 1844 Sir James Graham introduced a Bill to do away with parochial settlement; but he was not successful in his object, and the measure had to be withdrawn. In 1845 he brought in another Bill, for the same object, and to empower the Commissioners to declare the union one parish for the purposes of assessment, and referred in his speech to the very general feeling in the country that that change should be effected. That Bill was not successful; but in the following year Sir James Graham introduced another Bill to consolidate the laws relating to the relief of the poor, and having in one of its purposes, the same end in view as the previous one. On the Order for going into Committee on that measure, you, Sir, if I am not mistaken, proposed, and, I believe, carried, an Instruction directing the Committee to make provision for the adoption of the principle of a union rating and settlement. That Bill was not passed; but in that year a Bill passed to which I referred on a former occasion, by which it was supposed that the late Sir Robert Peel intended to compensate the agricultural interest for the effect produced by recent commercial changes. He had in view, by that means, to remedy the injustice to which they were subject, when people who had been drawn from their villages to the manufacturing towns were afterwards, in consequence of the state of trade, cast back again on their parishes, which, under the old system of that time, would have been the case, but which, under the union system now proposed, would probably never occur. That Bill passed. By it a large number of the poor were declared irremovable, and a new kind of status was given to the poor. Many complaints, however, were made in the House of the unequal operation of that partial measure. The House then acted very much on the principle which is now proposed—namely, of casting on the property of the union the support of the poor of the union. The charge of the irremovable poor was thrown on the property of the union. But so apparent again were the evils of the parochial system of settlement, and so impressed was the House with the necessity of a complete change in that system that, in 1847 a Committee was appointed—a very strong Committee from the names of those who sat on it—purposely to inquire into the effects generally of removal and settlement. That Committee made a most searching inquiry into the matter—I am bound to say not producing much that was new, because the whole subject had been inquired into in 1834; but they showed that the system had not improved since, and that enormous mischief had resulted from the system of settlement and removal, and though the Committee were not able to agree in a Report to the House, they did resolve that the limited area of chargeability for settlement was the cause of great evils to the poor, and ought to be extended, and that the territorial extension which ought to take place was that of the union. They passed that Resolution, and it was then supposed that some legislation would immediately ensue. However, at that time Mr. Charles Buller was appointed President of the Poor Law Board, and he, who had become a convert during the inquiry, was of opinion that such prejudice existed against any change that, unless there was more authority for it than the evidence taken by a Committee that the House was not likely to pass the measure for effecting it, and he appointed Commissioners whom he sent throughout the country to verify the statements made before the Committee, especially upon those details of injury said to be done to the poor by being driven out of one parish and induced to reside in another, where their dwellings were miserable and much overcrowded. These Commissioners were said to be fairly chosen. Many of them were Inspectors under the Poor Law, then in the service of the Government. I presume they were trustworthy and honourable men, because their Reports were especially referred to by Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham in the discussion on agricultural distress in 1850, and they spoke of them as persons deserving of credit, and as having presented a strong case for some change in the law. But the evidence collected by these Commissioners went far beyond that given before the Committee. It established beyond question all the evils that followed from the system of parochial settlement—the clearing of parishes, driving the poor out of them, and thrusting them into places already overcrowded, and into dwellings more fitted for brutes than for human beings. Unfortunately, Mr. Charles Buller died that very year; but, before he died he was already so much impressed with the evidence collected that he had given directions that a Bill should be prepared to adopt the union for purposes of rating and settlement in fourteen of the unions of the country. Mr. Baines succeeded Mr. Charles Buller. Perhaps a more cautious man than Mr. Baines never accepted a public Office. He knew perfectly well the difficulties that he had to contend with, and the peculiar interests opposed to him, and he endeavoured by various amendments—and very valuable amendments they were—to mitigate, in some degree, the evils of parochial settlement. After being three years in Office, however, he could not resist the effect of the evidence constantly brought under his notice, of the mischiefs of the system, and he felt bound to bring forward a measure to abolish removals altogether, and establish union rating. But with the view of conciliating some interests in this country, he had, unfortunately, in my opinion, omitted all provision for the Irish poor in England, and in consequence of his having done so his Bill was lost. The rejection of this Bill was made a reason for appointing a Committee to inquire into the system of removals of Irish and Scotch poor. That Committee received a great deal of evidence similar to that which had been given before other Committees, and came at once to a conclusion that the system of making the poor irremovable should be extended—that it was a mitigation of the evils of settlement, and recommended that no poor person, whether English, Irish, or Scotch, after a residence in a union for three years, should be removed by the parish officers. That Committee had the important assistance of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire), whose opinions, doubtless, from what he had seen in Ireland, were most important, and must have had influence on the Committee. One might have expected that legislation then, would have been again attempted, but some interest seems again to have prevailed, and farther inquiry was again called for. There was always somebody who said he was in the dark—always some information was wanted, and some reason or other found for not legislating in this matter. Accordingly a Committee was then demanded to inquire into the working of Sir Robert Peel's and Sir James Graham's Irremovable Poor Act itself; and after sitting for three years the Committee came to a conclusion which, from the nature of the evidence, they could not resist. The hon. Member for Worcestershire (Mr. Knight) was on that Committee, and requested to be examined by them as a witness, and then detailed at length to them all his views upon the subject, as well what he had written as what he had spoken; notwithstanding which, the Committee came to the conclusion that the Irremovable Poor Act, which the hon. Member very much condemned, was a valuable one, that it had proved beneficial to the poor, and ought to be extended; and they recommended, as the previous Committee had done, that no man ought to be removed after a residence of three years in any union. The House acted on their recommendation, and a Bill to that effect was passed, which has now been in operation about three years. After that another Committee was appointed, with the largest reference that was probably ever made on the subject, namely, to inquire into the past operation as well as the present administration of the New Poor Law. That Committee lasted three years, closing its inquiries last summer, and they also made special inquiries into the subject of inequality of rating, and incidentally into the subject of settlement, and came to the conclusion that they had ample evidence and information on the subject, and resolved that the area of rating ought to be that of the union, and that the poor of the union should be maintained from the property of the union. This is the language of the Committee—

“Although much of the inequality which has been shown to exist as between parish and parish within the same union will now be obviated by the operation of the Irremovable Poor Act of 1861, and that inequality will be further lessened by the adjustment of the parochial rates under the provisions of the Union Assessment Act of 1862, your Committee are unable to regard that result as furnishing any reason against equalizing the charge of maintaining all classes of the poor over the several parishes of the whole union. On the contrary, it appears to them to have removed one of the greatest obstacles to the adoption of such a measure.”

The Committee concluded this branch of the inquiry by the following Resolution:—

“That any measure for extending the area of rating should, in the opinion of the Committee, embrace provisions for making the whole cost for the poor in each union chargeable on the common fund of the union.”

Now, that is the deliberate Resolution of the Committee which sat for three years, and if the House will look at the constitution of that Committee they will feel, I am certain, that its Members were not likely to be biassed in this matter by any party or sinister motives. The Committee justly observed that the Irremovable Act had cleared the ground for this measure, and had, by causing the rates to be levied upon property in the union according to its value, removed one of the greatest obstacle to the adoption of this measure. I know it has been said that this Bill has been introduced in the interest of the towns as against that of the rural parishes of the Committee. I beg to state, without admitting that it had any such purpose, that this Resolution was not proposed by either the Chairman or any one belonging to the Poor Law Department. It was, in fact, the proposition of a county Member. I was instructed by the Committee to draw up such a Resolution, but knowing the diversity of opinion that existed on the subject, and feeling that on various grounds it would come better from another Member, I gladly allowed it to be proposed by the hon. Member for North Devon (Mr. Buller), whose recent death we have to deplore, for I believe that a more worthy, or more sensible, or more honourable man has seldom had a seat in this House. That hon. Gentleman was perfectly satisfied with what he had done upon this subject. I communicated with him in the recess, and asked him whether such a measure as I am now proposing would meet the views of his constituents, and whether the public in his part of the world were prepared for legislation upon the Resolution of the Committee. The hon. Member told me that everything that he had seen and heard in his district had confirmed him in the view which he had entertained, and that he was satisfied the public were prepared for legislation upon the subject. In fact, what he stated gave me the impression that, in his opinion, I should not be discharging my duties as Chairman of that Committee, if I did not bring in a measure founded upon that Resolution of the Committee. When the House re-assembled for the present Session, I asked him if his opinion still remained the same, and if he believed the House would carry such a measure, and his answer was that everybody with whom he had communicated seemed to expect it, and was prepared for it. Lest it should be thought that that hon. Member regarded this measure with some favour because he sat on the same side of the House with myself, I beg to say that there was another county Member on that Committee who was most prominent in recommending it. That hon. Member will, I firmly expect, support this Bill, because from what I know of him I do not believe that he would recommend one thing upstairs and then for some reason vote against it in this House. The hon. Gentleman to whom I refer is the Member for South Devon (Mr. Kekewich.) This measure is, as I know, differently viewed by county Members on both sides of the House. It is approved by some, and felt to be irresistible by others. In alluding to hon. Members who had every reason to expect that this measure would be proposed, no one is more prominent in that respect than the Member for Worcestershire (Mr. Knight). That hon. Member was a great opponent of the Act passed in 1861, and the ground of his opposition was that union chargeability would be the inevitable consequence of the Act founded on the recommendation of the Committee. These were his words—

(Q. 6709.) "There is no doubt that the irremovable poor will be in a very short time the rule, and the settled poor the exception. The one is an immensely increasing, and the other a decreasing proportion."

And again—

(Q. 6777.) "It is absolutely and positively certain that a Union Rate will follow immediately—that it is only a step to a Union Rate."

I only refer to the hon. Member to show that he was among those who must have been prepared for this measure, because he resisted the former measure on the ground that this measure would have to be proposed. But, when we are asked to postpone this measure on account of the Irremovable Poor Act, I wish to know, if anybody complains of that Act. No petitions have been presented against it. It is well understood; it has been in operation for three years; and guardians are not of a class who, if they are not satisfied, are apt to be silent, and they are well represented in this House. Not a word has been said against it, for, go where you will, it is acknowledged to be a great improvement of the law. It is, in reality, an act of humanity by which thousands of poor people are allowed to remain in the locality where they have been employed, though, perhaps, destitute for awhile, instead of being sent across the country to some place where they may possibly not be known and most certainly are not wanted. If there be any county entitled to complain of the Irremovable Poor Act it is the county of Lancashire, because when the great distress occurred, according to the former custom, most of the people from the agricultural districts would have been sent back to their villages. Partly, perhaps, from disinclination to such a course, but still more probably from the great difficulty of ascertaining whether they had obtained a three years' residence in the union or not, but comparatively few removals took place. The Irish poor have especially profited by this Act by being suffered to remain in this country; but there have been no complaints that either the Irish or English have not been removed during this period. I do not know what further information is required upon the subject. The Act has done good service to the poor at least; and those who are compelled to support the poor do not complain. The expenditure for the poor has not been greater in consequence of the additional charge to the common fund, and the actual charge per head is less now than it was before this charge for irremovable poor was so placed upon the common fund — meeting in some respects the argument that had been brought against this measure, that the guardians would in administering a general fund be less watchful or become careless of the expenditure. The result tallies more with the experience obtained before with respect to the administration in large districts subject to some uniform control. Their management is frequently more intelligent, and is attended with less expense, and the paupers fewer in proportion to the population than in small parishes or unions. Upon this point there are means for making comparison. For instance, the union of the City of London consists of ninety-eight parishes, and may be compared in this respect with Lambeth, which is a single parish, but which is far larger in area, and far more populous, and it will be found that the pauperism is less, and the expenditure more economical. I do not, however, cite Lambeth especially for comparison. It will be found in other cases of uniform management, however large the district, such as in Paddington, Islington, or Marylebone, that both the expenditure and the amount of pauperism are found to be less than in the City of London, where the parochial division is so numerous. That the expenditure there is felt to be more lavish than it ought to be, and that it is not protected by its parochial system, I presume, from the fact that the City has petitioned in favour of this Bill, which will have the effect of constituting it for the relief of the poor as one parish. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), with a view to facilitate, as he says, the discussion on this Bill, has called for a Return which, judging by the time required for similar Returns, could hardly be available to Members before next year. But, it is idle to say that this Return is necessary to enable the House to come to a decision. The right hon. Gentleman, I suppose, wants to ascertain the difference which will be caused in the charge to each parish by this measure. At the outset, I would, however, point out to him that sufficient information for his purpose is already to be found in the library. We have a Return similar to the one he wishes for, made in the year 1861. The right hon. Gentleman requires it for 1864. But for what purpose does he want it? He has got at present the expenditure and the rateable value of every union. If he wants to ascertain how much in the pound any union or parish has to pay under the present system, he can do so by dividing the rateable value by the expenditure—he would learn then the rate in the pound at which the poor were maintained in any union. If the rate were 2s. in the pound in the union it would be 2s. in the pound in the parish. All these particulars for the year 1856 are in the library. There is not generally much difference in the expenditure and certainly not in the rateable value between one year and another. If the object is only to ascertain this difference, the data we have is sufficient. I have, however, another remark to make to the right hon. Gentleman, when he says that the Return which he asks for is essential to his coming to a vote upon this subject. If this measure professed to be for the purpose of reducing the charge, or for enabling people who had been exempt before to continue so still, or that those who have paid less than they ought should not be asked to pay more, it would, of course, be a very interesting and important matter to know whether the Bill realized the intentions of the Mover. But that is not precisely the object of this Bill. This measure is recommended on general grounds of public advantage, because it will confer considerable benefit to the poor, and be an improvement upon the present system of applying the Poor Law. I do not hold myself bound to consider the various contrivances by which some people have evaded the liability which the law properly attaches to their property, or how far they may be enabled to do so in future. The Return might assist the right hon. Gentleman, perhaps, in ascertaining the difference which the measure would make in those cases. I do not see how that Return would disprove what has been so strongly supported in evidence against the present system, and in favour of the measure both as regards the poor and the property of the country. I think the question must be discussed upon its merits after all; and I contend that there is a vast amount of evidence, as well as of authority, against the bad working of the present system, and that without any reference to the particular payments of the parishes, that some change is rendered necessary. There is, I think, something like general agreement about that; and those who oppose this measure do so, because they think there will be some distribution of the union charges that may not be favourable to themselves or to those they represent, and on this account this measure has been misrepresented—Members may possibly have seen, as I have done, a curious handbill, which has been circulated by the hon. Member for Worcestershire (Mr. Knight), and which it is said he had sent to every overseer in the kingdom. But the result, I should suppose, cannot have been very satisfactory to him, for a number of these handbills have been sent to me, with letters more complimentary to the Bill now before the House than to the handbill of the hon. Gentleman. I doubt if any vestry or any parish in the kingdom has adopted the proposal the hon. Member has put forth in that handbill. The hon. Member proposes a charge of £2,000,000 upon the Consolidated Fund to indemnify, I presume the owners of close parishes, for their future contributions to the poor. It would be asked by many, however, I think, who was to indemnify the general taxpayer for these £2,000,000 a year paid for the benefit of the proprietary parishes who will have to pay, in future, only as their neighbours have always done before? This House would hardly allow compensation to be given to those who would gain by the change. As far as I understand the handbill, the hon. Gentleman admits that one-half the parishes in this country will be greatly benefited by this measure, and he proposes that the general taxpayer should contribute that sum of money towards the indemnification of those who would lose by the Bill. This seems to be the condition upon which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Worcestershire (Mr. Knight), would support the Bill; a proposition not very likely to meet favour with the public. The real advantages of this Bill are that it will put a stop to a grave inconvenience to the poor, and will withdraw from their employers, among the ratepayers considerations that are extremely detrimental to the poor, and, in the long run, injurious to themselves and their property. There cannot be the least doubt of the fact, after the evidence which has been so repeatedly adduced, that there is a strong desire in rural parishes to get rid of the poor and to compel the labourers who might become chargeable to reside elsewhere. This is very detrimental to the interests of the poor, who have then to live at a distance from their work, and to get lodgings or houses wherever they can. They find these dwellings in towns and large villages where the rents are high, and with the view to economy they get crowded together in a manner that has a most injurious effect upon them both physically and morally. This is supported by evidence that cannot be disputed. Another result of this parochial system, which has been so much observed upon, is that the employer of labour is always considering what effect the employment he may give to any labourer will have upon the rates—they are always thinking whether the labourer is likely to become a pauper, and not whether he is an able, sober, and industrious man and such as they require for their work. The farmer is constantly under fear of being the means of adding to the rates, and will employ idle, drunken, and unskilful men in preference to the skilful and superior, lest the former should come upon the parish. I firmly believe that this measure would put an end to that system. It has, I believe, been stated, and will probably be stated again to-night, that though all this was true enough some years ago, and that in order to keep out the poor, the dwellings of the poor were pulled down, and that cottages were not built, that the practice had now ceased altogether. Well, there is abundant evidence to show that the practice was in full force in 1851. What the five Commissioners reported that were sent out in 1848 and 1849 we know; and we know that a gentleman, now a Member of this House, who some years afterwards went through England for the purpose of making observations upon the state of agricultural labourers, as well as the condition of agriculture generally, wrote a series of letters which now forms a most interesting volume, and that he confirmed, as existing then, what they had reported. I allude to the hon. Member for Stirling borough (Mr. Caird), who says in his work—

“It is the commonest thing possible to find agricultural labourers lodged at such a distance from their regular employment that they have to walk an hour out in the morning and an hour home in the evening—from forty to fifty miles a week. In one county the farmers actually provide donkeys on which their labourers ride out and home to prevent their tiring themselves with walking, so that they may be more vigorous at their work. Two hours a day is a sixth part of a man’s daily labour, and the enormous tax he is compelled to pay in labour, which is his only capital. Nor is this the sole evil of the practice, for the labourers are crowded into villages where the exorbitant cottage rents frequently oblige them to hord together in a manner destructive of morality and injurious to health.”

This was the state of things as it was observed in 1851 by an intelligent Member of this House—and I may add, I think, not disputed by Members of either House of Parliament, for I find that Lord Malmesbury, who was examined on these matters by a witness before a Committee of the House of Lords, said in his evidence—

“I assume also that the anomaly of our parochial system is acknowledged, its most glaring effects being that the proprietors of close rural parishes can and do transfer their poor population to a neighbouring parish, thereby reaping all the advantage of their labour when efficient without the responsibility of their maintenance when impotent. I do not think I need make any observations upon close parishes. Your Lordships are more aware than any other class of the community what they mean and how they work.”

These words were uttered in 1851, and I trust hon. Gentlemen will read the Report of that Committee before they think of rejecting this Bill. I should, indeed, have been very glad to think that any person was entitled to say that the same state of things did not exist now. There was a Report, however, laid upon the table of this House three days ago made by a medical gentleman who was employed last summer by the medical department of the Privy Council to inquire into the state of the cottage accommodation throughout the rural districts of the country, and I do not hesitate to say that his Report must make a very deep impression upon the people of this kingdom. I am, indeed, satisfied that it will be read with surprise and sorrow from one end of the country to the other. It is the result apparently of careful investigation. There is no disguise of facts, no concealment of names, or any political object served. Everything is given in detail which relates to the subject, as bearing on the condition of the agricultural labourers and their families. And what is still more important to observe is that, although those inquiries could have no connection with the project of reforming our system of settlement, yet throughout that Report the condition of the labourers and the manner in which they live are apparently forced upon the conviction of the reporter, as being connected with the system of parochial settlement. It is that system which compels them to live in what I may be permitted to call the brutal state in which they are too often to be found. There are detailed accounts of the number of houses that have been pulled down in different parishes, and where, in many cases, the population has also increased and the motive for pulling down of those houses is directly ascribed to the system of settlement. It was from that Report that I made the statement which seemed to excite the hon. Member for Worcestershire (Mr. Knight) so much—namely, that there were upwards of 800 parishes where the number of houses had diminished and the population had increased. The Report has been presented, but I do not know whether it has yet been printed, and I only refer to it in order to meet the argument which may be advanced, that although these things may have existed in former times, yet that they have now ceased. The reporter seems to have had nothing but a correct statement of facts in view, for I find that credit is given where it is due, where means have been taken by proprietors to provide better accommodation for the poorer classes than formerly, and this has been done in many places. I hope therefore, that hon. Members will not rashly conclude that this is not a Bill of great importance—that it is a Bill which may be disposed of as other Bills having the same object have been dismissed. I would at least make this suggestion, that as this Report to which I have referred only became known to me when I introduced this measure, and as it has not yet been placed in the hands of Members, that the opponents of this Bill will not venture to reject it until they have had an opportunity of reading that Report. [Lord JOHN MANNERS: Postpone this Bill.] No, I cannot do that. There will be plenty of opportunities of getting rid of this Bill besides the second reading. Judging from the eager manner of the noble Lord opposite I am afraid that he intends to oppose the Bill, and that he expects his opposition will be successful. I think really that he and those who think with him might well postpone their opposition until the next stage, when they will have better means of judging of the value of this measure. I believe they will be as much struck with the Report I have referred to as I have been, and they would then have cause for regret, if they had rejected this Bill in ignorance of the real condition of our agricultural population, and which was ascribed by the intelligent men to whom the inquiry was intrusted to the operation of the system which it is the purpose of this measure to improve.

I am not now disposed to detain the House longer, for I cannot hope to influence them by my own authority or by any further statements that I can make; but I cannot help adding some observations as to the effect of this measure by one who has had great experience in witnessing the operations of the Poor Law, who was one of the original Commissioners for administering that law, though subsequently for a long time absent from England, and who finds the same faults in the system that he observed when he left. I refer to Sir Edmund Head, who before he left England wrote upon the subject and went fully into the question of parochial settlement, and now has republished the article which he wrote before he went to America. [Lord JOHN MANNERS: That refers to a long time ago.] Yes; the paper was written a long time ago, but the writer, finding substantially the same things existing now of which he complained before, republishes his observations, and thereby reiterates his opinion. Sir Edmund Head writes thus in supporting the principle of the measure—

"All power of limiting the number of cottages, simply for the purpose of avoiding the burden on a particular parish, would be taken away. Two or three proprietors may now combine, but the owners of land in so large an area as an union cannot possibly set upon an experiment of this kind, even if the abolition of settlement and the diffusion of the charge of relief over a wider area should leave them an adequate motive for so doing. The poor man would have a better chance of living where his work was wanted, and of procuring sufficient accommodation for his family as they grew up. The effect of the present law on his character would cease. Whether he was to be hired by a particular farmer would no longer depend upon the fact whether he was already settled in the parish in which that farmer paid his rates, but on the question whether his own habits and his own industry made him worth hiring. He would reap the consequences of his own conduct, without those consequences being overruled by the accident of his own or his father's settlement. If a good workman and a single man, he would no longer, as now, get less wages; under which disguise many an honest labourer is at present virtually paying what the parish would otherwise have to pay as poor rates, in order to support an idle neighbour and his family at a lower rate than they would cost in the workhouse. Lastly, in case of sickness he would have no difficulty in obtaining relief; the obligation could not be thrust off by an order of removal, nor could he be transferred to some distant parish, in which he knew no one and was known by no one. The scheme proposed has another positive merit. It equalizes the charge on the ratepayers; and no part of the land would escape from its fair share of the burden of the district. Nor is this principle new to the English Poor Law. By the 43rd of Elizabeth the justices are empowered to impose rates in aid of neighbouring parishes; that is to say, to spread the pressure over a wider surface, when it has become intolerable within the narrower circle."

That was the opinion formed by Sir Edmund Head after many years' experience of the Poor Law, and which he finds is still applicable to the present state of things. I venture to quote his views as they are identical with my own; and I now confidently ask the House to read this Bill a second time, believing fully that it is calculated to meet the evils pointed out by Sir Edmund Head, and indeed I may say of every other intelligent authority who has paid attention to the subject, and has maturely considered the effect of parochial settlement.

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY, in rising to move the Amendment, of which he had given notice, said, he had heard with much pleasure the observation of the right hon. Gentleman, who, referring to the hon. Member for South Devon (Mr. Kekewich), said, that he felt convinced that hon. Member would not have proposed a Resolution in a Committee upstairs to the terms of which he would not adhere in that House. Upon hearing that observation, he (Sir Rainald Knightley) felt that he had a right to claim the vote of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board, because he was informed that right hon. Gentleman himself had proposed in the Committee a Resolution as nearly as possible the same as the Amendment which he was about to submit. But, before discussing the question of this Bill, he would state briefly the reasons which induced him to interpose his Resolution before the Amendment of which notice had been given by the hon. Member for Worcestershire (Mr. Knight). In the course of conversation with many Members on both sides of the House, he heard an opinion very generally expressed that this was not regarded as a party question, and he hoped it would not be so considered upon the present occasion. Many Members, he found also, were not disposed to vote for the second reading of this Bill, nor for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Worcestershire, simply because they had not sufficient information upon the subject. They were not in a position to judge of how far certain towns and villages had suffered for the benefit of other places, nor how the evils complained of had been mitigated or were still in existence. In fact, they were voting in the dark. Then, again, with regard to the Union Assessment Act passed three years ago, they had no information, because from the vague and uncertain phraseology of that statute it was not too much to say that no two contiguous unions adopted the same interpretation of it. Having regard to the gross estimated value and gross rental, the widest differences existed as to the deductions that were to be made. Deductions allowed in some places were refused in others. In some unions the deductions upon land amounted to only 1 or 2 per cent, in others the deductions reached 10 or 12 per cent, while in some unions no decision had yet been come to on the subject; in fact, that Act, although passed three years ago, in many places was to all intents and purposes a dead letter. He found, also, that there was a general feeling that a measure of this great importance, affecting as it would the relative value of every acre of land in the kingdom, ought not to be dealt with by a moribund Parliament in almost the last hours of its existence, and that it would be better to remit the whole question to the consideration of the country at the next general election, leaving it for the future Parliament to deal efficiently with the question. Many Members, also, were disinclined to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Worcestershire, not wishing to commit themselves absolutely as opposed to a principle which subsequent information might lead them to approve. He opposed the Bill on two grounds—first, because it would interfere with the rights of property; and, secondly—and it was infinitely the more important ground—because in his opinion it would prejudice the interests of the labouring classes themselves. Taking the least important objection first—in his own parish there was only one single plough field; and the same thing occurred in many parishes of Leicestershire and Warwickshire. These were not close parishes—they belonged to different owners; but the means of employment there being very small the population was necessarily very scanty, and the rates were very low. It would be hard upon the ratepayers of such parishes to call upon them to support the pauper population of distant districts—possibly in different counties—for the area of some unions embraced different counties. With the poor in these unions they would have no connection whatever, and would have derived no benefit from their labour, and therefore the ratepayers would be called on to pay higher poor rates, merely to put money into the pockets of the proprietors in other parishes. This would not be robbing Peter to pay Paul; it would be robbing Peter to make Paul a present of that which he had no right to. Such a measure would affect the small much more than the large proprietors, because where a man owned land in various districts the probability was that he would be assessed at a high rate in some and at a low rate in others, so that a fair balance would be struck on the whole. But to the small proprietors an additional 1s. in the pound would prove an intolerable burden. You had no more right to confiscate the property of these persons for the benefit of other proprietors than Parliament would have to assess the salary of the right hon. Gentleman, or that of any Member in this House, for the purpose of handing it over to other people. He could understand the principle of parochial rating, he could understand also the principle of charging the whole burden of the poor upon the Consolidated Fund; but he did not understand the justice of union rating. As matter of local rating it was too large, for Imperial rating it was too small. Parochial rating had existed from the time of Elizabeth. Landowners had purchased their property subject to these burdens, and therefore no one had a right to complain. Moreover it was but just and right that those who derived benefit from the labour of the working men while in health should support them when they could work no longer. ["Hear, hear!"] He understood those cheers—it was asserted that at present large landowners, by keeping "close" parishes, contrived to shuffle off their responsibilities to the shoulders of their poorer neighbours. This led to the vexed question of "open" and "close" parishes. Now, the proportion of close to open parishes was very small; and was it just to enact a great wrong in ninety-nine cases merely for the sake of rectifying some apparent anomaly in the hundredth case? He would not, however, rest his defence of the present system upon this ground. Taking them as a body, no class of men discharged their duties to those in their employ more conscientiously than landowners did; but, for the purposes of the argument, he would assume that the landlord was a harsh, hard-hearted man, who depopulated his own property and drove all the poor into the neighbouring town on the outskirts of his union, for the sake of relieving himself from poor rates. How did this benefit the large owner and injure the smaller owners? In these discussions you always heard a pitiful description of the poor labourer, weary and wayworn with having to walk several miles to and from his daily work. [Cheers.] He could tell hon. Gentlemen who cheered that this was simply twaddle. ["Oh, oh!"] If the labourer had to compete with other labourers who lived on the estate, no doubt he would be injured; but this was not the case. The tenant-farmer, his employer, was no doubt injured, for he only received three parts of a day's work instead of a whole day's work—the services of a partially-tired man in the place of the services of a wholly fresh one. In entering into his farm, however, this loss was taken into consideration, and the tenant-farmers paid a smaller rate in consequence. ["Oh!"] Thus neither the labourers nor the tenants would be affected; and at the utmost, the landlord was only guilty of an act of suicidal folly, which injured nobody but himself. It might be said that men were not like machines which never grew sick or old, and that landed proprietors had no right to use up the labourer while he was young and when he was old and worn-out hand him over to be supported by the small ratepayers, and that the hardship fell upon the small shopkeepers. At first sight this appeared just; but if hon. Gentlemen looked closely into the question they might find, as he had found, that they had jumped to a conclusion too hastily. The point generally omitted from the calculation was—"Where are the wages spent?" A certain number of labourers was required for the close parish, and every sixpence of their earnings was spent, not in the close parish where they worked, but in the open parish where they lived. The small tradesmen were able to carry on their business in consequence of the money thus spent among them, and derived a benefit more than proportionate to the liability of maintaining these labourers when in poverty. If they looked to the assessments throughout the country they would find that wherever population was the most numerous, property was the most valuable in proportion to the acreage. According to the principles of the political economists the origin of all wealth was labour; and it was the expenditure of wages which produced large towns and increased the value of the land there. The Manchester manufactures occupied precisely the same position in regard to the labourer as the cruel hard-hearted landlord—both employed labour while it was remunerative, and ceased to do so when it became remunerative no longer; but if during the cotton famine the factory hands had emigrated in large numbers, the rates might have been lower, but the manufacturers' and tradesmen's profits and the value of property would have diminished in a far greater degree. His main and chief objection to the measure was based upon the manner in which it would operate on the labouring class. Any one at all acquainted with agricultural matters—and he did not now allude to the President of the Poor Law Board, who knew nothing more of the rural districts than of the interior of Africa, and might never have seen a green field—was very well aware that during a considerable period of the year agricultural labour was not remunerative. During the greater part of the spring, summer, and autumn it was absolutely necessary for the cultivation of the soil; but during the dead months of the winter farmers only employed the labourers because they knew that otherwise they would have to keep them out of their own pockets by means of the poor rate. In every parish with which he was acquainted this course was adopted to a considerable extent, and the poor labourers were maintained in comparative comfort in their own cottages, instead of being sent to the workhouse, which they regarded with the greatest horror and detestation. But if the present Bill passed there would be no alternative. The maintenance of each individual pauper was an important consideration in a small parish, but it was only a drop in the ocean in a large union. The farmer would naturally ask "Why should I keep my own men if, in addition, I have to pay taxes towards the support of the workmen of other people?" And the consequence would be that the union workhouses and the gaols would be filled to repletion, rates would be increased, and the comforts of the poor would be diminished. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving the Amendment.

MR. BANKS STANHOPE rose to second the Amendment, and said that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board thought it odd that any hon. Member of that House should require more information on this important subject. Well, he (Mr. Stanhope) was one of those benighted individuals. The right hon. Gentleman described to the House in a most touching way the contents of a report of a certain medical officer—he went further, and asked hon. Members not to defeat his Bill without being acquainted with all the particulars. This was what his hon. Friend (Sir Rainald Knightley) and himself asked, though in a different form—namely, that the House would not proceed with the Bill till they had made themselves acquainted with all the circumstances of the case. A considerable change took place in the law not four years ago, when the Irremovable Poor Act was passed, and he did not see how they could well determine what should be the nature of future legislation until the different changes which had already been introduced into the law should have been properly tried. That Act had been successful or it had not. If it had been successful he could not see on what plea it was to be upset. If, on the other hand, it had been unsuccessful, that fact pointed out to the Legislature that they ought to be excessively careful how far they made any such further changes in the law. The effect of the Bill would be twofold. It would change the condition of the poor; it would redistribute the charges on land. He was willing to admit that there had in some places been a want of comfortable cottage lodging for the labourers; but during the last few years he had been living in a part of the country where year by year new cottages were being built. He must say, with regard to landlords, that to put up new and good cottages was simply an act of benevolence on their part. They did not build them as matters of speculation, but, after erecting them in the most commodious way possible, they allowed the labourers to live in them at a low rent. Therefore, unless it could be shown that there was a disposition on the part of the landlords to pull down cottages, and that the consequent evil could only be remedied by this Bill, it ought not to be passed. If the Bill compelled landlords to build cottages, and the poor would be benefited, that might be a great good; but the fact must not be undervalued, that the landlords did look on the poor as belonging to them individually, and that partly from benevolence, and partly from feelings of the pocket as ratepayers, the landlords and their tenants did employ a vast amount of unprofitable labour. Then as to the difference that the new mode of rating would produce in the value of property, one of his tenants had mentioned to him the amount which would fall in addition upon his farm. Well, that meant difference of income to the landholder. Evidence had been given before the Parliamentary Committee, showing what the effect of union rating would be upon the employment of labour in the county of Norfolk, which showed that the consequences would not be beneficial to the labouring class. He understood that the Bill would produce a redistribution of charge between different parishes to the amount of £2,500,000; and surely they had some right to ask the Government for clear information on that point. At present they had only a Return which told them the state of things in 1836. That Return was comparatively valueless, as what was paid in 1836 was no approximate evidence even of what was paid last year. They had a right to know what was paid in every parish in 1864, and what would be paid if that Bill came into operation. He did not think it quite fair to take an individual case, but he was given to understand that the town of Boston would have actually saved nearly £1,000 during the last half year if the present Bill had been law, or, in other words, the charge upon Boston would have been reduced from £1,719 to £760. On the other hand, two rural parishes, situate about six miles from that town, which, as a rule, managed their own land with their own labourers, and which when they wanted extra labourers, got them from other parishes but not from Boston, would under this measure have had their rates for the same half-year very nearly trebled. That was not a case of close as against open parishes, because in the whole union comprising forty-three parishes, the result of the new Bill would be a decrease in a certain number of parishes of £1,143 of which Boston alone took £959 leaving only three other parishes out of the entire forty-three in the least benefited by it, while all the rest, which were not at all close parishes, would have their rates actually increased in order to relieve a large town of 17,000 inhabitants, which naturally had a considerable poor population. Again, Lincoln had about 20,000 inhabitants. It had been an agricultural town, but was now becoming a great manufacturing one. Agricultural implements were manufactured there to a large extent, and one firm of European reputation alone employed some two or three thousand hands. Well, if in these days of strikes an unfortunate difference between master and men were to arise, these men and their families might be thrown not upon the city of Lincoln, but upon the union of Lincoln for relief; and thus the manufacturing poor would be a burden not to the town where they had earned their bread, and which they had enriched by their industry, but to those parishes which had nothing to do with them. Might there not be other cases in which a burden thus self-created in a town would be thrown upon the county? They were entitled, therefore, to know in what way the Government met points of that kind. Without stating what course he might deem it his duty to take on that question in any future year, he would only add that he should cordially support the Amendment then before the House.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "considering the little knowledge this House possesses as to the practical working of the Irremovable Poor Act of 1861, it is inexpedient, without further information, to legislate on the subject of Union

SIR EDWARD DERING said, he hoped the House would pause before giving its assent to the second reading of this Bill. He agreed with the hon. Member opposite that a measure which must affect the liability of every parish in the kingdom was one of such paramount importance that it ought not to be dealt with until they received information much more accurate than any they now possessed—indeed, it ought not to be dealt with till they had an opportunity of personally consulting those whose interests would be so seriously affected by the change. They must bear in mind that if they once established the principle of union settlement and union rating it would be utterly impossible ever again to revert to the old parochial principle; and, therefore, by legislating in the absence of accurate information they might inadvertently inflict irreparable injury on a large portion of the rural districts. They had been rather taunted for thirsting for more information on that subject; but what information had they received either from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Villiers) or from any papers that had been laid on the table, as to the extent of the change which the Bill would make in the respective burdens of town and country? The right hon. Gentleman was diffuse on many other points; he advanced many arguments in favour of a union settlement which it would be very difficult to refute; but, with regard to the all important point above stated, he had maintained a discreet and almost eloquent silence. If the right hon. Gentleman had spoken as to that, his sense of truth would have obliged him to tell them that the effect of the Bill in all unions which comprised one or more large towns and a certain number of agricultural parishes would be, that the rates would be very much diminished in all the town and proportionately increased in all the agricultural parishes. He was not speaking at random on the point, for he held in his hand a document very much in the nature of that for which the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) had moved—namely, a detailed statement of particulars regarding all the parishes

Gentleman's attention to a town close to him — Louth — which contained 14,000 people, and which supplied the labour for at least two-thirds of the acreage within five miles of the town. In the parishes around there were scarcely half cottages enough to shelter the people who worked on these estates. The people had to go four or five miles to their work, and to return the same distance at night. There was another small town in the middle of the fen district of Lincolnshire, which contained a considerable population, engaged, within a circuit of five miles, in supplying labour which ought to be resident on the estates. In supporting the second reading of the Bill, however, he wished to state his opinion that the assessment to the relief of the poor was not on an equitable footing. He considered that every kind of property, real and personal, ought to contribute to the relief of the poor. There was no reason why real property alone should be chargeable to the rate. The principle of the statute of Elizabeth placed all property on the same footing. Every man was to contribute according to his means for the relief of the poor. But at the time that statute was passed personal property was comparatively of insignificant amount, and therefore personal property was not assessed. At present the average rate was 2s. in the pound, and the gross charge £6,000,000. A penny in the pound on all property, real and personal, as the Income tax experience taught them, would produce £1,000,000, and if, therefore, all property were taxed, from whatever source it might be derived, a rate of 6d. in the pound would cover all the expenditure. He was quite prepared, either now or in a future Parliament, to vote for a Committee on the subject, and to show that the assessment should be on personal as well as on real property. All who had spoken or written on the subject had come to the conclusion that it was just that personal property should be rated to the relief of the poor, or that the poor should be supported out of the Public Exchequer. But it was urged, on the other hand, that the moment the hands of the guardians might be dipped into the National Exchequer, all motives to economy would be removed. That appeared a startling objection; but he did not think that such would be the case. At present certain annual grants were made out of the public funds in aid of local expenditure for particular objects; for instance, one-fourth was contributed towards the payment of the county police, and contributions were also made towards the support of prisoners in gaols, and in neither case was it alleged that there was any encouragement to wasteful or excessive expenditure. It was unfair, therefore, to assume that the guardians of the poor would be made extravagant if such a course were adopted. At all events, it would not be very difficult to devise some check. A grant founded upon the average expenditure of a certain number of years might be made, and if that were exceeded the guardians might be obliged to make up the difference. That, he thought, would operate as an effectual check. Feeling, then, the measure, before the House was not a final one but that it was a step towards making every description of property pay, and towards the abolition of the Law of Settlement, he had great pleasure in giving his support to the Motion for the second reading.

MR. BENTINCK said, that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board in introducing the subject, and giving a summary of former legislation in its regard, had made use of the somewhat remarkable expression "that in by-gone times somebody was always in the dark, and could not see the way." But that was precisely the position of Her Majesty's Government on this occasion: and that also was the position in which they wished to place the House; for there never was an instance upon record before now of a Government asking the House to proceed at once to the second reading of a Bill which involved, as this measure did, a large transfer of property upon such scanty information as they at present had on the subject. So much was this the case that hon. Member after hon. Member had risen to show how completely the operation of the Bill would in different localities disappoint the objects and intentions of the right hon. Gentleman. He was able to contribute from his part of the country something towards the stock of information. He was acquainted with a union—Downham—which consisted of thirty-four parishes, of which eighteen would be largely benefited, while sixteen would be losers by the Bill. But the most curious fact was that in this case it was the close parishes that would be the gainers. Now, that was directly at variance with what he conceived to be the right hon. Gentleman's object. In the Lynn union there were four parishes, two strictly urban and two strictly agricultural; and the effect of the measure would be to throw upon these agricultural parishes, which had no interest whatever in the matter, the maintenance of a large proportion of the poor of the other two parishes. In one case there was an occupier whose poor rates would be raised from £8 to upwards of £130, and that was a transfer of property which he maintained ought not to be made or even proposed without a great deal more information than the House possessed. He did not wish to be understood as saying that they were never at any future time to legislate upon the question—what he contended for was time to obtain ample information before proceeding to legislate. His impression was that the general effect of the Bill would be too much for the benefit of the towns, and too much against the rural districts. That was a description of legislation of which that House had always been too fond, and which he was always prepared to oppose. Another and perhaps the most important point was this—namely, the effect which it would have upon the labouring poor. His own belief was that it would induce occupiers not to employ the labouring poor at times when their labour was not remunerative, but rather to throw them upon the relief. That fact alone, putting aside the question of finance, and taking the whole question upon the ground of humanity, formed a sufficient objection to the passing of the Bill at present. The right hon. Gentleman himself was not prepared to say that the Bill would not have that effect, for, if so, he would have stated it in his very able speech. The right hon. Gentleman had gone to the table and quoted a Report which he had seen, but which the House had not, in favour of the Bill. But surely such a proceeding had never before been witnessed in the annals of legislation. The strongest argument against the Bill was to be found in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman himself. It was not fair to ask the House, with such information as was before it, to come to a decision upon a question not only of great financial importance, but which probably would act most injuriously upon the condition of the labouring poor. Without binding himself for any future time, but merely contending that the present was not the proper moment to legislate, because the House had not sufficient information, he should support the Amendment of his hon. Friend.

MR. HODGKINSON said, the opponents of the Bill had based their objections to it mainly on the ground that it would effect a redistribution of burdens for parochial relief, and consequently create injustice. It was impossible to deny that the effect of the Bill would be to redistribute the burden of the poor rate to some extent; but so far from admitting that that re-adjustment would be unjust, he contended that it was absolutely necessary for the purpose of remedying an injustice already existing, and which, though partially remedied by recent legislation, still required the enactment of such a measure as this. When hon. Members talked of the shifting or redistribution of the burdens, they ought to bear in mind that burdens might be shifted by various methods, not only by the direct action of the Legislature, but by individuals in their own interests, in their own parishes setting at defiance and frustrating the intentions of the Legislature, or by different circumstances arising not at all contemplated by the Legislature when the burden was imposed. When the burden became shifted by either of these two latter means it was the duty of the Legislature not only to prevent any further frustration of its original design, but to readjust the burden which had become disturbed or disarranged. If hon. Members would carry their minds back to the original design and intention of the Poor Law, they would not fail to see how far in the course of time the gradual operation of the law had departed from that original design. The first Act was the 7th Henry VIII., which created the office of overseer, the contributions were voluntary, and at that time each parish was not dependent upon its own resources for the maintenance of its own poor, for the surplus collections were to go in aid of the less affluent parishes. These voluntary contributions were found to be insufficient, and the next act was a sort of hybrid. The 5th Elizabeth gave power to justices with the churchwardens to assess compulsorily all those who were obstinate and would not give voluntarily. In ten years that Act came to an end. The parochial system was altogether ignored, and a state of things was established almost identical with the condition of things which would be in existence if the present Bill became law. By the 14th Elizabeth the magistrates of each county were required to separate their counties into divisions, and the justices residing in each division were required to levy a rate in that division to be applied to the support of the poor, those divisions being almost analogous to the unions of the present day. That Act was in operation for thirty years. Then followed a great many provisions which remained in existence at the present day. It was impossible for anybody to peruse these Acts of Parliament without being aware that it was the intention of the Legislature that, persons should contribute fairly according to the rateable property they possessed, and not according to particular localities or parishes. The Act of Elizabeth established no law of settlement and gave no power of removal—the right to relief attached wherever the necessity for relief arose. There were various Acts of Parliament between the Act of Elizabeth and the Act of 1834, all having the object of equalizing the rates as between parishes, and the law of settlement was intended to prevent inequality among parishes, though it was quite true that in the course of time its effect had been to provoke the inequality which it was passed to counteract. The hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Sir Rainald Knightley) seemed to grumble that the towns would benefit by this Bill, and escape from part of their present burden. The hon. Member said if the labourers did not reside in the parish where they worked, and became chargeable to that in which they resided, the latter got a quid pro quo in the expenditure of the labourers' wages. The expenditure of a labourer was in bread, bacon, and beer. And who were the producers of those articles? It was said that where the population was, property increased in some places a hundredfold; but if so, the rates would increase also. The hon. Member for Lincolnshire (Mr. Banks Stanhope) asked, if it would not be most unjust if, in case the 2,000 hands employed by a firm in Lincoln required parish relief, the agricultural parishes should assist in supporting them? The hon. Gentleman who used that illustration was rather unfortunate in the instance he had selected, for the large firm in question were employed in making implements in order that the agriculturists might more profitably cultivate their lands. In former days the village blacksmith made their implements, and if he became a pauper they would have been obliged to support him. It had been said by the

hon. Member for Northamptonshire that by increasing the area of rating they would diminish the responsibility of the guardians; but if the area was not too large for the purpose of management, how could it be too large for the purpose of rating? A union rate was not analogous to a national rate. A national rate was not the principle involved in this Bill. Some appeared to think that this was a step towards a national rate. But it was nothing of the sort. It was a measure of justice. It restored matters to the original principle that those occupying rateable property whether in one parish or another should contribute pro rata, according to their means, to the relief of the poor. He trusted that the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Northamptonshire would not be adopted, which would be the next thing to rejecting the measure altogether.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he entirely supported the principle of the measure, and could not vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire merely because it would seem a certain Report had not been read by the whole body of the House. This was not a question that had come suddenly upon the country, nor was this a Bill that could be said to be unexpected. The country in fact had long been disciplined into the belief that some such measure must of necessity follow the legislation which had already taken place. The hon. Member who argued against this Bill appeared to think that nothing had been done in the direction in which this Bill aimed, and that this had been the first attempt to equalize the burdens between the different parishes. Why, on several occasions measures have been passed by this House the effect of which would be to shift the liability of property; and notably in 1861 an extensive measure was passed, by which rather more than one-fourth of the union charge was thrown upon the common fund. A still greater change was effected by the Bill which was passed in the following year; and these combined acts placed nearly one-half of the whole charge upon the common fund. Was it rational, therefore, to think that the House was not prepared for the measure now before it? Ever since the passing of the Poor Law Amendment Act, in 1836, we had experienced the disadvantage of the combined parochial and union system. There was hardly a Session of Parliament in which some amendment had not been made in the Poor Law—all arising from these systems not working together for the benefit of the poor, or according to the original intentions. Some parishes remained scarcely chargeable at all for the relief of the poor, and others became less chargeable than they had been, and it had therefore become necessary to amend the law. The measure passed in 1861 was an important one, and, as far as he knew—and he had had as much experience in the working of the system as most country gentlemen—the evils which formerly existed had been much mitigated, and in the unions with which he was connected much satisfaction was felt at the operation of the present law, as being a great improvement upon that which previously existed. The arguments of the hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. Banks Stanhope) did not at all apply in this matter. He stated that he was afraid the poor would suffer by this measure, and he wanted to know what would become of the bad labourer. The misfortune of the present system was that it encouraged the employment of the drunkard and the idle person. But this would not be so if the area were not so restricted. The proposed measure would produce a great moral effect; it would not only conduce to the better health of the labourers, but it would have a tendency to discountenance the employment of undeserving men, and at the same time the position of the good labourer would be much improved. The parochial system was a merely nominal affair—parish officers did nothing unless they were instructed by the guardians—the system embarrassed the operations of the board of guardians very considerably, while it in no way added to the benefit of the poor. Having destroyed the parochial system altogether he should be extremely glad to find that the House was prepared to establish an efficient union system. This would be the only solution of the difficulty. They would then have guardians who would have no conflicting interests, but who would go to their boards to carry out a uniform system with a common object, and the important institutions for the maintenance of the poor would be much better carried out than at present. The burdens would be far more justly distributed. He had no hesitation in saying that he would give his support to the second reading of this Bill, and he was extremely sorry that any attempt should have been made to delay such a beneficial measure.

LORD HENLEY said, he would deal with this question apart from any party considerations whatever. The Bill was opposed for want of information, which hon. Members could easily obtain by seeking it in the records of the unions to which they belonged. If the information were put before each Gentleman separately with respect to his own union, no doubt he would be able to judge how far it would affect the parishes in the union. It was simply a question of unions. It was impossible to live in a rural district without taking a great interest in those matters concerning the maintenance of the poor. He had looked into the working of the Act of 1861, and regarded it as a considerable improvement upon the previous law, as it made all the parishes contribute towards the common fund of the union in proportion to the rateable value of the property in the parish, and not in proportion to the money expended in the relief of the poor during any given year. That was a step in the right direction; but the Act did not go far enough in making close parishes contribute to the relief of the poor in their own district. The Bill now before the House was aimed at that particular object, and would more thoroughly carry out the intention of the Act of 1861. Its effect would be to remedy many of the evils at present existing. The employers of labour in close parishes kept their men as long as they were strong and healthy, but the moment they became old and infirm they were thrown upon the rates of those parishes which were already over-peopled and over-rated. In his own union, out of twenty-eight parishes three were what were called close parishes. The rateable value of the three was £8,077 a year. Before the Act of 1861 those three parishes combined only contributed £16 a year to the support of the poor. The effect of the Act of 1861 was that those three parishes contributed just under £200 a year to the common fund of the union. This was about 6d. in the pound on the rates of those parishes; but could this be considered a sufficient contribution for them when there was a parish in the union that was paying nearly 6s. in the pound? He asserted that this was a great and grievous injustice. Nor was this an extraordinary case, for close parishes were to be found in many unions. It was said that there were grass lands in many of these parishes, and that comparatively few labourers were employed in consequence. He should, however, like to know whether an amount of produce that gave a rateable value of £8,000 a year, or a gross produce of about £25,000, could be obtained without raising a great quantity of beef, mutton, dairy produce, and corn, and without employing a considerable quantity of labour? What would be the effect in his union if this Bill passed? The close parishes, which now paid a rate of 6*d.* in the pound, would, in common with the other parishes of the union, pay a rate of about 1*s.* 5*d.* or 1*s.* 6*d.* in the pound. That would not be an excessive amount of poor rate for any parish to pay; and considering that there was a parish in the union now paying 5*s.* or 6*s.* in the pound, it would not be inequitable if such a uniform rate were distributed over the whole union. It was not unreasonably argued that, under the present measure, it would be to the interest of proprietors to build a certain number of cottages suitable for their labourers, and that the poor would be benefited thereby. An objection had, however, been raised that small proprietors would be stimulated to build more cottages than were wanted, and thus flood the union with labourers. But it was very rare to find a union overpopulated. He scarcely ever recollected such a case, for any such district was soon relieved by the excess of labour going to the nearest towns. Another objection to the Bill was that a want of economy would be occasioned by the new system, and that the guardians would not be so careful in administering the union rate, because the money would not come out of the rates of their own parish. He did not see any very great difficulty upon this point. A guardian was now very much interested in keeping down the relief to any poor man from his own parish, and under the new system he might be anxious to give as much as possible, knowing that it would come out of the union fund. But then all the other guardians would be a check upon the guardians of a particular parish. He believed, too, that parishes would be more interested in sending their guardians to the Board meetings than hitherto, and that there would be a larger attendance than at present. Another apprehension was entertained in regard to labourers not quite able-bodied or strong, who were now employed by the parishes at a moderate rate of wages on the roads, &c., rather than allow them to fall on the rates. It was feared that this class of labourers would be thrown out of work. He did not believe this would be the case, or that the guardians would be so extravagant as to have no regard for the purse of the union. The relief of the poor was so well understood, and had become so much a matter of routine, that things would go on under the new law very much as they did at present. He supported the Bill with great satisfaction, believing that it would be a great benefit to all, except those landlords and parishes which had for ages shirked their proper amount of help to the poor.

MR. SCOURFIELD wished to know how this measure would affect the existing areas of unions—a subject which had not yet been alluded to. Many parishes had great reason to complain of the way in which they were annexed to particular unions; and although there was a power by law of detaching them and of annexing them to other unions, there were difficulties in the way of such a step for the majority bound the minority, and the authorities in London were usually unwilling to make a change. If the present Bill became law this difficulty would be very much enhanced, and it would be almost impossible for a parish, whatever reason it might have for complaint, to detach itself from the union. In the county of Anglesea there were, for example, twenty or thirty parishes annexed to unions in the county of Carnarvon, because Anglesea was unwilling to build a union workhouse. He should certainly like to know whether the question of the areability of the unions was to be considered simultaneously with the passage of this Bill. He should be sorry to go so far as to vote for the rejection of this Bill, for Parliament had been travelling in the direction of union rating, and they could not pronounce that to be unjust which had been in practice for some years; but he still thought that those who advocated caution had some reason for what they said. Sums of 1*s.* and 1*s.* 6*d.* in the pound were talked of with a freedom which might make the Chancellor of the Exchequer lick his lips, and which was hardly consistent with the sensitiveness shown by Parliament when 1*d.* or 2*d.* in the pound of Income-tax was spoken of. He would point out a manifest evil which would in certain cases follow from the passing this measure. In the case of mineral property, under the operation of this Bill, a dreadful accident occurring in a colliery by which large numbers of persons were rendered destitute might throw very onerous burdens upon a parish which had never derived the slightest advantage from their labour. He feared that very few instances of liberality could be looked for similar to that which occurred in the county of Glamorgan, where a large landed proprietor, and the Gentleman having the largest interest in the works, both Members of that House, took upon themselves the support of all the persons injured by a tremendous explosion in their district. The direct rejection of this Bill might be too strong a measure; but unless he heard something to shake his opinion, he felt inclined to vote for the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Northamptonshire.

MR. JOHN TOLLEMACHE said, he believed the House would act in a much fairer and more straightforward manner if it at once either passed or threw out the Bill. He did not think they required any further information upon the subject. On the contrary, he believed that they were already inundated with information. He felt persuaded that the present Bill was a natural consequence of the passing of the Act of 1846. After the passing of that Act it was perfectly clear that they were moving in the direction of union rating and union chargeability. Under the law as it had since existed, vast numbers of paupers were removed from the townships to which they belonged to adjoining townships, for the purpose of being converted into paupers chargeable on the common fund. There could be no doubt that the present measure would relieve heavily burdened townships at the expense of townships more happily circumstanced. That change would be felt to a great extent in the southern division of Cheshire, which he represented; but so satisfied was he that the Bill was essentially a just one, and that all property in a union ought to contribute to the support of the poor, according to its rateable value, that he should feel it his duty to vote for the second reading in spite of the unpopularity which he knew, from the letters he received, that step would bring down upon him in South Cheshire on the approach of a general election.

MR. SCULLY said, that this Bill so far affected Ireland that if it became law in England a similar measure would have to be brought forward next Session for Ireland. He agreed with the noble Lord the Member for Northamptonshire (Lord Henley) that the Bill, instead of leading to any want of vigilance on the part of the guardians, would have an opposite effect; and his experience in Ireland led him to believe that uniform rating would tend greatly to the reduction of rates over the whole union, or electoral division as it was in Ireland. With exceptions such as the hon. Member for Cheshire (Mr. Tollemache) who had last spoken, it seemed to him that Members representing large counties opposed, while those representing boroughs supported, the Bill. His constituents had left him perfectly free to act in the matter as he thought best, and though his personal interests were bound up with the rural districts, he did not think that such considerations as were represented by a few thousands a year ought to stand in the way of adopting a general principle highly advantageous to the public at large. Several hon. Members had advocated the postponement of the measure on account of their want of information; but it was just those hon. Gentlemen who appeared to possess the most intimate knowledge of the subject. He would support the Bill, because he maintained that a man when thrown out of employment ought to receive support from the district to the benefit of which he had contributed his life of toil. It would be difficult to prove the justice of the old plan as between parish and parish in England; but in the case of Irishmen who had been working in England all their lives the principle was still more harsh and unjustifiable.

MR. PUGH said, he would add another county Member to those who supported this Bill. Since it was read the first time he had ascertained that it was cordially approved by the guardians of the union, whose meetings he was accustomed to attend when he was in the country. It was their opinion, in which he concurred, that much time was consumed and even ill-feeling engendered, by disputes between parishes as to the proper settlement of paupers. These disputes would be terminated by this Bill, to the great advantage of the Board, and to the still greater advantage of the poor themselves; for a strong inducement to their removal in certain cases would be taken away. He himself was one of those who thought that the area of chargeability might be enlarged still further than was contemplated by this measure, and that the change would be attended with great benefit to all classes, but more especially to the agricultural interest. That question, however, did not now arise; but he had much pleasure in supporting the Bill, not only on account of its own intrinsic merits, which were great, but because it was a step in the right direction. The measure would tend to remedy evils which were not the growth of yesterday, but of centuries gone by; it would promote good feeling between landlords and tenants, between masters and their workmen, and thus be generally conducive to the welfare of the poorer classes. He had no hesitation in saying that the union with which he was best acquainted would thank the right hon. Gentleman and the Government for the passing of this Bill. It was said by the first Napoleon, writing on the subject of the Poor Laws to the Minister of the Interior—

"It is melancholy to see time passing away without being put to its full value. Surely in a matter of this kind we should endeavour to do something, that we may say that we have lived, that we have not lived in vain, that we may leave some impress of ourselves on the sands of time."

The words of the great were precepts for future ages. He admitted that in the administration of the Poor Laws this country was very far in advance of France—

Illic sera rubens accendit lumina Vesper :"—

yet those words might be applicable to ourselves. If they had had information on this subject enough and to spare—if it were clear that this measure was a good one and fraught with great advantages to the community at large—if they were all agreed as to the object that they had in view, why should they temporize or hesitate when public expediency, public policy, and the interests of the poorer classes themselves imperatively required them to proceed?

MR. FLOYER said, the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken (Mr. Pugh) had not gone into any details as to the effect of the measure which would induce him to take the same view as the hon. and learned Gentleman did. The hon. and learned Member for Cork (Mr. Scully), following the right hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill, said that the Bill would lead to more vigilance and less expenditure, and the right hon. Gentleman, in support of his view, referred to the example of the great metropolitan unions. That example rather alarmed him. He thought that if hon. Members would take the trouble to examine the Reports and Returns which were to be found in the library, they would see that the metropolitan unions held a position which was not only very alarming, but which was also entirely distinct from that occupied by the country unions. In the latter it would be found that of the relief given to the poor about three-fourths, or even a larger proportion, was distributed to the poor out of the workhouses. In the case of the metropolitan unions, however, it would be found that two-thirds, or nearly that amount, was administered in the shape of in-door relief. This was a practice which he hoped would not be extended to the country unions. No one could help noticing that in the course of the debate it had been remarked by many hon. Members that the poor exhibited the strongest disinclination to going into the workhouses. He believed that that feeling was not confined to the country poor, but that it prevailed equally among the poor of the metropolis; and, if that were so, it was easy to understand how much suffering, how many broken ties, had been caused by the fact that the great bulk of relief given in the metropolis was given in the workhouse. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board, in introducing the Bill, had put the question very fairly as resting mainly upon its effect upon the poor. Of course the other question of how it would affect the ratepayers could not be left entirely out of sight, but it was known that there was a reciprocity of interest; that what affected the poor affected indirectly the ratepayers, and vice versa. The right hon. Gentleman, in considering the question as it affected the poor, dwelt upon the great evils of removal upon the labouring classes. Upon that point he did not entirely disagree with the right hon. Gentleman, as in many cases removals were productive of much hardship. But that was not universally the case. In many instances removal was really an advantage to the poor. In the country there were what were called "good parishes," and if the right of removal was taken away the poor affected would consider that they had been deprived of an advantage. He would, however, concede that removal was generally an evil to the poor. But what was the case as to that question of removal? At the time of the passing of the original Poor Law Act, in 1834, the amount of expenditure for orders of removal and the carrying out of such vocate of the principle of union rating; but if this Bill were passed in its present shape it would occasion a large transfer of property; and before they proceeded further with it the House should be in possession of information showing the nature and extent of such transfer. In most changes of the law, the effect of the change has to be guessed at, but in this case Returns might easily have been prepared by the clerks to the Boards of Guardians, shewing the exact amount of the burden which would be taken off one parish and laid upon others. As the Government had not laid such information before them, Members had been obliged to procure for themselves such information as they could. He had Returns before him from two unions in his own neighbourhood. The first was called the Great Oaseburn Union, in which there were forty-two townships. If this Bill were carried into effect, one of the parishes in this union would suffer an increase in the rating of 114 per cent, another of 145 per cent, a third of 160 per cent, and a fourth of 166 per cent. On the other hand, in one parish there would be a diminution of the rating to the extent of 1s. 1½d. in the pound, being a reduction of three-fifths of its present amount. This might not appear to involve a very important alteration; but, as the poor rate was now levied upon the actual value of property, 1d. in the pound of poor rate was upon real property, the same thing as 1d. in the pound of income tax. In the Knaresborough Union very much the same consequences would result from the adoption of this measure. In many cases there would be an increase of 6d., and in one a decrease of 7½d. in the pound. Now suppose the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his forthcoming budget were to propose to take off the whole of the 6d. income tax, that measure would be hailed with surprise and satisfaction. On the other hand, if the right hon. Gentleman proposed to add 6d. to the income tax in the time of peace and with an overflowing exchequer, his announcement would occasion a sensation of a very different character. But if the right hon. Gentleman were to propose to take sixpence in the pound off one man's property without receiving any consideration for so great a boon, and to add this sixpence to another property, the owners of which had done nothing to justify this increased burden, he (Mr. Thompson) would ask what chance such a measure would have of passing through its very first stage? Yet this Bill would do even more than this, relieving property in one parish he had quoted to the extent of 13½d. in the pound at the expense of the neighbouring parishes. The great change in the incidence of the poor rate which would be occasioned by this Bill would take place in the towns. The agricultural districts would not be greatly affected except that they would all have to share the burden thrown upon them by the reductions in the towns. It was well known that towns were rated higher than the country, which arose from the magnitude and variety of business carried on in the former, from the small shop-keeper to the large manufacturer who employed hundreds of hands. These hands when disabled by age or infirmity, were thrown on the rates, whilst the profits of the business which brought them together were not rateable, and, therefore, contributed nothing towards their support. If, then, this surplus taxation were to be transferred from the towns to the property in the country, he thought it would be better to go back at once to the ancient principle of every one contributing according to his ability, being that which was the foundation of the original Poor Law. Such a principle would be far more just and more statesmanlike than that recognized by the present Bill—namely, the principle of transferring the burden of the poor rates from the owners of real property in towns to the owners of real property in the country. Although more heavily taxed the value of real estate increased more rapidly in towns than it did in the country, and, therefore, being of a more elastic character, it was better able to bear the burden of supporting its own poor. And further, in the purchase of town property the large amount of the poor rates had been taken into consideration, so that the purchaser was not entitled to complain of them as though they were lately imposed. It was important in determining whether the Bill should be postponed or not until next Session to see what the effect of such postponement would be. One of the principal objects of the Bill was to relieve the poor man from the annoyances to which he was subjected by removal and the parishes from the expense incurred by them in litigation resulting from such removals, and recollecting that recent legislation had greatly diminished the number of such removals, and that this

Bill did not affect the removal of paupers from one union to another, he believed that the poor man would suffer little or no injury by the postponement of the present Bill to another Session. If the right hon. Gentleman were to introduce a Bill that would limit the term of residence that should render the poor irremovable, to, say twelve months, he (Mr. Thompson) would give it his cordial support; but it was so undesirable to be always legislating upon this subject, that he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would, in case of the Amendment being carried, withdraw his Bill for this Session. If the House were then furnished with Returns showing the effect of the late Act which shortened the term of industrial residence and also showing the exact nature of the changes which would be made throughout the country by the operation of the Bill, as well as those Returns of a very interesting nature to which the right hon. Gentleman had alluded, but of which the House was not yet in possession, hon. Members would be able, between this and next Session, to obtain such information upon the question as would enable them to approach it in the ensuing Parliament with a thorough knowledge of all its details. Among other matters which would require attention was the rectification of the union boundaries. The present unions were not constructed with the view of forming areas for raising large taxation, and before bringing in a Bill of this kind they should be reconsidered and rectified. Some of them had been originally Gilbert unions, and were both inconvenient and ill-shaped. The union in which he resided was shaped as much like a star-fish as anything else he could think of. A great deal had been said about close parishes, and they had frequently been made the subject of sensation speeches, but very few had ever seen them, if the description given of them in this debate was a true one—namely, that they drove the labourers miles from their work, and compelled them to herd together in the suburbs of towns, to the great injury both of their health and morals. All he could say was, that in the northern counties, with which he was connected, there was great difficulty in getting labourers, and so far from driving them away they wished to encourage them. He knew instances where labourers had declined good comfortable cottages close to their labour, because they preferred living in the village in order that they might have the advantage of the shops and the help one neighbour gives to another. As chairman of the North Eastern Railway, he had had a Return made of all the cottages occupied by the labourers of the company in Northumberland, Durham, and Yorkshire, in order to ascertain the real state they were in, together with the number of rooms in each House, and the number of lodgers, if any, in each house. The company owned from 1,100 to 1,200 cottages, almost all of which had two or three good sleeping-rooms; and much to his annoyance he found that in some cases the father, mother, and two or three children slept in the sitting-room down stairs from choice rather than occupy the comfortable bedrooms upstairs; and so far from these houses being crowded, very few of them had lodgers. Therefore, it seemed to him, the allegation that labourers were driven to herd together in towns at a distance from their work was unsupported by facts, although exceptional cases of the kind might occur. Would not the stream of labourers leaving the towns in the morning and returning to them in the evening attract attention, if the statement were true that while they worked in the country they lived in the towns? But who ever saw such a thing, except in the case of a few Irish labourers engaged in harvesting or in hop picking? In conclusion he again expressed a hope that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Villiers) would withdraw for this Session the measure he had introduced and would give them the Returns he had asked for.

MR. BERNARD said, having had occasion to address the House in the early part of the last Session on moving for leave to bring in a Bill of a similar purport to that now before them, and having been induced to withdraw that Bill on the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board that the subject would shortly be brought under the consideration of the Government, he wished to express how much he was gratified at the prompt manner in which this assurance had been carried out, and how ardently he hoped that the Bill now before them would pass successfully through the different stages of Parliamentary inquiry. After the able and clear exposition of the evils attending on parochial rating given by the right hon. President it would be presumptuous of him to occupy much of the time of the House by making any statement of his own. As he stated last year, twenty years ago he filled the office of Chairman of the Board of Guardians of the Aylesbury Union, of forty parishes, which were entirely agricultural, and during the time he held that office he had the means of ascertaining and convincing himself of the very many evils which attended the existing system of parochial rating. Some of those evils had been since removed, but the most mischievous of them still remained, which was the main cause of the depopulation of many agricultural villages, and greatly aggravated the hardships endured by the agricultural labourer. Out of the forty-two parishes comprised in the Aylesbury Union he selected four of the exclusive kind, containing in the aggregate nearly 5,000 of the best acres in the county. These parishes in 1851 contained a population of 163, but in 1861 it had decreased to 126, being at the rate of about 25 per cent in ten years; but the aggregate population of the union had in that period increased 2 per cent; so the decrease was not owing to any emigration from the district. Now the only way to cure the evil was the adoption of union chargeability. Now practical farmers had assured him that to cultivate good land properly it required three able-bodied men to every 100 acres, and one able-bodied man in a population of five had always been considered a good average. It would, therefore, require nearly 150 men to cultivate the lands of those four parishes; but the whole population being only 126, they could only furnish twenty-five, and above 100 must be sought for in other parishes. The cause of that state of things was notoriously the desire of parishes to shift the burden of supporting the sick and infirm from their own shoulders. But the effect was to produce both physical and moral degradation among the labouring classes. There were some gentlemen who supposed that union rating must be attended with a diminution of the value of the land in exclusive parishes; but, from having paid great attention to the subject, he was fully convinced that such would not be the case. They all knew that the great burden of the rates was produced by the necessity of supporting the sick and infirm, and any system that was calculated to diminish the number of that unhappy class of persons must in proportion diminish the amount of rate to be raised. On this point he would read an extract of a letter from Mr. Ceely, a medical gentleman of great eminence residing in the town of Aylesbury—

“ In the course of more than forty years’ professional observation I have very often had to deplore the effects of the additional toil imposed upon agricultural labourers who have to travel two, three, and four miles night and morning to and from the seat of their employment. I have witnessed many cases of severe and protracted illness, premature infirmity, and even death induced by this cause. There can be no doubt but that a labourer’s services are more valuable and his health better preserved when he resides within the precincts of his labour. I should advocate union rating on this very ground.”

He had been in communication with many farmers occupying lands in those exclusive parishes, and they all deplored the inconvenience that they were subjected to from their labourers living in distant parishes. The habit of early marriages was so prevalent with the poor that it was almost impossible for them to have any but boys and very young lads residing in their houses to act as labourers, and very few of these were to be trusted in looking after cattle and the other necessary duties of a farm. It was notorious that the cultivation of land in those parishes was far inferior to that of other parishes, especially in draining and fencing. But a right hon. Gentleman gave it as his opinion, when the Bill was first presented to the House, that it would cause an increased demolition of cottages. On what grounds the right hon. Gentleman had founded his opinion he was at a loss to conceive. From his own observation, and the opinions of all the practical men to whom he had spoken, he had arrived at a directly opposite conclusion, and he had presented a petition from Aylesbury, signed by every member of the Board of Guardians assembled on a particular day, in favour of the Bill. He had been assured by many farmers that if some general measure of union rating became law they would willingly assist their landlords in building cottages by digging stone and carting materials, whereby half the cost might be diminished. Those farmers were of opinion that any slight increase of their rates would be amply compensated for by the advantages attendant on this measure. One of the evils that had grown out of the present system was the existence of a class of low speculative builders, who boasted that in building tenements for the poor, they could in ten or twelve years reimburse themselves both the principal and interest of their outlay. This could only be done by screwing enormous rents out of the labouring poor, who with diminished wages, arising from their inability of giving a full day's labour to their employers, were obliged to submit to the extortion. He must remind those hon. Gentlemen who desired a great extension of the elective franchise that the bettering the condition of the labouring classes was essential to the success of their measure, for it would be unsafe to intrust men with the elective franchise who were treated as outcasts to be driven from the parishes where their families had resided at the first convenient opportunity. It was a very agreeable thing for a gentleman to have on his property a pretty and pleasant village in which there were no poor people—it was a sentimental thing to take ladies to view such a charming sight; but we must not forget the 15,000 parishes of England, in so many of which there was no resident proprietor. He hoped this Bill would become law, for he was convinced that it was one which must tend to better the condition of the labourer.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, he was glad one hon. Member of the House had been found beside the right hon. Gentleman himself, who was entirely in favour of the Bill, for the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down was the only speaker in the debates who had not made objections to the proposal of his right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board. It was of much service that great social questions, like the present, should be discussed in the tone and temper which had been shown on the present occasion. He regretted he could not agree to the Bill which had been laid on the table. There were two aspects in which the measure had to be viewed—first, whether it would be to the financial advantage of the rate-payers of the country, and next, what was of paramount importance—whether it would be for the benefit of the poor. A good deal had been said about the residences and habits of the agricultural poor, and the question whether the poor were decently located, had been frequently discussed in that House. The right hon. Gentleman took power in the Bill—a proposal in which he (Sir John Trollope) agreed—to prevent the removal of the poor from one parish to another in the same union. But in all well-managed unions this had been hitherto practically the case. In the union in which he (Sir John Trollope) lived he could not call to mind a single removal under the order of the justices—and for this reason, that if poor became chargeable to a union a communication was made to the officials of the union to which he legally belonged, and the latter accepted such if there was a valid reason for the removal. With regard to the law of settlement it would be better, instead of this sweeping measure, if the right hon. Gentleman would take power to abolish the law of settlement and the power of removal altogether, and let the poor man and his family be chargeable wherever he was found in a state of destitution. If that were done a most painful process would at once be got rid of. But this Bill would disturb the relations of property, and introduce contentions between town and country. The hon. Member for Boston (Mr. Staniland) had presented a petition in favour of this measure from his constituents. But why was that? Simply because it would give them a boon of £2,000 in remission of poor rate. But he himself (Sir John Trollope) had presented petitions from the rural parishes of the Boston Union in entirely the opposite sense, simply on the ground that that £2,000 would be cast upon them. They took an entirely financial ground, and discussed the question, not as it affected the poor, but as it affected themselves. If this measure were passed into law, the President of the Poor Law Board would have to undertake what had just been hinted at by the Member for Whitby (Mr. Thompson), a revision of the whole boundaries of Poor Law Unions, which, like parochial boundaries, might be said to be altogether arbitrary. That was another reason why this Bill should be deferred for another year. The question opened out such a vista of difficulties that it really would be advisable for the Government to withdraw the measure, and allow it to be discussed in another Session. It was often said that a great reason for extending rating to unions was that better residences for the poor would then be provided. The hon. Member who spoke last said that gentlemen often built fancy cottages, and pretty dairies, which they took the ladies who visited them round to see; but for many years it had been the practice on all well-managed estates to build good substantial cottages. The late Dukes of Bedford and Northumberland had built cottages—not show places, but good substantial residences for their labourers—not by dozens or scores, but by hundreds; and their example had been largely followed. But unfortunately, many properties were held by people who were not in a condition to do this—some were in the hands of minors, some of trustees, and some were in Chancery, where cottages were more likely to be pulled down than built. An hon. and learned Friend on his right (Mr. Malins) seemed to dissent from that, but he was afraid it was only too capable of proof. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that a Report would soon be before them as to the miserable condition of the cottages of the agricultural population, which would perfectly appal them. In his experience, he certainly had never heard a Minister of State, in the right hon. Gentleman's position, quote a Report which had never been published. The right hon. Gentleman said it was on the table. Well, he could not see it, nor did he think any one was in a condition to have read it, not having been printed or distributed to Members. But had a similar inquiry been instituted as to the condition of the dwellings of artificers and labouring men in large towns? However limited might be the accommodation of the cottages of the agricultural poor, they were far exceeded in squalor, dirt, and misery, by the dwellings of the poor in the great cities, where storey upon storey, whole families lived, slept, and cooked in the same room. He ventured to say that such were the habits of cleanliness and decency among the agricultural poor that nobody need fear entering their dwellings from a dread of filth or contamination. Speaking for himself, he had never pulled down a ruinous cottage without building two in its stead, and he believed that was the practice largely. He had everywhere seen springing up new cottages, not such as were run up of flimsy materials, by speculators, and let at a high rent, but built by landowners who deemed it their duty to see their labourers properly housed. This could not be done by legislation, it must be left to the right feeling of those who were connected with these classes. The hon. Member for Boston (Mr. Staniland) was for going into the first principles of rating; and no doubt wealth flowed now in very many more and different channels than in the reign of Elizabeth. There were not then the mining interests which were exempt from poor rates; there was not that great bulk of personal property which was now exempt; nor was there the commercial and manufacturing wealth of which England was so proud. That was not taxed for the relief of the poor,

but only the warehouse in which it was stored. The moment the manufacture became unprofitable the key was turned in the door, and the landowners were taxed to support the poor who were thus turned from work. The hon. Member for Worcestershire (Mr. Knight) would include them all in his net, and would place a large proportion of the charge for the poor on the Consolidated Fund. He (Sir John Trollope) would object, however, quite as much as the Chancellor of the Exchequer to this, because then all control over the expenditure would be lost. As to the question whether this Bill ought to be taken without further inquiry, he had not only presented petitions, but he had received many more letters from persons asking to have the Bill adjourned, that they might consider it, and make up their minds whether they should petition or not. Then there was the grave question to be considered, if the right hon. Gentleman threw the rate upon whole unions, where would he stop? The right hon. Gentleman told them of the effect which this Bill would have on the City of London—on the ninety parishes of the City, where all the warehouses and palaces were, and where nobody dwelt—why should he not include the whole metropolis? No doubt many of the poor parishes would not be at all sorry to be thus joined on to the rich. To throw the burden on the Consolidated Fund would take the control of the relief of the poor out of the hands of those who administer it gratuitously, and place it in the hands of paid officials, and open the way to all kinds of jobbery. But if the question was to be enlarged as regarded country unions, why not apply the principle on a larger scale? Then it would not become a question of a double or treble income tax; but perhaps, after all, it would approach far nearer to a measure of justice than the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. NEATE said, there were numerous cases in which injustice was wrought which the present Bill would cure without introducing any injustice to other classes. One point where the injustice existed was when those who had given their labour to fertilize the land in one parish were sent to encumber the rates of others; and if there was a transfer of liability effected by this Bill it was a just transfer, which gave to those who suffered from it no right for a moment to stop the progress of this measure, for the law of this country did not sanction the existence of a right which grew out of a wrong. There was a precedent for this Bill in the legislation of 1846, when a great transfer of burdens took place. That transfer, as effected by the 9 & 10 Vict., was for the benefit of the country at the expense of the town. It increased very largely the burdens of the manufacturing towns; but nothing was heard then about the injustice of this transfer of burdens. On the contrary, Sir George Lewis admitted that it was a transfer, and no objection was taken to it on that ground; and the same view was adopted, and its justice shown by Mr. Pashley in his book on the Poor Law. In the present case it was not right that the burden of supporting the poor should be thrown upon parishes where they did not work, but happened to reside. No doubt, some injustice would arise if an agricultural parish were tacked on to a town parish. But this difficulty—which might probably be got over—should not deter the House from adopting a reform in the interest of the labourers—in all legislation of this kind there would be cases of individual hardship, but there would be great benefit to the whole class. It was probable that the measure might lead for a time to a considerable increase of paupers. No doubt, the parochial system put a pressure upon owners of property to give employment to labourers in order to avoid the necessity of supporting them out of the rates. He thought, however, that a measure which was clearly for the benefit of the most industrious and competent labourers must be for the benefit of the whole class, and for those and other reasons he should give the second reading of the Bill his most hearty concurrence.

MR. ADDERLEY: I hold in my hand a letter that in itself gives sufficient ground for the postponement of this Bill. I do not in any way ask for further information, but on the information we have, there is a necessity for certain preliminary steps before the Bill is allowed to pass. I do not oppose the Bill on the ground that has been alleged—of injustice to certain parishes. I believe there is a certain amount of injustice of a temporary and partial character, but I believe that no great measure of this kind can be passed without temporary and partial injustice. Acknowledging that injustice fully, I weigh against it the great benefit to the poor and the public, which I conceive to be contained in the measure. But in order to bring in a Bill of this kind, which, after all, does not press for immediate passing, there is no need to create more injustice than must necessarily attach to it. I have here a letter from the guardians of three rural parishes seven miles from Birmingham, united with Aston, which is half Birmingham, in one union. The result of the Bill in this case would be, without some preliminary arrangement, that the town would swamp the rural parishes, and there would be an equalization of the rate on a most unequal area. There would in this case not only be the injustice of the town burdens being spread over the union, but also the injustice of the exemption for stock-in-trade lightening the common burden in the quarter to which it specially belonged, but there would also be the further advantage to the town of the exemption from rating of iron mines. This is no solitary case, but there are many where a preliminary adjustment of the boundaries of unions should take place before the Bill could pass. There is another question—whether we should not, before so legislating, consider the exemptions themselves, and whether they cannot be amended or abolished. I see another disadvantage in the Bill as it is proposed to be applied to unions of town and country parishes. The extension of the area of rating will lead the guardians of individual parishes to be negligent, and leave the matter in the hands of the most active representatives of the union, and the guardians of the towns, in the cases I have referred to, will probably have almost the whole management of the unions in their hands, and will use it to the advantage of the town parishes. On these grounds I feel, allowing the advantages of the Bill, I may fairly vote with those who seek its postponement. I do not deny that the present law frequently drives the poor of the agricultural districts to live in the towns at a distance from their work, and quite as much drives the workers in the towns to reside in the rural districts. I know such is the case in Staffordshire and Warwickshire; in these cases the Bill would be an advantage, and would give the labourer greater freedom to reside near his work, or where he pleased. I only ask a postponement of the Bill, not opposing it; and without agreeing with the views of the Mover of the Amendment for the reasons I have stated, I feel the Bill ought not to pass until the boundaries of unions, and special exemptions, have been properly adjusted.

MR. WARNER said, he was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir John Trollope), the ex-President of the Poor Law Board, express himself so strongly in favour of the abolition of the Law of Settlement, and he entirely agreed with that right hon. Gentleman; but he could not understand how the hon. Baronet justified his own proposition that the Bill would unsettle the rights of property. It seemed now to be well understood, after the discussion which had taken place, that the reason of the opposition to the Bill was not the want of information, but the desire to maintain the parochial system in the relief of the poor. Now, he believed that it had been proved by overwhelming evidence that the parochial system was inadequate for the relief of the poor with justice to the ratepayer, and that some change was necessary. The hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Floyer) had with remarkable candour admitted that his opposition to the Bill was founded upon prejudice; and he told the House that while he was not prepared to speak positively of the feelings of the poor on this subject, he believed the poor man would prefer the security of the smaller and poorer area to that of the larger and wealthier, for the reason that the parish church was a more agreeable object to the eye than the union workhouse. There were in truth only two possible grounds on which the present parochial system could be defended—namely, the sentimental one taken up by the hon. Member for Dorsetshire, and the other was that of vested rights. But there was no foundation for the doctrine of vested rights as applied to the case of one parish being more lightly rated than another. Parliament had never recognized any such rights, and had never scrupled to interfere with peculiarities of that kind. The Act of 1846 was a great interference, by which a tax of £5,000 a year was laid upon Norwich, the city he represented. On another occasion Norwich, which was a union of itself, came before Parliament for an alteration of its Act; and when it was found that one part of the city had been exempted from poor rates, Parliament did not scruple to alter that arrangement. It was not considered a vested right. Parliament had never refused to set aside these so-called vested rights when called on to do so by the general interests of the country. The parochial system had always been oppressive to the poor man; it had been proved over and over again to obstruct his freedom in going about to get work; and it had prevented proper cottage accommodation being provided. It was equally burdensome to the ratepayers, taxing one district higher than another, and being full of anomalies. This Bill was a step in the right direction, well following up the important measure of two or three years ago, and he hoped that Parliament would pass it, and at the same time express an opinion in favour of a more extensive change, he would not say to the extent of national rating, but to county rating, which was not too large.

SIR WILLIAM MILES rose to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board, if, after the debate they had heard, he intended to press the Bill to a second reading? He would also ask the right hon. Gentleman, was he (Mr. C. P. Villiers) not originally, before the New Poor Law passed, one of the Commission of Inquiry? And had he not on every occasion since he had been in Parliament done everything he could to promote the principles of that Poor Law? And was not that Poor Law passed by a species of compromise? Did the House carry out all that the Commission of Inquiry recommended? He (Sir William Miles) believed that the Commissioners were one and all for a system of union rating; but how long a time elapsed after the passing of that Poor Law Act before they had the first Irremovability Bill? How long a time elapsed before any progress was made towards union rating? The right hon. Gentleman had given one instance, in which he said union rating had been carried out successfully; and that no doubt was true, but there were special reasons for that success. But what he and the country wanted to know was whether the House was to be called upon to affirm the principle of this Bill which totally altered every incidence of rating, which put on country parishes the burden of the towns, and that too upon the imperfect information they had before them? He had called on the right hon. Gentleman for certain information, and had proved to him how easily it could be obtained; but not a single atom, except to prove his own case, of that information, had the right hon. Gentleman laid on the table. It might be said that it should have been moved for; but they were convinced they should get what they required in ample time, and no doubt would have done so had not the second reading been settlement could be abolished without having recourse to the most desperate of all remedies—a national rate. For what was the whole theory of settlement founded upon? Was it not that a man's title to relief within a particular area should depend upon the locality in which he worked? Was not that the foundation of the whole? Why, then, should a settlement be unional rather than parochial? For this reason—that parishes, being so unequal in size and so different in circumstances, did not afford the poor man that protection which he ought to have unless his right to relief was to depend upon his place of work, and not his residence. Hon. Gentlemen all knew that the present law must operate as a premium for driving people from their place of work and compelling them to reside in distant parishes. That was the natural operation of the law. He did not think it was greatly abused at the present day. He could himself bear witness to the great growth of cottages in many places, and he believed that country gentlemen were becoming much more strongly alive than they had been before to the importance, not only to the poor man, but to themselves, of having good cottages upon their estates, and having their labourers as close at hand as possible. But there was no doubt that the natural tendency of the law, as it at present stood, was to offer a premium for obtaining work, not from one's own, but from some other parish in which the poor man might reside, and that was a great argument for an alteration of the law. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Floyer) had stated that since the Act of 1861 there was no longer the same inducement to landlords to pull down cottages which there had been before, because the mere fact of a poor man's residing in a cottage did not enable him to acquire a settlement. But the hon. Gentleman forgot to mention that, though the labouring man who lived in a cottage of less than £10 could not himself acquire a settlement, any children born to him might; and, therefore, the same motive existed for preventing him from obtaining a residence in the parish as before. As the House was anxious to come to a division he would not detain them by any further remarks. He would merely say that he should certainly give his hearty support to the second reading of the Bill.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he was quite ready to admit the great advantages which would result in an administrative point of view from the adoption of a larger area of rating than the present one. It would be a step in the direction of centralization, and, as the Poor Law system was founded upon that principle, great advantages from simplicity and facility of management would obviously be the result. But such advantages might be too dearly purchased, and as they were not at all aware of the price which they would have to pay, he should on that ground alone support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire. He would indeed go a step further, and say that he should vote for the Amendment not only on account of insufficient information, but because the attention of the country had not been called to the magnitude of the change proposed. It had been truly said that the country was well informed on the subject of union rating; but they were not well informed concerning the particular subject before the House, and there were two reasons for the general ignorance and apathy which prevailed on the subject; the one was the title which the right hon. Gentleman had given to the Bill, and the other the nature of the speech by which it had been introduced. If it had been called a Bill for the abolition of the parochial system and for the substitution of union rating, the country would have been greatly alarmed; but when the right hon. Gentleman called it the Union Chargeability Bill, the nature of the proposed enactment was not understood. Upon the introduction of the measure the right hon. Gentleman entered into a long statement of the evils of the law of removal and settlement. But this Bill would do nothing to relieve the poor man from those evils. It was perfectly true that removal from one parish to another within the same union was even now almost obsolete; but did the right hon. Gentleman propose to abolish the power of removing a man from one union to another? So far from it, that there were two clauses in the Bill for rendering a man liable to be punished as a rogue and vagabond if he returned to a union from which he had been removed. A union rating would no doubt go far to remedy the evils of close parishes. That he was willing to admit. But in the unions of the county which he had the honour to represent (Hampshire) it was not the fact that the towns would in all cases be re-were interested in it, it was this very question of union rating. He believed there was not a farmer in the country—certainly not in the county which he had the honour to represent—who had not already formed his opinions on the subject; and he was bound to say, to the credit of his own constituents, that it was not on the part of the farmers that he had generally found any objections raised to the measure. He must also notice an observation made by his right hon. Friend the Member for Lincolnshire (Sir John Trollope) who had expressed some surprise that so few speeches had been delivered in favour of that Bill. Surely it was very natural that this should be the case, because the Bill was one of so simple and so logical a nature in itself that he thought the onus probandi certainly lay upon those who objected to it. The measure was founded on very simple, very logical, and, he might almost say, unanswerable premisses. Its principle was, that the area of rating should coincide with the area of management. He supposed there was not a Member of that House who would dispute the converse of that proposition—namely, that the area of management should coincide with the area of rating. He would suppose that a certain area of rating was laid down, whether in the case of a county or any other territorial division. Surely no one would contend that the area of management ought to be of a different character, be it larger or smaller, than that of the area of rating; and, therefore, he thought that the onus probandi rested upon those who held that the area of rating should not be coincident with the area of management. He had always been in the habit of looking with some jealousy on the proceedings of Boards of Guardians. He seldom went near them, and he did not like them; and that on account of this very defect in the existing law, which the Bill proposed to remove, because they had the management of an area to which they did not in their capacity as managers contribute in an equal proportion. It appeared to him that a Board of Guardians was the nearest possible approach which the laws of this country permitted to the principle of Federal union adopted in the United States. It was a sort of mixed system which was never found in the long run to answer. A Board of Guardians met to administer two distinct descriptions of funds; the one the common fund, to which they all contributed in common; the other a separate set of funds, contributed by the different parishes. In fact, it was very much like a pic-nic, in which everybody put his finger in his neighbour's pie, whether the one which he brought himself was a good or a bad one. He remembered on one occasion being anxious as a magistrate to obtain a small modicum of relief for a poor old woman in his own parish, but the whole posse of guardians came down and denied her that relief; and he was obliged to use his authority as a magistrate, in conjunction with one of his Colleagues, in order to obtain it for her. That was the way in which he had observed Boards of Guardians act; and he was, therefore, anxious, if they were to have the union system, that the area of rating should be made to coincide with the area of management. He believed that all the objections which had been taken to that Bill resolved themselves into two classes, the one consisting of objections which concerned the ratepayers, and the other of objections which concerned the poor. As regarded the ratepayers the only objection worthy of notice was that which related to the redistribution of taxation. It was impossible to deny that in any case where taxation was to be redistributed some instances of hardship and apparent injustice must occur. But any hardship which might be occasioned under the present Bill was as nothing compared with what must happen in any national financial change whatever. There had been a vast redistribution of taxation of late years, and many persons had been compelled to contribute in a much larger proportion than before. What, then, was this trifle of £2,500,000 compared with the vast sums involved in the changes which had been made in the proportion between our direct and indirect taxation? But, as his hon. Friend the Member for Somersetshire (Sir William Miles) had said just now, this was not so much an urban or rural question as a poor man's question. And now just one word upon the bearing which it had on the interest, not of the ratepayer, but of the poor man. The whole question of the area of rating was intimately mixed up with the question of settlement. His hon. Friend was for abolishing settlement altogether. He (Mr. Walter) did not believe either in the possibility or expediency of such a plan. He did not believe that settlement could be abolished without having recourse to the most desperate of all remedies—a national rate. For what was the whole theory of settlement founded upon? Was it not that a man's title to relief within a particular area should depend upon the locality in which he worked? Was not that the foundation of the whole? Why, then, should a settlement be unional rather than parochial? For this reason—that parishes, being so unequal in size and so different in circumstances, did not afford the poor man that protection which he ought to have unless his right to relief was to depend upon his place of work, and not his residence. Hon. Gentlemen all knew that the present law must operate as a premium for driving people from their place of work and compelling them to reside in distant parishes. But in the unions of the county which he had the honour to represent (Hampshire) it was not the fact that the towns would in all cases be relieved at the expense of the country parishes. On the contrary, there were two remarkable instances in which the towns would have to pay a larger sum than at present, and, therefore, he was not willing to argue this question as one of pounds, shillings, and pence between town and country. The union in the county of Norfolk which had been referred to as showing the advantage of a number of parishes being absorbed into one union did not apply, inasmuch as that was a union which though consisting of eighty-six parishes contained only 17,000 inhabitants altogether, the population of the largest parish being 1,625, and any variation in their rating that might have existed previously to the formation of the union was exceedingly small. The abolition of the old law of parochial settlement was a very serious question, and ought not to be entertained by that House, unless the whole country was aware of what was going on. He should, therefore, support the Amendment of the hon. Baronet.

SIR ROBERT CLIFTON, who rose amid loud calls for a division, said he would not give any factious opposition to the Motion, but having looked carefully over the Bill he did not exactly understand its operation. There was one point which had not been mooted, and it was this—if a sum of money had been left in charity for the relief of the poor of any parish, how would the trustees be enabled to use that money in paying the rates as now proposed? It might be said that the trustees of the charity would have only to apply for powers to the Charity Commissioners. But he thought the trustees would be very unwilling to go either to the Court of Chancery or the Charity Commissioners. Some clause should be introduced giving the trustees powers to dispend this money, which had been entrusted to them by the patriotism of some members of the parish.

MR. HENLEY said, with reference to the complaint of the want of information, that the President of the Poor Law Board had stated that the House had all the information they could have if they waited. Now, he did not think that the right hon. Gentleman had been quite candid with the House in this matter. He quoted, he said, the Return of 1861. The House would recollect these were the words of the right hon. Gentleman; but the right hon. Gentleman knew as well as he did that that Return only contained information up to Lady-day, 1856. Now, was that fair dealing on the part of a Minister? What had happened since? All the great bearing of the Union charge and the irremovable charge had occurred since. Had he quoted from that Return, the right hon. Gentleman would, no doubt, have got up and asked what was the use quoting from a statement of nine years ago. But the right hon. Gentleman would not give any information at all. He said they might go and count it up in the library; but the right hon. Gentleman had all the information in his Office. [Mr. VILLIERS intimated dissent.] He shook his head. If not, if the right hon. Gentleman had not got it in his office, how could they have it in their library? He took the liberty of saying that he believed the right hon. Gentleman in his office had the information of what all the parishes were rated at two years ago and the expenses of each parish last year; it would, therefore, have been easy to calculate the result, which was the information desired; but it did not answer his purpose that the House should have that information. The question had been argued on three grounds—on what was called the completion of the Poor Law system, and to remedy its deficiencies; on the question of benefit to the poor; and the third was on the question of shifting burdens. He would take the last of these first. Every hon. Member who had spoken in favour of the Bill placed the question of shifting the burdens on the grounds of justice. They all said it was just to equalize the burden. Some hon. Members who used that argument had been open and candid with the House, and said it was a step in the direction of a universal charge and a national rating. But he would call the attention of those who had not gone that length to what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board. He said a few years ago to the hon. Member for Worcestershire, “you say that an Irremovable Bill would be sure to lead to an union rating—take that step and it will lead to a national rating.” On the same principle, now, might it not be said that this Bill would lead to a national rating? The hon. Member for the city of Oxford (Mr Neate) talked a great deal of equalizing burdens, and said there could be no right founded on a wrong—no length of time would sanction an inequality of this kind. But did not

that apply to all other descriptions of property after the lapse of a certain number of years? The land tax when it was made permanent some seventy or eighty years ago was supposed to be equal upon all land, that was no longer the case. Why, upon the hon. Gentleman's principle should not the land tax be equalized again? Why, then, was Lancashire to pay only a halfpenny in the pound, and Oxford 1s.? Where was the justice of that? If they were to begin equalizing, why not equalize that as well as other burdens? Then as to the shifting of burdens, no doubt all these questions were questions of degree. Statements were made in that House, perfectly true, no doubt, in the belief of those who made them, but they had no opportunity of testing them. What did the noble Lord the Member for Northampton (Lord Henley) say? He said there were three parishes the valuation of which was about £8,000 a year, and the additional burden on them would be £400 a year. Now, an additional burden of £400 a year was equivalent to a capital sum of £12,000. That was the extent of the penalty imposed on those parishes. Then the noble Lord said if they put that fine of £12,000 on those parishes, if they impoverished them by lessening the value of their property by the amount of that fine, the inhabitants would immediately set to and build cottages. And—still more extraordinary—the noble Lord added, the larger inhabited parishes, being relieved of the rates to that extent, would also be tempted to build more cottages; there would be an absolute superfluity of cottages, and they would get no rent for them. That struck him as a very curious argument. He had looked a little into his own union. He took it on what the right hon. Gentleman said was a sufficient return, and he, at least, was bound by it. He should have told the House, but for the language of the right hon. Gentleman, that the return was that of 1856, and he could not tell what changes had taken place since, but the right hon. Gentleman said they wanted nothing more. There were ten parishes taken out of the union in which he lived; five of them were small, and five large. The gain in rating the five large parishes would be £1,400 a year; capitalized, that would be £43,000. The loss in the small parishes would be £600, which represented a capital of £19,000. That was a very serious shifting of burdens. He did not pretend to say that would be the case now; but that was what the right hon. Gentleman told them they ought to rely on. It so happened that the right hon. Gentleman spoke a good deal about Reports. Among others he quoted Mr. Pigott's Report. One of these parishes, Sydenham, happened to be quoted by Mr. Pigott as a close parish. It was one which would gain very much—as much as any—by this shifting of burdens. Much had been said of the cock-and-bull story of pulling down houses. He believed such statements were utterly unfounded. If they could thoroughly test them he believed none of them would hold water. The fact was that all the rural parishes were breeding parishes, and their population was increasing. On the other hand, such places as Liverpool did not breed, and if it were not for the influx of fresh blood from the country in a given number of years the population would come to an end, like the New Zealanders; it would either die out or work itself out. The rural parishes, on the contrary, retained the same number of people that they had always had. They did not want more, and in fact as the tendency of improvements in agriculture was to enable them to cultivate the land with less labour, if the parishes kept the same number as formerly they had as many as they wanted. The right hon. Gentleman had quoted a return of Mr. Pigott's who made some strong observations on the inconveniences of settlement, in which he (Mr. Henley) quite agreed. He said that in these close parishes there was about one person to five acres of land. But the land could not in such a case be said to be very much stripped of the labouring population, especially when a large proportion of the land in these parishes happened to be grazing land. As to the shifting of burdens, he (Mr. Henley) had looked through all the Returns, and in all the unions with which he was acquainted there would be a great shifting of burdens. In some the rates were 1s.; in others, 4s. Therefore, it was not a question of a few pence, and in the south of England the transfer would in some cases be very heavy. The right hon. Gentleman took the House through the various attempts and failures in carrying into effect the scheme he now proposed. The right hon. Gentleman in particular spoke very strongly of the attempt made in 1846-7; but he might have reminded the House of the real reason for stopping them. Hon. Gentlemen would recollect how Ireland in the famine, and the distress that followed, prayed for smaller areas, and how from certain districts the complaint arose that they could afford no assistance in the way of labour, because they were swamped by the large areas. He was thankful that now the burden for the relief of the poor in Ireland was limited to almost nothing. It had been said that in the north of England they were very often hard driven for labourers. In the south he knew the labour had been scarce during the last three or four years in harvest time. If, however, a time of pressure should come, then every union would be exactly in the same position as every large parish. Every one knew that in a large parish if any great number of people were out of work they could not be set to work because people could not agree. One was willing to employ them, and another was not; and the farmer who was willing found he could not afford to have both a heavy rate and a heavy Saturday night, and he was therefore obliged to reduce his labourers to meet his rate. That was a matter which ought not to be lost sight of. He would now say a word on the way in which this Bill would affect the poor. The President of the Poor Law Board quoted the Reports and opinions of Commissioners; but all those Reports and opinions went to the whole question of removal, and not merely to removals within unions. Doubtless there could be no advantage so great to the poor man as to be able to go where he pleased and get the best price for his labour, with the same chance of obtaining relief wherever he might go. That would be a great advantage to the poor man; but he very much doubted whether the limited provisions of the present Bill would be of any appreciable benefit. The hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Floyer) stated that there were upwards of 6,000 removals altogether; but the removals within the unions which this Bill would do away with would only amount to 366 altogether, and that was a very limited amount of relief. Besides, although 366 orders of removal might have been made, they did not know that a single person had been removed under them; because, although the overseer of parish A might get an order for the removal of a pauper to parish B, yet very often the pauper was not removed. The relieving officer relieved the man and put the relief down to parish B, and the pauper remained where he was. Another phase of this question was that which regarded employment. If you took 100 labourers anywhere and gave them 6*d.* a day, about thirty would earn 8*d.* 30 more would earn 6*d.*, and the rest only 4*d.* If they took the labourers from seventeen to seventy-five there would be pretty nearly the same division. But if a union rating were established the elderly men would not be employed as they were at present. The farmer would employ the young men who could earn most, though they might not be so moral as their seniors; and he would ask why he should take a labourer half worn out. The weaker man, though not a bad man, would naturally get less and less employment and ultimately would have to go into the house. He ventured to say that in all the close parishes he knew—those which were called close parishes—containing twenty, thirty, or forty cottages, half of them were occupied by elderly men, widows, and that class of persons who were not the most profitable persons to live in a parish as far as their labour went. The new reading of things was that these people should be swept out. There would be no failure in their New Poor Law because the system they wanted to introduce was the system which was said to approach perfection—namely, that which existed in London. That meant that all the poor were to be relieved in the workhouse. That was what they called the perfection of the system. He had no doubt that many would starve sooner than accept it. It would reduce the rates—no doubt about that—and then the right hon. Gentleman would magnify it, and say, “See what we have done.” The right hon. Gentleman had talked about the failure of the Poor Law owing to the parochial system. He (Mr. Henley) wished he had also enlightened the House a little about the failure of the Poor Law in the metropolis, where people died in the streets, so that the right hon. Gentleman was obliged to bring in another Bill that Session for the protection of the houseless poor of London. Why was that Bill brought in? Because the Poor Law Board knew perfectly well that their system in London did not relieve the poor. The country parishes had no refuges for the destitute like those in the metropolis; but London had a poor wretched class which the Poor Law that they called perfection did not reach, and all knew that but for these refuges, these poor persons would die in the streets. Yet this was the system they want to extend to the country. They all knew that so long as there was a parochial system that state of things could not exist in the country. The people in the parishes at present followed the poor to the union where they went for relief, and there would be a clamour if the guardians were too hard upon them. The real reason why the Poor Law authorities wanted to break up the parochial system was because they knew they could not squeeze the poor and put them under the grindstone as they had done in London. The majority of the poor in London were relieved in the workhouse, while in the country the majority were relieved out of the house. When the small parishes in England were made into unions it would be impossible to say that there would be any difference between them and one large parish, as far as the poor who lived in them were concerned. So far from the proposed measure inducing people to build cottages, he believed it would be a direct inducement to pull them down. He thought so for this reason :—At all the meetings where these questions were discussed, landowners were asked why they did not build cottages on their farms as well as cowhouses and pigsties. They knew that a very limited number of cottages attached to each farm was sufficient for the farmers' purpose. The cottages attached to a farm generally accommodated the carter, the milkman, and the shepherd, and these men who attended to the cattle were all the farmer cared to have living on the spot. All the other work he got done more economically by the piece, and it was perfectly immaterial to him whether the labourer walked a hundred yards or a mile to perform his work. The practice of attaching cottages to farms and letting them with the farms would increase, and these cottages would be filled by the young and able-bodied labourers, while the old and worn out men would in a few years have to find their way to the union workhouse, there to spend the remainder of their days. He could not see in the natural working of human events how it was to be otherwise. But at present the labourers generally lived in their cottages to their death. We might also be quite certain that if we put an increased burden upon many of these parishes, the ratepayers would endeavour to recoup themselves by a saving of expense in some way. One shilling in the pound additional rate was tantamount to a double income tax; at least, he knew that in many counties this would be the case. Hon. Members had talked of the shifting of the burdens which took place when the Irremovable Poor Act was passed. No man doubted that the passing of the Irremovable Poor Bill conferred a great boon on the poor. The expense of the operation of that Act was put upon the parishes, and it was quite right that it should be so placed, and no one grumbled at it. The expense was originally charged upon the common fund, but was afterwards altered. No new burden of this kind, which was felt to be a great benefit to the poor, would be objected to, even if it did increase the rates; but when they came, without any reason whatever, to upset an old settled law, which had had the sanction of 300 years' legislation, there was ground for the inquiry, where were they going to stop if such a course were adopted? They knew the pressure that there was towards equalizing the rates in the metropolis, and there was not a single argument that could be used for equalizing the rates in the country unions that did not apply to the metropolis. When we had equalized the rates in these unions in London upon the plea of justice, would we say it was because some unions were paying twice as much as others? Immediately the rate was equalized throughout the country we must come to a national rate. Who did they expect would object to a national rate? People would feel that the proposed measure would do a great injustice, and, though it might be said it was proposed for the sake of convenience of ministration, they could not say it was for the advantage of the poor. If we could not do away with removal altogether, it would be an advantage to the poor; but this miserable measure for doing away with removal within unions would be no boon at all. It was a mockery and a delusion to call the measure now before the House a boon to the poor, and once the people experienced the effect of the "shifting of burdens," nothing would prevent them going directly for a national rate. The question had been raised, why did we exempt stock in trade from the poor rate? There was no answer to that question. It was originally intended that all property should contribute to the maintenance of the poor; yet, why did coal mines pay while iron mines were exempt? He did not know that any reason could be given for this, except that it had the sanction of 200 or 300 years. If they perpetrated the intended injustice, how could they resist a national rate? It might be said that a general equalization of the rates would lead to an expensive and wasteful administration, but there were people who thought that there would be a wasteful administration even in the unions. What would be said to those who had injustice done to them through this measure? "That we could not provide the proper machinery." It was our business to provide the proper machinery, if we broke down that which protected from this injustice, and it was no answer to say that they would not carry that injustice to its natural end. There was one other matter to which he wished to call the attention of the House, and that was a curious statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board, in introducing this Bill. He said the charge for the irremovable poor was 52 per cent on the whole cost of the relief of the poor. But he (Mr. Henley) ventured to think at the time that that amount included the establishment charges, and this turned out to be so. In the union in which he lived the expenses for the year up to Michaelmas, exclusive of the county rate, were about £8,000; the common charges—the irremoval poor and charges of the establishment—amounted to about £2,600, being 30 per cent. The charge for irremovable paupers was only 11 per cent, and the charge of the irremovable poor, as compared with that maintenance, simply was 15 per cent. That was very different to the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman. But that was not all—it was a very odd statement altogether, but the words were the more remarkable from the fact that the right hon. Gentleman had the Return in his hands, as well as other Members of the House, and that Return showed that the irremovable poor in the year 1863 amounted to 36 per cent, and in 1862 to 31 per cent. One would have thought that was pretty well; but what did the Return contain besides? Why, it contained also the percentage in the different unions. In the unions in the county of Oxford the charge was 17 per cent; in the South Midland, 18 per cent; and in the union where he lived it was 15 per cent. How then did this extraordinary result come up? Why, in the North Western Union—that was to say, in Lancashire—the relief to the irremovable poor was twice as much as the settled poor, thereby disturbing the average. It was hardly fair of the right hon. Gentleman to make such a statement. He would not say that he deluded the House, because everybody who knew anything about the matter knew that there must be some mystification with regard to it. The Return was now in the hands of Members, and showed the whole amount to the irremovable poor as 36 per cent, while in all the unions it was but 17 or 18 per cent. Lancashire and Yorkshire, from the peculiar circumstances of the time, had disturbed the whole calculation, and had brought out an average which was wholly deceptive to speak of as an average. The statement of the right hon. Gentleman showed the inconvenience of Members of the Government quoting from papers which were not in the hands of the House. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to have got into a habit of doing so. When he brought in his Bill he adopted this course; he had done the same that evening, and, perhaps, when the papers, which were stated to be now upon the table, were procured, some curious results would be ascertained. He repeated that it was not fair to quote from papers—he saw that the right hon. Gentleman had just got his paper back—of which the House knew nothing. In the North Western Union the average was now only 69 per cent, while in the metropolis it was 68 or 64 per cent; and, mind you, he believed that this paper took in the establishment charges, though these were not shown upon the face of it. If that were so, it afforded no test at all. He must repeat the protest uttered by every Member who had spoken in that debate against the unfairness of quoting from papers which were only in the hands of the Government, because they were bandying assertions from one side of the House to the other as to matters which they were not in a position fairly to argue. He had heard nothing in the course of that debate leading him to believe that the benefit to the poor would be at all commensurate to the inconvenience arising from the shifting of the burdens under the present Bill—so far as they knew what that shifting would be. These were all questions of degree, and a moderate shifting of the burdens might not be objected to where the imposition of serious changes would be strongly resisted. The hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr.

Walter) had said this question had been before the House for many years. Everybody knew that; but when it had been so long the pet child of the Poor Law authorities, it was strange that it had never been passed before. And now it would certainly be more fair to all parties that they should know exactly what the incidents of the Bill were before they were called on to pass it. If persons knew everything that was going to be done at the time a law was passed there was no soreness, no heart-burning, no unpleasant feeling afterwards. The principle in this country was that all supported what they believed to be right; and when the majority prevailed the minority were satisfied. But that would not be the case if the minority were able to say to the majority afterwards, "You passed this measure blindfolded. You did not know what you were doing. You did not know whether you were putting 3d., 6d., 1s. or 2s. in the pound upon your neighbour." Heartburnings, they might depend upon it, would be pretty strong. There could be no great gain in hurrying this matter. He believed that if the right hon. Gentleman were to set his shoulder to the wheel, having the information already in his office, it might be placed upon the table of the House after Easter. If this were done they could all act with their eyes open. In the meantime he should cordially support the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for Northamptonshire.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he had had personal experience in the relief of the poor, which enabled him to confirm the statements of his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) as to the evil which must ensue from increasing the area of chargeability and management. In the year 1860, the district which he represented, from Coventry to Atherstone, was plunged into distress by the operation of the Treaty with France upon the riband trade. The relief committee, with which he had acted, had for some time more than 20,000 people to sustain, whose maintenance the Poor Law organization was totally insufficient to supply. When the relief committee commenced its labours they had neither the benefit nor the guidance of those Acts which were subsequently passed with respect to the cotton districts. They had, therefore, to deal with the matter, looking first to the Poor Law organization, and then to the administration of relief from funds contributed by the public—for the difficulties in administration they had to deal with did not include the raising money by taxation. They had merely to look the matter in the face, and ask themselves how they could administer to those who were destitute the means of a livelihood in a spirit of wise and discriminate charity. Did they find the parishes too small for the purpose? On the contrary, in order to bring personal knowledge to bear on the administration of relief, they found it absolutely necessary to break up the large parishes into minor districts. Nor was this the case only in Warwickshire. When the distress in Lancashire and Yorkshire came on, the rules upon which the relief committees had acted in Warwickshire were sent to Manchester. Did the relief committees of the cotton districts attempt to administer relief there by unions? Not at all. Did they attempt it by parishes were they were populous? Not at all. They were obliged to break up large and populous parishes into smaller districts before it was possible to bring the personal knowledge of those who were in distress, and the benevolence of their richer neighbours, to bear upon the administration of the funds with due discrimination, wherever the aggregate or areas of the population to be supplied with necessaries were so large as they are, in many large parishes. Now, here they had a case in which it was not a question of raising money in a district, but only a question of how the sums already in hand should be administered, and large areas or aggregates of destitute persons were found totally unworkable; how much more difficult would it become to act fairly and justly in these large areas when the operation of relief included not only the expenditure of means but the collecting them. In the district he had mentioned, and in which he (Mr. Newdegate) resided, the system the relief committees adopted was attended with success, and they closed their accounts to the satisfaction of the county. But they attained that success by acting upon precisely the opposite principle to that of the Bill then under discussion; the vicious character of the principle of the Bill was illustrated by the failure of the Poor Law throughout the metropolis. At that moment in London they were about to consider a measure to supplement their Poor Law, which had failed from the excessive size of the areas of population over which it extended. Here, then, was a measure which virtually sought to break up the parochial system of England, that had lasted 200 years, in order to entail upon the whole country the embarrassments from which they had hitherto been unable to relieve London, because the parishes of London were too large and too populous for parochial administration. The Bill would inflict heavy burdens on many parishes, and supersede the old system of charitable relief to the infirm, a system, the success of which depends upon personal knowledge of the applicants for relief—a system wanting, he was sorry to say, in the metropolis. It would do away with that true charity, and with that division into districts, without which the distress of Lancashire and Warwickshire never could have been reached. And why were they asked to do this? In deference to a system of centralization—to the dictation of the Poor Law Board, which for years had never lost sight of the one object of superseding the parochial system, which lay at the foundation of our institutions. And the House was asked by the hon. Member for Aylesbury to pass this measure with a view to an extension of the franchise, he (Mr. Newdegate) would like to know how the extension of the franchise could be safely accomplished when the old links which bound individuals to localities, and thus afforded means for their identification, were swept away? He asked the House not to sweep away the very basis of the suffrage by blotting out the system and the means through which the men to whom they might hereafter intrust that suffrage might be traceable and should be known.

MR. KNIGHT moved the adjournment of the debate. ["No, no!" and "Divide!"]

MR. C. P. VILLIERS hoped that the House would divide upon the measure, as it had been fully and thoroughly discussed.

MR. ALGERNON EGERTON seconded the Motion for the adjournment, because he thought the House was not in possession of sufficient information on which to come to a decision. He hoped the second reading of the Bill would be adjourned until after Easter. He had received a communication from the guardians who were in the habit of meeting in the county which he represented, stating that they were anxious to discuss the measure, but that they had not had it brought under their notice hitherto. ["Divide, divide!"]

Mr. Newdegate

He would call the attention of the House to the fact that a great measure affecting the administration of the Poor Law was passed in June of the previous Session; so that there was ample time for legislation upon the subject.

MR. FERRAND, who also rose amid loud calls for a division, complained that the right hon. Gentleman who had introduced the measure had not considered the case of the manufacturing districts. Many manufacturers had been driven out of Bradford on account of the immense expense to which they were put, and by this measure these gentlemen would not only have to contribute towards the maintenance of the poor in their own districts, but would be also included in the list of those who supported the poor of the populous town of Bradford.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Knight),—put, and negatived.

Original Question and Amendment again proposed.

The House divided:—Ayes 203; Noes 131: Majority 72.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed for Monday, 24th April.

AYES.

Resolutions [March 24] reported.

LORD ELCHO said, that he had given notice of his intention on the Vote for the Defences of Quebec to call the attention of the House to a very important point—what is reported to have been said in the Canadian Parliament relative to this Vote; but at that late hour he would not undertake to initiate a discussion upon so important a subject. If the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) would consent to postpone the Report until Thursday he would then bring forward his Motion, but should that be inconvenient to public business he would take an opportunity on Tuesday, the 4th of April, to move for papers and extracts of Correspondence relative to the Defences of Canada.

Resolution 1 read 2°, and agreed to.

SIR JOHN HAY hoped the noble Marquess would give an answer to the noble Lord. The question which it was desired to discuss was of great importance, and although the House had already had it under its consideration, yet it was desirable that the Government should afford an opportunity of still further considering it.

MR. SPEAKER said, the Vote referred to had been passed.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that in the hum of conversation that had been going on in the House, he had not heard distinctly anything which the noble Lord had said; but he gathered that it was his intention on the 4th of April to move for papers with a view to a discussion upon the subject of the Defences of Canada.

LORD ELCHO admitted that as the Vote was passed it was now too late to repeat his request for an adjournment of the Report, and therefore he had no alternative but to announce that he would bring the subject under the notice of the House on Tuesday, the 4th of April.

Resolutions 2 to 8 agreed to.

Question proposed, that Resolution 9 be read 2°.

MR. BENTINCK moved the adjournment of the debate. He did so, he said, because he was anxious to have from the Government some answer to the appeal which had been made to them by his noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho.) Since the discussion upon the Defences of Canada had taken place, information had reached this country by which the whole circumstances of the case were entirely altered. One of the objections which he on a former occasion took to the scheme of the Government was that they had given the House no assurance that the Government of Canada was an assenting party to the proposed arrangements. It now appeared that that Government distinctly stated that they were not assenting parties to it, and that they took exception to the amount of the grant, which was intended to be given by this country for the defence of the Canadian frontier. Under these altered circumstances, he wished to know whether another opportunity of discussing the question would be afforded by the Government?

MR. CARDWELL said, he did not know on what authority the hon. Member could state that any objection had been made by the Canadian Government to the proposed arrangement. No information, no despatch, had reached him, which led to the belief that the Canadian Government were dissenting parties. He believed, on the contrary, that the Canadian Government would be found satisfied with the proposal made by Her Majesty's Government; and though no despatch had reached him which he was justified in quoting, his belief was that the Canadian Government would fulfil their part in the matter.

MR. SPEAKER reminded the House that the course which was being pursued in continuing the discussion on a Resolution which had already been disposed of was quite irregular. The Resolution now before the House was the last of the Report, and the question was that the House do agree with the Committee in the said Resolution. To that Resolution, therefore, the discussion ought to be confined.

MR. BENTINCK rose to Order, observing that he had moved the adjournment of the debate, and that he apprehended to be the Question before the House.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Gentleman simply proposed to move the adjournment; but even admitting that he had moved it, and that the Motion had been seconded, still it would not have been open to him to enter on a discussion of the Vote for the Defences of Canada, which had already been agreed to.

Resolution agreed to.

MR. HENNESSY moved the adjournment of the House. He did so, he said, because when the first Vote was put he believed no hon. Gentleman sitting below the gangway was aware of what was going on, and because several Members were anxious before the Vote was agreed to to hear from the Government whether a fitting opportunity for the discussion of an important subject would be afforded. The Vote, however, having been passed without the knowledge of the great majority of the House, his hon. Friend the Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) took occasion on the last Vote to move the adjournment of the debate—which he had distinctly heard him do—and to make an appeal to the Government on the subject of the defences of Canada. Now, he would put it to the House whether it was not the duty of the Government to respond to that appeal, and to let hon. Members know what they proposed with respect to giving an opportunity for discussing that subject on a future occasion.

MR. BENTINCK begged to second the Motion, remarking that the House was proceeding in a somewhat dangerous course, so far as the liberty of discussion was concerned, if the example of that evening were to be followed up. It was not his fault that his proposition had not reached the Speaker's ear, and he regretted it had not been put from the Chair. The result, however, which he sought to bring about would be as effectually secured by the Motion of his hon. Friend as that which he had made, and he, therefore, wished again to ask the Government whether, under the altered circumstances of the case, ample opportunity for the discussion of the important subject of the Canadian defences would be afforded?

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Hennessy.)

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: My noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) stated, so far as we could make out, owing to the hum of conversation, that he wished the Vote for the Fortifications to be postponed; but that if it would be inconvenient to do that he would make a distinct Motion on Tuesday next, in which he would raise the whole question of the defences of Canada. Now, we accepted the latter alternative; and you, Sir, afterwards put from the Chair the Vote for Pensions to Wounded Officers. The hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) then moved, or intended to move, the adjournment of the debate for the purpose of bringing on the discussion of the Vote for Fortifications, which I submit would be a perfectly irregular course, for the only discussion which he could legitimately raise must have been confined to the particular Vote before the House. The hon. Member is, therefore, I think, entirely mistaken as to the position in which he stood with regard to his Motion.

LORD ELCHO said, the noble Viscount had clearly stated what had taken place when he first rose to put a question to the Government. No answer, had, however, been as yet given by his noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) to that question. He would also remind the Secretary for the Colonies that the real point at issue was not whether Canada was prepared to accept or not a certain sum as the cost of the proposed fortifications, but whether there was a clear understanding between the two Governments as to the proportion which each was to bear. He thought he would be able to show that there was a certain amount of ambiguity and discrepancy existing on the subject between the two Governments; and he hoped if he were unable to bring on his Motion on Tuesday next he would have an opportunity of doing so on the following Thursday, which would, in all probability, be a Supply night.

MR. CARDWELL explained that he did not say that he had received from Canada any despatch accepting the proposal of the Government. What he did say was that he was not aware of anything which would justify the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) in stating that the Canadian Government had expressed dissatisfaction with their proposal, or had refused to perform their part in the defence of their country. He understood that a deputation from the Canadian Government was coming over here to have a conference with Her Majesty's Government upon the subject.

MR. SPEAKER: In putting the Question I desire to say a word upon the point of Order. As I have already stated, there were two opportunities upon which any hon. Member who wished to address the House upon the subject of the fortifications in Canada might have done so—one upon the Question that the Resolution should be read a second time, and the other upon the Question that the House should agree with the Committee in the Resolution relating to that subject. There has been, I admit, one irregularity, and that was that when the hon. Member for West Norfolk, having put off anything that he had to say until the last Resolution, proposed upon that Resolution to raise a discussion upon the Vote for Fortifications, I did not interfere more strictly, and call the attention of the House to the irregularity and impropriety of forcing on that discussion at that moment. However, the House was interested in the subject, and the hon. Member put his Question, and it was answered by the Secretary of State. As far as that there certainly was an irregularity in our proceedings; but the irregularity was not that no opportunity was afforded, but that too wide a latitude was allowed, to discussion.

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY said, that there were other irregularities besides that referred to by the right hon. Gentleman. Questions were sometimes read in a half whispering tone, so that Members sitting on the further benches could not possibly know what was really going on; and sometimes when they supposed that they did know what was going on they were told that the time had gone by, and that they had missed their opportunity. As he understood the matter, his hon. Friend the Member for West Norfolk did not make his Motion for the purpose of raising a discussion, but only to elicit from the Government a clear understanding as to what day they would afford the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire an opportunity for bringing on the question of the Defences of Canada.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MUTINY BILL—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 1.

COLONEL DICKSON asked whether any changes were made in the Bill, so as to make it different from that of last year? The Bill was one which scarcely any of the Members had seen.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that if the hon. and gallant Gentleman had not seen the Bill it was his own fault, because it had been printed. There were only some slight changes, and none affecting the army of England—their object being to bring the Mutiny Act of

India into conformity with that of England.

MR. HENLEY said, it was an inconvenient practice to alter clauses of a Bill which was not printed as amended. The noble Marquess said that the alterations were of no importance; but that was a matter of opinion. Those alterations should not be passed without the House having had an opportunity of seeing them.

COLONEL KNOX moved that the Chairman do report Progress, as the Bill was too important a one to be allowed to pass at that late hour of the night.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman would not persevere in his Motion. It was necessary that this Bill should be passed before Easter, and if it did not go through Committee to-night it would probably be necessary to defer the commencement of the Easter holidays. As far as he was aware, there were no alterations of any importance in the Bill. Fifty copies had been printed, and were at the Vote Office for the use of those who wished to see them.

COLONEL DUNNE hoped that his hon. Friend would not press his Motion for reporting Progress, for there would be great inconvenience if the Bill were not passed before the 1st April. He had got a copy of the Bill, and he could not see that there were any great alterations in it.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6.

LORD HOTHAM called attention to a matter he considered of the greatest importance to the profession of which he had had the honour to be a member. If the statements made in the public papers as to what had been recently said by the Judge Advocate General in the House were true, he could only say it was a matter calculated to bring suspicion and discredit on the administration of the military law of the country. It had been reported in the ordinary channels of information that in the beginning of the month an hon. Gentleman made an inquiry of the Judge Advocate General as to what period of time a man could be kept in confinement after a court-martial upon his conduct had concluded; and further, whether it was true that two soldiers had been kept in confinement for many weeks after the courts-martial had concluded their proceedings and before the promulgation of their sentences. To those inquiries the right hon. Gentleman said that the rule of his Office was that as soon as a sufficient number of the findings of courts-martial had come in they were taken by him to the Queen, and submitted for Her Majesty's approval or otherwise. In the case of the two soldiers referred to the findings of the courts-martial had been approved of, and there was no reason why those individuals should have been kept in custody for one day afterwards. Now, assuming that report to be correct, he (Lord Hotham) ventured to say it raised a question of a very serious nature. The rule in reference to courts-martial was this—that on the conclusion of the trial the proceedings were forwarded to the Judge Advocate General in order that he might see that the proceedings had been conducted in a regular manner—that the evidence taken was legal evidence, and that the sentence pronounced was one in conformity with law. Supposing those requirements to have been fulfilled, the Judge Advocate General had to lay the proceedings before the Sovereign, together with his own opinion and advice thereon. After that the Queen's command was communicated to the Commander-in-Chief, and the sentence was promulgated. If men were to be unnecessarily kept in confinement, what, he asked, would be the result of such a confinement? Was that time between the sentence and its promulgation counted? If so, and if the sentence was a severe one, its severity was mitigated; but if it was a slight one it might be an aggravation of it. But what was the case of the innocent man, and how much more wrong must it be to keep in confinement a man who, having been tried by a court-martial, had been acquitted. The object of a court-martial was not vengeance, but an example to others; and with this object in view the sentence should follow as rapidly as possible, consistent with a full and deliberate consideration of the case. There could be no necessity for a delay of weeks from the conviction to the promulgation of the sentence; and no one could justify the keeping a convicted person unnecessarily in confinement, and still less so to keep an innocent man in custody. He expressed a hope that an alteration in the existing practice would be made.

COLONEL NORTH said, he brought this subject on a former occasion under the notice of the House, at a time when a predecessor of the present Judge Advocate General was in office, and it was then stated that the practice would be altered.

MR. HEADLAM said, he was asked on a former occasion whether there was any precise time a man could be kept in custody between the closing of the court martial and the promulgation of the sentence, and if he had seen the case of the two men referred to. He answered then that he had not seen the case referred to, and that with regard to the promulgation of the sentence there was no specified time for doing so; but he did not mean by that that a man was to be kept for any lengthened time in custody. The practice was to take up a number of cases at one time to Her Majesty for her approval; but Her Majesty had stated her readiness at all times to give audience in these cases. Some delay also took place after that. He had followed the practice of his predecessors; but he thought an alteration for preventing so much delay as was now the case in some instances was necessary. If the case referred to had been brought to his notice he should have inquired into it, and should, no doubt, have taken a course that would have prevented so long a delay before its promulgation.

MR. MOWBRAY said, that during the time he held the Office of Judge Advocate General, no such delay had taken place as that referred to in the case that had been particularly brought under the notice of the House. He could also state that Her Majesty was always ready to give audience in such cases.

COLONEL DICKSON asked, why the same practice was not adopted in Military Courts Martial as in Naval Courts Martial? In the latter, when an officer was acquitted his sword was immediately returned to him.

MR. HEADLAM said, simply because Naval Courts Martial did not require the approval of Her Majesty.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 7 to 21 inclusive were agreed to.

Clause 22.

MR. COX said, he found in this clause four causes for which the infliction of corporal punishment was permitted—namely, desertion, disgraceful conduct, misbehaviour, and stealing. Now, it might be easy enough to define desertion, but disgraceful conduct was an indefinite term, and misbehaviour was more indefinite still. The Return of the number of lashes inflicted upon soldiers in the year 1862 showed that different officers must attach very different meanings to the term "misbehaviour," for while in some regiments lashes had been inflicted upon soldiers for that offence, in others there had been no such punishment for misbehaviour. Again, in some regiments a great many men had been flogged for neglect of duty, while in others none had been flogged for that offence. Stealing appeared to be a very common offence in the army, judging from the number of men who were flogged for it. He wanted to know why a soldier was punished with fifty lashes for that crime, while a civilian only, perhaps, suffered a few weeks' imprisonment for it. Would any man in that House get up and say that the infliction of fifty lashes on a soldier made him a good man or more fit to serve in the army? Another offence for which soldiers were lashed, as appeared from the Return, was "making away with necessaries." One man might consider something a necessary which another man might consider to be perfectly unnecessary; and yet twenty-nine soldiers had received an aggregate of 1,000 lashes for "making away with necessaries." In some cases the offences for which lashes had been inflicted were not stated in the Return. There were cases in which it would appear that men had been flogged for "absence." A man might be absent from some cause over which he had no control. Many of the Members of that House were often absent from their duty, and why should they not be flogged for that offence if it was to draw down fifty lashes upon a soldier? In three cases the Return gave the cause of flogging as "miscellaneous." What might that be? It was high time that the flogging system should be done away with, and he, therefore, begged to move, as an Amendment, the omission of the clause.

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL seconded the Motion. He considered that so long as the clause was retained in the Act we should never get good men to enlist.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 85; Noes 2: Majority 43.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 23 to 25 inclusive were also agreed to.

Clause 26.

MR. COX moved the rejection of this clause, which was known as "the branding clause." He thought there was no necessity for such a degrading punishment. And, further, he wished to know why it was inflicted on soldiers and not on sailors, many of whom were, no doubt, worse than the "B. C.'s of the army."

MR. WYLD, in seconding the Amendment, said, that of late there had been a manifest improvement in the conduct and condition of the soldier, and it was his firm conviction that not many years would elapse before this punishment and that of flogging would be abolished both in the army and in the navy. There was no doubt that these punishments operated as a great discouragement to recruiting for both services.

MR. WHITE said, that as long as this class distinction of making private soldiers and sailors amenable to these punishments was kept up there was an end of the boasted maxim that all Englishmen were equal in the sight of the law.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, this punishment was rarely inflicted, and, in fact, it was retained more as a precaution than a punishment. It was to prevent men who had been dismissed or had left his regiment with ignominy being enlisted in another, and thus to save the country the expense of re-enlisting such bad characters. The Return before the House showed how rarely these punishments were inflicted. It was only the perfectly incorrigible characters who were subjected to them, and they need not deter good men from entering the army, because the fact of their being good men secured them from their infliction.

MR. COX asked why the distinction between the army and the navy was kept up?

The Committee divided: — Ayes 77; Noes 35: Majority 42.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 27 to 30 inclusive, were also agreed to.

Clause 31.

MR. HENNESSY said, he found it gave power to the Secretary of State for War in a foreign State—namely, in the Ionian Islands; and that Clause 52 also gave the same power. It showed the manner in which the Bill had been brought into the House.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON admitted that the section was not very carefully drawn. No harm would be done by retaining the words, but he would consent to omit them.

Words struck out.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 32 to 54 inclusive were also agreed to.

Clause 55.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, that the clause referred to negroes purchased by Her Majesty's Government previous to the abolition of slavery. He wished to know whether there were any such negroes in Her Majesty's service?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON did not believe that there were any, and would therefore consent to the omission of the words.

Words struck out.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

GRAND JURIES (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. BLAKE, Bill to amend the Laws relating to Grand Juries in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BLAKE, Mr. M'MAHON, and Mr. MAGUIRE.

GENERAL POST OFFICE (ADDITIONAL SITE) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. PEEL, Bill to enable Her Majesty's Postmaster General to acquire a site for the extension of the General Post Office in Saint Martin's Le Grand, in the City of London, ordered to be brought in by Mr. PEEL and Mr. COWPER.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 94.]

SCOTLAND—POSTAL SYSTEM OF FIFE. QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether any measures are about to be taken to remedy the defects of the Postal System of Fife so frequently complained of?

MR. PEEL said, in reply, that the postal arrangements in the county of Fife were not so satisfactory as the Post Office wished to make them. When the Post Office requested the North British Railway Company (he believed) to allow such terms as the Post Office considered reasonable for the more general use of their trains, the Company declined to accede to them. The negotiations were not successful; but they were still in progress, and he hoped the result would turn out to be satisfactory.

PROPERTY OF THE LATE ALEXANDER CASEY.—QUESTION.

COLONEL VANDELEUR said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether any or what disposition has been made of the property of the late Alexander Casey, of the county Clare, forfeited to the Crown, his alleged will having been set aside by the Court of Probate in 1863; and whether it is true that the late Attorney General for Ireland has recommended the reversion of the property to be left away from the wife of the deceased and to be given in fee to a stranger; and whether he has any objection to lay all the Papers and Memorials connected with the case upon the table of the House?

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in reply, said, the property in question had been disposed of, by the fact of its having been left to the widow during her life; and at her death it was to go to a relative of the deceased husband. He begged to state to the hon. and gallant Gentleman that it would not be convenient to lay the papers connected with the case on the table of the House.

ARMY—ORDNANCE SELECT COMMITTEE.—QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY TRACY said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take advantage of the change in the Ordnance Select Committee occasioned by the retirement of Colonel Gallwey to associate another Naval Member with that Committee?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that Colonel Gallwey was the only Engineer Officer on the Select Committee, and it would be necessary for his place to be filled up by another Engineer Officer; but Captain Key, of the Excellent, had, with the concurrence of the Admiralty, been appointed as an Associate Member of the Ordnance Committee, in order to assist them on all questions connected with naval ordnance.

INDIA—LUCKNOW PRIZE MONEY. QUESTION.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether there will be any further distribution of Lucknow Prize Money; and, if so, when it is probable the distribution will take place?

SIR CHARLES WOOD: Sir, another distribution has, in point of fact, been advertised in India. The roll, however, has not as yet been sent home. I inquired whether the first roll could not be made available, but was told that it was so inaccurate it was absolutely necessary to wait for the new roll to come home.

RECRUITING IN THE ARMY.—QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, If the Committee appointed to consider the subject of Recruiting in the Army have reported; and, if so, whether the Report will be laid upon the table of the House?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, the Committee, which he supposed the hon. and gallant Gentleman referred to, was a purely Departmental Committee. It was composed of some officials of the War Office and of the Horse Guards, and was framed with a view of reporting to the Commander-in-Chief certain details connected with the subject of recruiting in the army. The Report had only just been received, and was at present under the consideration of the Secretary of State. If his hon. and gallant Friend would repeat his Question at a later period, he would be able to inform him when he would be prepared to lay the Report upon the table. The Committee, however, being merely a Departmental one their proceedings were not intended to be made public.

THE IONIAN ISLANDS DEBATE.—PENSIONS TO OFFICERS.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: Sir, I am anxious to make a personal explanation, and in order to set myself right with the House I will move the adjournment—a course I never before adopted since I have had the honour of being a Member of this House. When I brought forward the question of the Ionian Islands' pensioners the other evening I made two statements, both of which received a most emphatic contradiction from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The statements were these:—First, that the Duke of Newcastle, when Colonial Secretary, and when the cession of the Ionian Islands was under consideration, counselled the British officers who served Her Majesty in those islands to accept a guarantee for their pensions from the Greek Government, for this reason—if they were paid their pensions by the Greek Government they might at the same time hold appointments under the British Crown. The other statement which I made was this—that an understanding having been entered into with the Duke of Newcastle, it was violated by the advice of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Now, to both of these statements the right hon. Gentleman opposite gave a denial in such strong terms that I almost felt he impugned the veracity of my statements. In respect to the first statement, having reference to the understanding which had been come to between the Duke of Newcastle and the gentlemen in question, I received yesterday morning a letter from a gentleman of the highest consideration, who belonged to the Supreme Court of Justice at Corfu. With the permission of the House I will read an extract from that letter—

[Cries of “Order!”]

MR. SPEAKER said, that a letter commenting on a debate in this House was not in order.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE then continued to read the letter, which, after alluding to a denial on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that a promise was ever given by the late Duke of Newcastle, because his Grace would not have repudiated it had he given it, proceeded in the following terms:—

“There can be no doubt that the late Duke of Newcastle never did, nor ever would, have receded from nor repudiated any promise he had made. This unenviable task devolved on others after he became incapacitated from attending to public business, shortly before the signature of the Treaty of the 29th of March, 1864. You are quite accurate in stating that his Grace, acquainted as he was with the provisions of the Ionian pension law, expressed his regret that he could not succeed in obtaining for us a British pension, but that a Greek pension would at least have the advantage over a British one of being tenable with employment under the British Crown; and that as to the doubtful security of the Greek Exchequer, Great Britain would see those pensions paid. His Grace added that he would place his opinion on record in such a manner as to bind his successors. You were, therefore, entirely justified in the statements which you made, and of which I am ready to assume the whole responsibility.

So far I think I have justified my first statement. Now with respect to the second statement I made as to the advice given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer I am sure I am not mistaken in that statement, and I am borne out in it by the testimony of several gentlemen connected with the matter to whom I have spoken. But the right hon. Gentleman opposite stated that I was not justified in saying that he had advised a breach of the engagement that had been entered into in respect to those pensions. This very morning papers connected with the Ionian Islands question were laid upon the table of the House, and in one of them I found a copy of a letter addressed by M. Tricoupi to a Greek official, in which he referred to a conversation with Mr. Gladstone. Writing to M. Delyanni from Athens on the 1st of February, 1864, M. Tricoupi said—

“I likewise spoke about the compensations to the employés who are not entitled to pension. I requested him (Mr. Gladstone) to charge on the English Exchequer the expense thereof. Mr. Gladstone replied that Parliament would not vote a credit for this purpose; but he was of opinion that the amount agreed on for this object might be reduced. That the payment of the compensation might cease on anyone entitled accepting a salaried post under the British Government.”

I will not retort upon the right hon. Gentleman the very severe language which he applied to my statements the other night. I am only anxious to show that I never have made in this House, for which I have the deepest respect, a statement which I did not deem myself in the fullest degree justified in making, and which I did not think rested on the most unexceptionable authority. I beg, Sir, to move the adjournment of the House.

MR. SPEAKER: I am much obliged to the hon. Member for desiring to observe the Rules of the House, I must remark that he will better satisfy those Rules by not moving the adjournment, having had the full opportunity of making his personal explanation.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: As far, Sir, as I am concerned, I confess I do not quite understand in what sense the statement just delivered by the hon. Gentleman is a personal explanation affecting his own character or veracity. No charge whatever of that kind was made by me against the hon. Gentleman on the former occasion—absolutely none; and, moreover, I venture to tell my hon. Friend that if he thought I had made such a charge the proper course would have been to take notice of it there and then; for then it would have been my duty to explain. [MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: I had not then got the letter.] I must distinguish between the soundness of my hon. Friend's arguments and his own personal veracity. I impugned, indeed, the soundness of his reasoning, and also showed grounds for believing that the statement which he made with regard to the Duke of Newcastle could not be correct. But that statement was not made by my hon. Friend himself upon his own credit. That was perfectly well understood at the time. If, however, my hon. Friend thought his veracity impugned by anything that I said, I must repeat that he should have pointed it out at the moment. He speaks of the very severe language used by me. Will he have the kindness to point out a single phrase employed by me of which he has reason to complain, and I will withdraw it in a moment?

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: The language used by the right hon. Gentleman was this—

“He (Mr. Cochrane) had brought a serious charge against the late Duke of Newcastle, for he had accused that nobleman of departing from an agreement which he had made with these gentlemen. For his own part, he did not know that any such agreement had ever been entered into by the late Duke of Newcastle. . . . He must say that he possessed so much confidence in the honour of the late Duke of Newcastle that he felt convinced that no such agreement ever existed.”

The right hon. Gentleman went on to say—

“His hon. Friend had not laid before the House the grounds upon which he asserted that the engagement he had stated had been made.”

I think that is very strong language.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am really, Sir, as much at a loss as when I began to know what words, what expression, what idea, what suggestion conveyed in those words it is that my hon. Friend complains of. I did not impugn the veracity of my hon. Friend, but I endeavoured to show that he must have been inaccurately informed. I did not presume to state that the Duke of Newcastle had not made such an agreement. [“Oh!”] Has not my hon. Friend just read the very words in which I stated that I was convinced the noble Duke had not made such an agreement? And is not that a different thing from stating, as a matter of fact within my own knowledge, that he had not made such an agreement? How could I undertake to state with regard to one who is, unhappily, removed from among us what he had done in answer to a statement of that kind, not resting upon any words of his own, but upon the assertion of some one not in this House, who had been in communication with him? What I endeavoured to show was this:—The Duke of Newcastle was ultimately a party to the arrangement made with regard to these gentlemen. As a portion of that arrangement it was agreed that the pensions which they were to receive should abate upon their taking office in the same manner as if they had been English pensioners. My hon. Friend said that was contrary to the assurance given by the Duke of Newcastle, and I replied that that statement, if it were true, would imply that the Duke of Newcastle was guilty of what I am sure no one would think of imputing to him. I am entirely at a loss to understand how in any of the words which I used, or of the arguments which I addressed to the House, there could have been anything in the slightest degree offensive to the hon. Gentleman. If he will have the goodness to point out to me more decidedly, in a way that I can understand, what it is that he complains of—although, perhaps, I might have some ground of complaint as to what has occurred—I shall be most happy to render him every reparation in my power. Then the hon. Member says that I deny having given the advice to the Greek Minister that the pensions should abate in the manner I have described. I never made any such denial. What I denied was that I had been a party to any breach of an understanding. I must, indeed, have been devoid of all sense to have made the denial which the hon. Member imputes to me, because I stated distinctly in this House last year that I had given that advice. I think that advice was just and rational, and I am therefore far from shrinking from the responsibility of having given it. But I entirely deny any knowledge of any such engagement as my hon. Friend refers to which is at variance with that advice; and when it is considered that the Duke of Newcastle acted upon that advice the inference is, I think, pretty strong that he was not aware of any such engagement. I will take this opportunity of saying that the statement of facts made in the debate of last week by the hon. Member for Bridgewater (Mr. Kinglake) with regard to what took place last year was perfectly accurate.

MR. ROEBUCK: I do not know, Sir, whether I am strictly in order—

MR. SPEAKER: As the hon. and learned Gentleman appeals to me, I will venture to call to the recollection of the House what its Rules are with respect to proceedings of this nature. A debate has taken place and has passed by; but if an hon. Gentleman desires to make a personal explanation he may do so without making any Motion; and the object of that rule is to withdraw from the general debate matter of a merely personal nature. I therefore took the liberty of pointing out to the hon. Member (Mr. B. Cochrane) that the Rules of the House permitted him to make a personal explanation without moving the adjournment, and that he would be more in order in making his explanation without moving the adjournment of the House—because a Motion involves a following debate. The general Rule of the House is that when a general debate has taken place it ought to pass by, giving an opportunity indeed for personal explanations, but not allowing the former debate to be revived.

MR. ROEBUCK: Allow me, Sir, to say that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been allowed to make statements also, and in these statements he has distinctly impugned the veracity of a gentleman who is not a Member of this House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have impugned no man's veracity. ["Order, order!"]

MR. ROEBUCK: Then, Sir, I will move the adjournment of the House. I did not wish to take that step, but the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman has forced me to do so. A charge was made against the right hon. Gentleman, and he attempted to get out of it by withdrawing from the hon. Member (Mr. Cochrane) his implied imputation on his veracity. But a practised rhetorician like the right hon. Gentleman knew how to shape his phrase so as, while withdrawing the imputation from the hon. Member who is present to shift it to the absent person who had given the hon. Member his information. Now, Sir, I am here to say that the whole of this matter from beginning to end has been a disgrace to the British Government, and I will add that the chief person on whom that disgrace rests is the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I will justify what I have said—["Order!"] and that to the meanest capacity in this House. ["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I invite the hon. and learned Member to consider whether it will be in accordance with the Rules of the House to go back to a discussion which has lately taken place; because the hon. and learned Member is not now confining himself to personal explanation;

but he states that the whole transaction to which he is referring is a disgrace to Her Majesty's Government—meaning the whole subject of the debate which has recently taken place. It is for the House to say whether that is regular; but in my opinion the course which has been pursued in reviving a discussion which lately took place is not in accordance with the Rules of the House.

MR. ROEBUCK: In obedience to you, Sir, I abstain at once from making any further observations. Another opportunity will, no doubt, be given me of justifying my assertion. I have said what I have said, and the justification will come hereafter.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Really, Sir—

MR. ROEBUCK: I rise to Order, Sir. I shut my mouth at your command, and I now appeal to you whether there shall be a reply upon what I have not said.

OFFICE OF POSTMASTER GENERAL.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH, in bringing before the House the subject of which he had given notice, said, that it was one, if not of pressing emergency, at all events of considerable constitutional interest. The office to which his Motion related appeared to stand in a peculiar position. Every other office connected with the Government was understood to be capable of being filled by Members of that House; the office of Postmaster General alone must, it would seem to be contended, be filled by a Peer. So late as last Session, the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Palmerston) when questioned as to whether a fair number of the Offices in his Government were filled by Members in that House, stated that, as a matter of course, the Postmaster General was a Member of the other House. In a popular account of the Post Office published the year before last, he found it stated that the Postmaster General must be a Member of the House of Lords; but no reason for that statement was given. This was certainly a remarkable anomaly; was it founded on any reason? His object was to ascertain whether any such reason existed; and he asked for a Committee of Inquiry for the purpose. The history of the office was connected with the civilization of the country. It was first mentioned in the reign of Henry VIII., who was a very accomplished literary prince. He wrote a tract against Luther on the seven sacraments, and received from the Pope the title of Defender of the Faith for his defence of Roman Catholic doctrine, which is the origin of that title as now assumed by the Sovereign of Great Britain. In consequence of his correspondence with Rome and other parts of the continent he instituted a post and appointed one of his Secretaries master of it. The Office went on increasing under Charles I. and the Commonwealth. During the Commonwealth the first Postmaster was appointed under the Great Seal of that time. After the restoration in the 12th of the reign of Charles II. an Act was passed consolidating the previous Acts, and the Act provided that one Postmaster General should be appointed for His Majesty's dominions, but said nothing about his being a Peer, or any other restriction. Charles II. conferred the Office on the Duke of York, who performed the duty by deputy till his right merged on his accession to the Crown. The Office was made the engine of Royal patronage, and large pensions were granted to various parties. A pension of £4,700 was given out of the Post Office revenues to the Duchess of Cleveland. A pension of £4,000 was given to the Earl of Rochester. The same practice of granting pensions out of the Post Office revenues was continued in the reign of William and Mary, when the total amount of pensions reached £22,000 a year. The Post Office Acts were consolidated again in the 9th of the reign of Queen Anne, and further pensions were granted, amongst them one of £5,000 to the Duke of Marlborough—which then amounted on the whole to £65,000. The Act of the 9th of Queen Anne, which settled the whole arrangement of the Post Office, contained no restriction as to the rank of the person who should be Postmaster General. In 1720 the first great improvement in the Post Office took place, when it was farmed by Mr. Allen, postmaster of Bath, the original of Squire Alworthy in Fielding's novel Tom Jones, and whom Pope had immortalized in the couplet—

Let humble Allen with an awkward shame
Do good by stealth and blush to find it fame.

He made about £10,000 a year out of the Post Office, and held the appointment for forty-four years. In 1784 Mr. John Palmer was the next great Post Office reformer, who accelerated the mails by means of coaches. He received a pension of £3,000 per annum, and a donation of £50,000 from Parliament. He was supported by Mr. Pitt in carrying out his improvements. He did not find, upon referring to the Acts passed in the reigns of Charles II., Anne, or Victoria, with reference to the regulations of the Post Office, that there were any clauses affirming in the slightest degree the appointment of Peers to the office of Postmaster General. Formerly there were two Postmasters appointed, and in 1822 Lord Normanby brought forward two Motions, one within six weeks of the other, for the purpose of abolishing the practice of appointing two persons. Great malversations had taken place in the office, yet Lord Normanby was opposed by the Gentlemen then on the Treasury Bench, who said it would be impossible to abolish one of the offices without diminishing the influence of the Crown, and his first Motion was lost by a majority of twenty-five. The second Motion, which was different from the first in some respects, being in the form of an Address to the Crown instead of a Resolution, was carried by a majority of fifteen, and immediately afterwards the office of the second Postmaster General was abolished. The Postmasters General had not all shown themselves favourable to Post Office reformation. The penny post system was adopted by the Melbourne Ministry in 1840, because, on its return to office, after the failure of Sir Robert Peel to form a Ministry, on account of the "Bedchamber Question," in 1839, it felt bound to adopt the popular suggestions which had been made. Lord Lichfield on the Liberal side, and Lord Lowther on the Conservative, both spoke against this Post Office reform. Lord Lichfield in 1837 said "of all the wild visionary schemes which he had ever heard of, this (the penny post) was the most extravagant," and he subsequently said the whole area of the Post Office building would not be able to hold the clerks and the letters if such a change took place. Noblemen had been called up to the House of Lords for the purpose of enjoying the office of Postmaster General, and he could not see that this added to the efficiency of the Public Service. The confining the appointment to a Peer was a limitation of the Royal prerogative, and whatever indirect authority there was for confining it to Peers, he could find no direct authority for the practice. It was a curious fact that Mr. Rowland Hill got a grant of £20,000 for carrying out that system which had been spoken of as he had described by two aristocratic Postmasters General. He saw no reason whatever for the Office being held by a Peer, any more than there was occasion for a double Postmaster General. The hon. Member quoted from a series of enactments which had passed in the reign of Queen Anne, and at other times, to prove what he had affirmed. The only restriction of those statutes was against offices which conferred a profit, or which were new offices since the 6th of Anne. He maintained that the appointment was neither one of profit, nor the Office new. The Post Office was virtually the same since its first institution. The hon. Member then cited several Acts of Parliament bearing upon public offices, the holders of which were disqualified from holding their seats in the House of Commons. In none of those Acts was this Office mentioned. ["Divide!"] If he were to speak candidly, he might say he believed that historical matters of this kind were as worthy of the consideration of the House as was the headstrong party conflict in which his hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) proposed to engage the House presently. He believed that the appointment of a Peer to this Office had always been regarded as chiefly ornamental, and as a convenient mode of providing Office for Members of the other House. He maintained that this Office was a highly commercial and mechanical one, and therefore the better adapted for management by a Commoner, though he did not deny that a Peer might be qualified to fill it. Since the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer—whose personal courtesy towards himself he was always willing to acknowledge—had included banking and life insurance operations within the duties which appertained to the Post Office, the commercial character of the post had been greatly increased. He should, therefore, be glad to know why Members of the House of Commons were excluded from the Office? and he moved for the Committee of Inquiry of which he had given notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed, to inquire whether the practice of appointing a Peer of the Realm exclusively to the office of Post Master General is one which is directed or required by any legal enactment or constitutional principle, and whether the continuance of such practice is of advantage to the Public Service." —(Mr. Darby Griffith.)

MR. PEEL said, the hon. Gentleman proposed to have a Committee to inquire whether the practice of appointing a Peer to the office of Postmaster General was founded on any law or constitutional practice, and he (Mr. Peel) hoped in a few words to be able to satisfy him that it was quite unnecessary to trouble any Committee with such an inquiry. With respect to the law of the question he must refer to an Act passed at the commencement of the reign of Queen Anne, which provided that any person appointed to any new office of profit under the Crown, created after 1705, should be disqualified for election and for sitting and voting in the House of Commons. At the time that Act was passed there was in existence an office of Postmaster of England, which office was created in the reign of Charles II., but a few years after, in 1711, the office of Postmaster of England was abolished, and a Postmaster of Great Britain was created, which office was itself abolished in the first year of the reign of William IV., when a Postmaster for the United Kingdom was appointed. His answer to the first part of the speech of the hon. Gentleman was, that the offices of Postmaster of Great Britain and of the United Kingdom had always been considered to be new offices of profit under the Crown to which the statute of Anne applied. He understood the hon. Gentleman to dispute the application of the statute of Anne to the office of Postmaster General, but he would find that the practice of that House furnished an uniform exposition of the law which was quite decisive upon the point. The office of Postmaster was in the beginning held jointly by two persons, and in 1708 it was held by Sir Thomas Frankland and Sir John Evelyn, who continued to hold it until 1715. Sir Thomas Frankland sat in the House of Commons as Member for Thirsk, and continued to sit until 1711, when the office of Postmaster of England was abolished, and the new office of Postmaster of Great Britain was created, to which the holders of the former office were jointly appointed. Upon reference to the Journals of the House it would be found that on the 7th of June, 1711, Sir Thomas Frankland vacated his seat, and a new writ was issued for Thirsk, for which he sat, and Sir Thomas Worsley was appointed in his stead. Since that time there had been several instances of Members of the House of Commons being appointed joint Postmasters of Great Britain, but in every case they had resigned their seats, and other persons had been elected in their places. There were instances in 1708, 1711, 1721, 1726, 1749, 1770, 1799, 1801, and 1807. The law, therefore, was quite clear upon the point. It was not that Commoners could not hold the office of Postmaster General, but that no Postmaster General could sit in that House. Indeed, there had been a recent instance of a commoner holding that office in Mr. Canning's Government, when Lord Frederick Montagu was Postmaster General. The hon. Gentleman proposed that the Committee should further inquire whether that practice or law might be altered with advantage to the public service. That was hardly a proper question to refer to a Select Committee. It was a subject upon which the Government and the House could form its own opinion. That question did not turn upon such information as a Committee would be likely to obtain, and it could be much better discussed upon a Bill introduced in that House, which was the course taken in 1836, when the Government of the day introduced a Bill to assimilate the management of the Post Office to that of other branches of the public revenue. As to any advantage to the public service which was likely to accrue from an alteration of the law, that question must be considered not only in reference to that House and the public, but also as to the Government. The hon. Member must remember that the Government had to carry on the administration of affairs in the other House as well as in the House of Commons, and therefore it was necessary to have some offices filled by Peers. It would be admitted that the office of Postmaster General was one that could be filled by a Peer with less inconvenience to the House of Commons than almost any other. He could not perceive that any great advantage would accrue to the public service from providing that the office of Postmaster General might be held by a Member of the House of Commons. The chief advantage would be that the House would be placed in direct communication with the Post Office, instead of all questions relating to that Department being answered through the Treasury. But there were other Departments of the public service which were not directly represented in that House, which the Treasury had to answer for, and it would be difficult to have both of those Departments represented in that House. The chief questions that arose in that House connected with the Post Office were mere matters of detail, and upon any question of greater importance the Treasury was equally responsible with the Post Office Department. Upon the whole he thought there was no occasion for an alteration of the existing practice, and if any discussion was required it could be better obtained in that House upon the introduction of a Bill than by any reference to a Select Committee.

After a few words from Mr. DABBY GRIFFITH in reply,

CHURCH ESTABLISHMENT (IRELAND.)

RESOLUTION.

MR. DILLWYN, in rising to move—

said, there were in Ireland five millions of people for whom no religious provision had been made by the country. The revenue of the Irish Church amounted to £586,428, but this revenue was appropriated for the wants of a portion only of the community. Out of the 5,798,564 people shown by the last census to be in Ireland, 5,106,692 were left entirely without any religious provision. The sum, therefore, which he had mentioned, was devoted entirely to the wants of 662,072 persons of the whole number. This was a state of things which called for the active intervention of this country, because it was only by the power of this country that this injustice was perpetrated. Before entering on a discussion of the question he wished to clear the issue from all irrelevant matter, and particularly to dispel one error—that he brought the subject forward as an enemy of the Established Church in England, as it would lead to the same principle being applied to it. Some looked upon this Motion, in fact, as the insertion of the "thin edge of the wedge," or as "an attack upon the outworks" of the English Establishment. He distinctly stated, however, that he did not bring forward his Motion as an enemy of the English Church Establishment. He was a member of that Church. He thought that that Church demanded sweeping reforms; and he had advocated such reforms, not as an enemy of the Church, but as a friend, being convinced that reforms were necessary for the purpose of rallying round her an increased support. He believed she needed reforms which would increase her vitality, which he sincerely wished to do, in evidence of which he might say that if he were to build a church he should endow it in the form of the English Establishment. But the English and Irish Churches rested on different foundations. The English Church rested on the consent and goodwill of the people. That was a perfectly good title, and would be strengthened by reforms. The Irish Church depended on a totally different foundation however. If she were to rest solely on the goodwill and consent of the people of Ireland she would collapse at once; but she really rested on the power, and, he might say, the bayonets, which were employed by this country. He was in favour of applying the same principle to both Churches—that was, resting both on the consent and goodwill of the people. He, for one, looked upon the Irish Church as a source of weakness to the English Church, and though the old commonplace cry, “The Church is in danger,” had been raised, he had heard it so often raised without cause that he had grown thick-skinned in regard to it. The question, however, was what was the real utility of this establishment? — was there any solid foundation for its existence? It must be considered either as a Missionary or a National Church. In all countries the great bulk of the people were of some religious persuasion or other, and the most obvious definition of an Established Church would be that of an establishment by the general consent of the community for the administration of religion. That was not the position in which the Irish Church stood at the present moment. The Irish Church establishment was originally founded in 1172 by the consent of Pope Alexander II., and at the Synod of Cashel the country was divided into parishes, and other arrangements were made. For a number of years, with more or less success, it pursued its mission; it became so far a National Church that the great part of the people were converted to it, and were essentially Roman Catholic. In the reign of Henry VIII., when the Reformation took place, an attempt was made to convert or force the Irish Church to follow that movement; but whatever might have been done by the bishops and clergy the great body of the people never joined the Reformation. It was said that the bishops did go over to the Reformation. But if they did, it should be remembered that the bishops and the clergymen were not the Church, but only the ministers of the Church. As a matter of fact, however, though some might have been lured over, it was not so sure that even the bishops and clergy generally joined the English Church. Bishop Mant, in his History of the Irish Church, (vol. I., p. 88), said that the bishops and the inferior clergy for the most part had remained attached to the Catholic religion. In the reign of Elizabeth he believed that many of them did go over to the English Church; but whether this were so or not, it was quite certain that their conduct was not such as to render their example a great authority, for he found Spencer, in the reign of Elizabeth, writing that some of the Protestant bishops in remote dioceses did not bestow their benefices on the clergy, but kept them in their own hands, or bestowed them on their servants. Bishop Burnett, in his Life of Bedel, also complained that the English Church had neglected the Irish as a nation; that the clergy scarcely considered the Irish as part of their charge, but left them in the hands of the priests, taking no further care of them than making them pay tithes. It was thus abundantly clear that the bulk of the Irish people had not gone over to the Protestant Church. Sir William Petty, in 1672, gave the total population of Ireland as 1,100,000; and of that number 800,000 were Catholics, and 300,000 Protestants, including Presbyterians and others. By a Return made for the purposes of hearth money in 1736, it appeared that the population of Ireland then numbered 1,979,810, of whom 1,417,000 were Roman Catholics, and only 562,000 Protestants. In 1834 there was a Royal Commission, and by their Report it appeared that out of a population of 7,954,000, the Roman Catholics numbered about 6,436,000, and the Protestants about 1,518,000. The last census showed that up to the present time the Established Church in Ireland was making no ground. It returned the total population at 5,728,000, of whom more than 4,000,000 were Catholics. In fact, the Church Establishment in that country never had fulfilled its mission as a national Established Church. From figures given by an eminent dignitary of that Church, Archdeacon Stopford, who published a work the year before last on the subject of the Irish Church, he found that in an Irish vicarage two miles long and two miles wide, and containing 2,800 acres, out of a total population of 238 there were only seventeen Protestants. In another population of 410 only ten were Protestants, and so on. The newest of the pleas set up for this Church was that it was a Missionary Church; but any one who knew anything of the history of Ireland must be aware that it was not deemed to be a Missionary Church by its own dignitaries in former times. One of these dignitaries — Dr. Murray, dean of Armagh — at a comparatively recent date was told by the then Bishop of Limerick that it was out of the sphere of his duty to address the Roman Catholics, as such a proceeding would not be attended with much good, but might result in much mischief; and on a meeting of some hundreds of the clergy in Ireland being told that those rev. gentlemen ought to look to the spiritual wants of the Roman Catholics, there was a shudder of dissent, and the general remark was that such a course of proceeding would set the whole country in a flame. However, they were now told that the Irish Church was a Missionary Church. At the meeting of the Manchester Church Congress, in 1863, the Bishop of Oxford observed that he understood the whole idea of the Church of Ireland to be that it was a Missionary Church. He spoke, of course, from a report of the right rev. Prelate's observations, and without vouching for the accuracy of that report. Now let them see what the missionary success of the Irish Church had been. A Return which he had moved for two years ago, and which was presented on the 24th of March, 1863, showed that there had been a great decrease in the number of the members of the Established Church in Ireland between the years 1834 and 1861. In the former year they numbered 853,651; in the latter only 691,872. He knew it would be attempted to explain this falling off by the famine and the emigration; but it could scarcely be doubted that, as a consequence of the difference in the circumstances of the mass of each of the two religious persuasions, the famine and the emigration must have told much more strongly against the Roman Catholics; and yet the decrease in the total numbers was proportionately much greater in the case of the members of the Established Church than in that of the Roman Catholics. The missionary system had been introduced by the Society for Irish Church Missions. It had been viewed with great jealousy and distrust by the members of the Established Church, and its efforts had been anything but honest. In 1830, a Mr. Bicheno, an able and honest man, published the result of his inquiries into the progress made in converting the Irish. He came to the conclusion that the success of which the Evangelical party boasted was greatly exaggerated; and that the converts were generally either the dependents of proselytizing landlords or persons of abandoned character. In December, 1843, the Rev. Mr. Webster, Chancellor of the diocese of Cork, brought a charge against the Irish missions, which he afterwards proved. Among other things, he stated that agents of the mission had paid persons for pretending to have been of a religion to which they had not belonged. He also said a quantity of bread was given away on Sundays to poor Roman Catholics on the condition that they should learn a verse of the Bible. They took the bread and went away cursing those who had thus tempted them. Again, a number of poor Roman Catholic children were collected together under various pretences, they were placed in a school-house for a few days, and they were then dignified with the name of "converts." These allegations were not made by him (Mr. Dillwyn), but by a clergyman of the Church of England high in office. Whether then they looked at the Irish establishment as a missionary institution, or whether they looked at it as a National Institution, it must be admitted to have been a failure in both respects. But it might be said that it was instituted in order to obtain influence over the people of the country, and so to facilitate government; but if it had failed in converting the people, it must necessarily prove not an assistance but a serious impediment in the way of the administration. Take a parish where there was a clergyman receiving £500 or £600 a year, and having a flock of not more than seventy or eighty persons; but where there were a thousand Roman Catholics, what could be more impossible than for such a state of things to encourage a feeling of good will amongst the people? The priest on the one hand would be obliged to point out to his adherents that he was absolutely dependent upon their liberality, because all the revenues of the parish were appropriated by the small minority who belonged to the establishment. On the other hand, the clergyman would be obliged, in order to justify his anomalous position, to insist that his Roman Catholic parishioners were members of a dangerous and heretical communion. No doubt it was in this way that great part of that polemical bitterness which unhappily prevailed had arisen, and which could not fail seriously to militate with any efforts to secure the good government of the country. The only possible success that could attend an establishment like that in Ireland would be in the way of corruption in buying over political adversaries; and, for all he knew, it might have answered very well in that respect. His hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Scully) had called attention the other night to some facts that looked like it; for he showed that the Chief Secretary had given an Irish living to a clergyman connected with the English borough which he represented, and had passed over the heads of many old and deserving Irish incumbents. Again, he found it stated in the Londonderry Guardian of February 11, 1864, that, on a recent occasion, when a living in that county had fallen vacant, and when the clergy of the diocese were expecting an appointment to be made from amongst their own body, the bishop, with what was called "a precipitancy amounting to indecency," presented the Rev. Thomas Walker, a clergyman of Down, and a son-in-law of the right rev. Prelate. The rev. gentleman was stated to be the third son-in-law for whom the bishop had provided in this way. The number of communications, public and private, which he (Mr. Dillwyn) had received, showed an amount of nepotism, and he might say of corruption, amongst Irish ecclesiastical dignitaries, that was perfectly appalling. Although he trusted on some future occasion to bring those charges under the notice of the House, he did not consider them of sufficient relevance to the question under discussion to allude to them further on that occasion, and his only object in mentioning them was to show what abuses existed in the Church of Ireland under the present system. Before dismissing the subject, he must refer to the vast wealth of the bishops of that Church, who were immensely overpaid for their ecclesiastical services. He would content himself by stating on this point that in the course of sixty-four years the Archbishop of Armagh had received the enormous sum of £887,900. When it was remembered how few were the number of Protestants in Ireland, he could not see upon what grounds the continuance of an Establishment drawing such an immense revenue could be justified. Many of the most eminent statesmen of the day had condemned it in the strongest terms, and that House had years ago passed Resolutions which clearly showed they felt the injustice of maintaining it, which would not have been done had not a strong case been made out. In 1825 a Resolution was passed by a majority of 205 to 182, declaring that it was expedient that provision should be made by law for the maintenance and support of the secular Roman Catholic clergy. Another Resolution was passed in 1835 to this effect—

"That this House will resolve itself into Committee of the whole House, in order to consider the present state of the Church Establishment of Ireland, with the view of applying any surplus revenues to the general purposes of education, without distinction of religion."

He would ask what had been done to give effect to those Resolutions. Why, the Tithe Commutation Act, transferring the collection of tithes from the clergy to the landlords, and the Church Temporalities Act, of no benefit whatever to the Roman Catholics, the object of which was stated to be for the ease and security of the Church, and the advantage of the persons holding thereunder. A number of bishops were reduced, and certain sums were appointed to the augmentation fund for small livings. But these Acts were passed, and nothing had been done to remove the injustice the existence of which he complained of. In fact the latter Act—the 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 37—had been denounced by Mr. Justice Shee in the strongest terms. The only measure which could be said to have been passed to give effect to these Resolutions was the Maynooth Act of 1845; but that was so trifling a matter as not to call for any very great gratitude from the Roman Catholics. His allegations as to the insufficiency of the Church of England in Ireland were further confirmed by the Amendments which had at various times been proposed upon the Resolutions which he had brought before the House. Two years ago, when he asked for restitution, the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Seymour) did not dispute his statements, but proposed a measure of re-arrangement. His plan was that part of the revenues of the Established Church, in parishes in which the Roman Catholics largely exceeded the Protestants in number, should be withdrawn from those parishes, and expended in others where there were more Protestants. But the revenues of a parish belonged not to any general fund, nor to the Church as a great corporation, but to the parish itself, and ought to be expended within it. Last year again the hon. Member for Londonderry (Sir Frederick Heygate) did not deny the existence of the evils of which he complained, but proposed an Amendment declaring that the time was not suitable for making experimental changes in the endowments of the Established Church. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Whiteside) met him more directly, and endeavoured to show that the Roman Catholics did not care about the Established Church, and that his Motion upon the subject was entirely uncalled for. That assertion was answered by the large number of petitions which were presented last year, having upwards of 78,000 signatures, and by those which had been received during the present Session. The right hon. Gentleman had also referred to the religion of Ireland at different periods, but the real question is, not what was the religion of Ireland formerly, but what it is now. The right hon. Gentleman also said, that it was not the business of a private Member to take up this question. In that he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman, and he now only proposed that the House should express its opinion that the subject demanded the early attention of Her Majesty's Government. The year before last the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies said that he would meet the argument with the practical answer that the Government of this country had attempted to carry out a reform of the Irish Church, but had found it impracticable. For his own part, he believed that Ireland had not been fairly dealt with in this matter. The appropriation clause and similar measures were agitated in order to obtain the support of the Roman Catholics to English reforms; but when those reforms were carried the Government threw over the Roman Catholics. It was hardly consistent with good government that a state of things should be allowed to continue of which it had been said that the people were treated as though they belonged to a vile and alien race, that the Church could not be reconciled with propriety and justice, that the present state of things could not be permanent, and that the Church of Ireland was one in which the majority of the people felt no interest, but which they regarded as a badge of degradation. Yet those expressions had been used by the First Minister, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, the Secretary for India, and the President of the Board of Trade. He believed that if the Government were to take up the question in earnest it would receive a large measure of support in this country and he hoped the House would, by acceding to his Resolution, show that they were actuated by a spirit of fair play, and a regard for the feelings of the Irish people as evinced by the number of petitions which had been laid on the table on the subject last year as well as in the present Session.

THE O'DONOGHUE, in seconding the Motion, said, he was glad it had been submitted to the House in an intelligible and unambiguous form. The hon. Gentleman asserted that the present position of the Established Church in Ireland was unsatisfactory, and that there was some ground for that assertion was proved by the fact that it was sustained by the opinion of more than 4,500,000 of the Irish people, by the united voices of Europe and America, and by the statements of a considerable number of the hon. Gentleman's own countrymen, including several leading Members of Her Majesty's Government. The question, however, raised by the Motion was one which it was difficult, if not impossible, to discuss without exciting angry feelings, yet few, he hoped, would on that account be found to maintain that it ought to be passed over in complete silence. People at the present day were not expected to submit to a great public grievance in order to accommodate the feelings of others; and the answer to the objection that the Motion was calculated to produce religious dissensions was, "Let the Irish people have religious equality, and religious dissensions will no longer be found to prevail." But while he was anxious that the question should be discussed as frequently as possible with a view to its being satisfactorily settled, he was equally anxious to refrain from saying or doing anything which might even appear to reflect invidiously upon the religious opinions entertained by his Protestant fellow-countrymen. In considering the position occupied by the Irish Established Church, he drew a distinction between that Church and its revenues. The one was entirely independent of the other, and he took it for granted that if the Established Church were to-morrow deprived of its revenues it would still continue to exist. To assume the contrary would be offensive to the feelings of every sincere and ardent Protestant, while, no doubt, those who were desirous of obstructing the movement of the supporters of the present Resolution would seek to make it appear that they were endeavouring to attack the Protestant faith. It was, therefore, of importance to be explicit on that head; and he, for one, could assure the House that the opponents of the Established Church in Ireland had nothing to do with points of belief, and sought to raise no question as to the soundness or unsoundness of Protestant doctrine, or as to which was the true Church. The only question they were anxious to raise was, whether it was just and reasonable or in accordance with the usage of contemporary nations that the Ecclesiastical State revenues of Ireland should be monopolized by the Church of a small minority of the Irish people. That question he desired to keep clear of all other matters, especially all matters of a controversial character, so that all impartial men, irrespective of country or creed, might be enabled to form a just and impartial judgment on the merits of the case. In dealing with the subject there was a difficulty which every one, he thought, must feel, and that was that the maintenance of the Established Church in Ireland in its present condition had already been discussed with all the force, eloquence, wit, and logic which could be brought to bear upon it, and all to no purpose. It was under those circumstances hard to get rid of the impression that it was a mere waste of time to continue to recapitulate facts and arguments with which most hon. Members were as well acquainted as with their alphabet. That such was the state of things was to some matter for congratulation, because it led them to the conclusion that the Established Church was still holding the position which they wished to see her occupy. He did not, however, hesitate to say that the effect of so persistent a refusal to redress a crying and acknowledged grievance had been to impress the great mass of the people of Ireland with the idea that there was no reliance to be placed on the action of Parliament, and to cause them to regard with suspicion the man who told them that they ought to have every confidence in the wisdom and justice of the House of Commons. And when the House reflected on the length of time during which the question of the Irish Church Establishment had been under the notice of the Legislature, without any remedy being provided, they must, he thought, admit that it was not unnatural the people of Ireland should come to that conclusion. So far back as the year 1834, when O'Connell had made a Motion in that House for a repeal of the Union, the Government of that day moved an Amendment to the effect that all the acknowledged grievances of Ireland should be redressed, and among those grievances the existence of the Established Church was named, but nothing, nevertheless, had since been done towards its removal. Were hon. Members not tired of hearing that Ireland was the only country in the world where the Ecclesiastical State revenues were enjoyed by the Church of the minority, that that anomaly was maintained in defiance of an overwhelming majority, and that in almost every city, town, and borough in Ireland, the Protestants constituted vastly the smaller number of the population, there being large districts in which there was not a single Protestant, and many Protestant clergymen who had in reality no parishioners. Was it not true that when Ireland was judged by the same rules as Spain and France and Belgium she must be held to be a Catholic country; that as a consequence a Protestant State Church in Ireland was altogether out of place, and that its maintenance there could not be supported on any plea of justice or necessity? Was it not also the fact that although that State Church had during a period of more than 300 years enjoyed all the influence arising out of the possession of great resources, it had been emphatically and finally rejected by the vast mass of the Irish people? It appeared to be impossible for the force of human ingenuity either to add to or diminish the weight of such arguments, and the fruitless repetition of them Session after Session only tended to strengthen the impression that there was no use in appealing to the House of Commons for a solution of the question. But though the House of Commons might have stood still with regard to it, the same could not be said of public opinion out of doors, judging from the proceedings at public meetings and the general tone of the press. The present position of the Irish Church establishment had been already condemned by the most enlightened and influential portion of the English press, and it seemed to be generally admitted that it formed a fair subject for legislative interference. The arguments of those who supported the Established Church in its present position appeared to be of the most artificial and hotbed kind. Even the well prepared arguments used two years ago by the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns) were, in some respects, feeble and pettifogging in the extreme. One of those arguments went this length—that if the House of Commons interfered with the ecclesiastical revenues of Ireland, the tenure of private property in that country would be insecure; as if the clergymen in the enjoyment of a church living and his expectant successor in that living stood towards each other in the same position as the owner of a private estate and his heir. Supposing it was true, as stated, that the tithes were paid by the Protestant landowners of Ireland, they had no more claim to them than they had to the unclaimed dividends in the Bank of England, and if the property itself changed hands through the medium of the Landed Estates Court, the tithes would be then, as they were now, the property of the country. It was of the utmost importance to know what course Her Majesty's Government intended to take on the present occasion—the noble Lord at the head of the Government (Viscount Palmerston), the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary (Sir George Grey), and the Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Cardwell) having, in published speeches, given their adhesion in every essential particular to the first part of the Motion of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn). If they agreed with the first portion how could they reject the latter? If they opposed it, he was anxious to hear what reasons they would give. If they said the time was not come for action, he would ask them was the time not always come for acting with justice. He hoped Her Majesty's Government upon the present occasion would show that they were not afraid to take a just course. If they acted in the spirit which had dictated their speeches, he was certain that not only would they have a large gathering in that House, but their vote would commend itself to the great majority of the Irish people, and also to large numbers of persons in England. A vigorous, just, and prompt course taken at this particular moment would have a most beneficial effect, not only upon the state of Ireland, but, perhaps, upon the future prospects of the Empire.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, in the opinion of this House, the present position of the Irish Church Establishment is unsatisfactory, and calls for the early attention of Her Majesty's Government.”—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

SIR GEORGE GREY: Owing to the terms of the Motion itself, and to the direct appeal which the hon. Gentlemen who moved and seconded it have made to Her Majesty's Government, I think it right at once to state that Her Majesty's Government deem it their duty not to give their assent to the Resolution proposed. Before stating the reasons which have governed their decision, let me express my entire agreement with the observation made by the hon. Member for Tralee (the O'Donoghue) at the commencement of his speech, that the discussion of this question does not involve any expression of opinion upon points of doctrine. My opposition to the Motion, therefore, will not be rested upon what I conscientiously believe to be the truth of the religion which I profess, and still less will I impugn the religion of those who differ from me. In discussing this question it would also, I think, be better to keep clear of incidental details, such as those relating to the exercise of patronage which the hon. Member referred to. In this country, I have no doubt parallel cases might be found, if they were narrowly sought for; our decision ought to rest upon much broader grounds. I regretted also that in the speech of my hon. Friend some reflections were cast upon a man so eminent as the late Primate of Ireland (the Archbishop of Armagh), who was utterly undeserving of reproach.

MR. DILLWYN said, that he had not meant to convey anything prejudicial to the character of the late Primate.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I accept the explanation of my hon. Friend, but I am sorry he thought it necessary to adopt the invidious course of calculating the total amount of income which the right rev. Prelate received during the years of his Episcopacy and Primacy. I can assure him that the opinion of all who knew the late Primate was that there never existed a more munificent and benevolent prelate, a warmer friend to the clergy, or a truer supporter of the interests of the Church with which he was connected or one who expended more generously and usefully the income of his office. I come now to consider the Resolution, which consists of two parts. It asks the House, first, to declare that the present position of the Irish Church Establishment is not satisfactory, and then that it calls for the early attention of Her Majesty's Government. If the House were to consent to that Motion with the concurrence of the Government, it would, I apprehend, immediately, or at a very early period, be the duty of the Government to introduce a measure giving effect to that Resolution in the sense in which it was proposed. Now, what is the sense in which the Resolution is submitted to the House? And here I must differ from the hon. Member for Tralee, who held that the first part of the Motion had the merit of being free from all ambiguity. A more ambiguous Resolution I never saw. The wording is such that a person warmly attached to the Established Church, but wishing to see further changes made in the same direction as those carried into effect by the Act of 1833, might be led to vote for its adoption. At first sight, one might almost suppose that it would secure the vote of the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Seymour), who last year advocated changes which, at any rate, he honestly believed would promote the greater efficiency of the Church of Ireland. But I must say that the speeches of my hon. Friend who moved and the hon. Gentleman who seconded the Motion leave no doubt at all as to the real objects of the Motion. The hon. Gentleman does not ask for reform in the Irish Church; he draws a distinction between the Established Church in England and in Ireland; and while professing himself an attached member of the Church of England, and desirous only of sweeping reforms in it, he believes that sweeping reforms would do no good in Ireland. If changes such as those made by the Act of 1833 were carried further, and the number of bishops still further diminished, there is not the slightest intimation on the part of the hon. Gentleman that he would not again bring forward and press this very Motion. Two years ago, when a similar Motion was brought forward, the hon. Member answered that the changes which had been made in the reduction of the number of bishops and in the abolition of church rates did not touch the real issue which he wished to raise. That real issue is not whether any part of the Establishment can be reformed, but whether it shall continue to have any existence whatever as an Established Church. That being the case, Her Majesty's Government have no hesitation in saying that they are not prepared to undertake the responsibility of proposing to Parliament a Bill calculated to effect that object. They believe that this object cannot be obtained except by means which must inflict great injury upon Ireland and involve the country in the risk of very great dangers. The object can only be effected by exciting the bitterest animosities in that country, by producing a conflict of opinion—and I do not say that matters would stop even there—which must throw back the improvement of Ireland to a great extent, and must retard to an indefinite time the arrival of the period that we are sometimes inclined to hope for, when Irishmen, irrespective of creed and politics, will combine together with unanimity and energy, to promote the moral, social, and material well-being of their country. If, as a mere abstract question, I were asked to say that the present position of the Irish Church is not satisfactory, I should probably not differ much from the hon. Gentleman. But when the hon. Gentleman refers to speeches made by myself and other Members of Her Majesty's Government, I must say that he does not do us justice when he detaches separate sentences from the context with which they were surrounded, and from the occasions on which the speeches were uttered. I have often said that I think the establishment of an endowed church in any country where that endowed church is the church of a comparatively small minority, no provision being made by law for religious worship in accordance with the views of the majority, is a course which, viewed as a theoretical and abstract question, cannot possibly be defended. If we were now for the first time considering what should be done, I should think it unwise to take such a course as that which was taken in Ireland, for I should think that it could only produce dissatisfaction and discontent among the people. But with reference to the existing state of things I differ from the hon. Gentleman. When, therefore, reference is made to speeches heretofore addressed to the House on this subject, the House must remember that they were made with reference to some definite object and scheme which was before Parliament at the time. We have been reminded of the Appropriation Clause, and my hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) thinks it would have been easy to have carried that clause if the Government had exerted themselves and had shown themselves in earnest. I believe that my hon. Friend had not a seat in the House when that subject was discussed; but there are hon. Members now present who were in the House at the time, and I ask them whether the Government did not use every effort to induce Parliament to agree to the proposal then made—a proposal which was perfectly consistent with an intention to continue the existence of the Established Church in Ireland, but which provided some means of diminishing the dissatisfaction sure to be excited by an exclusive system. I say, the Government did their best to effect the object, but found insuperable obstacles in the way. Well, then, other speeches were made in 1844 or 1845 when Sir Robert Peel proposed the endowment of Maynooth. Nearly all those with whom I am connected cordially supported that measure. Our arguments were that there existed an exclusive Irish Church Establishment for the benefit of Protestants, and the existence of that Church made it necessary to do what would otherwise be neither necessary nor expedient—provide the means of education for the Irish priesthood. If the Irish Church were not in existence, no such provision for the education of the Roman Catholic clergy would have been expedient. It was because the Irish Protestant Church did exist, and would continue to exist as part of the United Church of England and Ireland, that I advocated the Maynooth Endowment Act, and I still think that that was the only justification of the measure. What we have to deal with is the existing state of things. I have stated my opinion on the abstract question. But am I at liberty to press that opinion without reference to all the consequences which it might entail? I think, on the contrary, we must look to the practical result of such an opinion if it were reduced to practice. We have the Irish Protestant Church established as an existing institution in Ireland. It is not of recent creation; it rests upon the prescription of centuries; and, to use the expression of a distinguished Roman Catholic layman, it is rooted in our institutions. The firm belief of the Government is that it could not be subverted without revolution, with all the horrors that attend revolution. And for what object is this end sought? I have said that the creation of an Established Church for the benefit of only a small minority is theoretically indefensible. But how do we now stand with regard to this question in Ireland? Nothing has been said with regard to the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. But if I had not known the avowed opinions of the Roman Catholics, I should have inferred that the hon. Member for Tralee (the O'Donoghue) was anxious to transfer the revenues of the Established Church to his own Church; that his object and desire were to separate the revenues of the Established Church from the Church, and to give them to the bishops and the clergy of the Roman Catholic Church, who are looked up to by the great body of the people. ["No, no!"] If I had not heard a distinct disavowal from the hon. Member I should have understood that such was his meaning; but I know that that is contrary to the opinions of the Roman Catholic body. Now, my hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) reminded us of a Resolution passed by this House in 1825, which expressed the opinion that endowments ought to be provided for the Roman Catholic clergy, and he seemed to taunt the Government for not acting upon the Resolution, and for not proposing to make some provision for the Roman Catholic Church. I sincerely regret that such a provision does not exist; that after the Union the measures which were contemplated by the authors of the Union were not carried into effect; that civil liberty was not at once given to the Roman Catholics as they were led to expect, and that some provision was not made for the endowment of the Roman Catholic priesthood. But would such a proposal now be listened to for a moment—I will not say by Parliament, but by the people of this country? Is there not a feeling in this country—I do not say it is a right feeling, but still it exists—which would make it impossible, with any chance of success, to propose such a measure; and have we not, moreover, been told of repeated declarations by Roman Catholics that they would not accept such a provision even if it were made? What, then, is the practical grievance? We have in Ireland an Established Church resting upon long, unbroken prescription. It is all very well to say, "Give us religious equality and there will be religious harmony;" but we must bear in mind that this branch of the Church of England and Ireland is very dear to a large body of Protestants in Ireland, and they would not give it up without a struggle. The clergy of the Church enjoy, for the most part, moderate incomes. They live in the country—not absentees—and spend those incomes there for the good of the country. Speaking generally—for there are exceptions in every church—they perform their duties unobtrusively, with faithfulness, and with zeal; for the most part, too, they show charity towards their neighbours, and desire not to give any needless offence to the feelings of those around them. Side by side with them is the Roman Catholic Church, unendowed, but the Church of the great mass of the people. No one will deny that that Church enjoys the greatest possible amount of freedom, it is subject to no control from the State; no exercise of intolerance towards it can be alleged; and, moreover, we find this Church repudiating any desire to possess one shilling of the revenues of the Established Church, or any State endowment. No doubt, there was formerly a serious practical grievance. He could not agree with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dillwyn) in the light and disparaging terms in which he spoke of the Tithe Commutation Act. When tithes existed under the old system, and the Protestant clergy in collecting them were brought into hostile collision with the people, scenes took place which were disgraceful in any Christian country, and could not but produce the greatest possible prejudice against the religion which these clergymen taught. Still, they used the only means which the law gave them for enforcing the payment of those tithes. But, we now have none of these scenes; the Protestant clergy are no longer placed in a position of personal antagonism with those residing in their parishes. Tithes are now a rent-charge on the land. The land is bought and sold subject to the rent-charge; and it is admittedly paid for the most part by Protestant landlords. No one supposes that if these tithes were taken from the Established Church they would be allowed to go into the pockets of the landowners. The tithes would be treated, no doubt, as national property; they would be applied in paying the police, or in defraying some of those charges to which the Consolidated Fund is now liable. As a matter of feeling, no doubt, there is a grievance. I am not surprised at discontent existing from the cause I have mentioned, and I should be glad to redress it. But it is impossible to do so without producing evils of far greater magnitude than those which now exist, and without involving the country in dissensions which would be totally destructive of peace and of progress. For these reasons, believing that the object avowed by those who have brought forward the Resolution is one which could not be attained without great mischief, being of opinion that no practical grievance exists, and that in attempting to redress the theoretical grievance, a great shock would be given to our laws and institutions, I can have no hesitation on the part of the Government in opposing the Motion.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: In taking part in the debate which has arisen on this important subject I trust that I shall follow the example which has been set by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey), and by the hon. Member (the O'Donoghue), and say nothing calculated to wound the feelings of anybody who may differ from me. At the same time I must speak, firmly and strongly, on behalf of those opinions which I hold with respect to the Irish Church, or rather that branch of the United Church of England and Ireland. Sir, it was said by Mr. Ward, when bringing forward this question, on more than one occasion, as has also been said by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir George Grey), that this was a question which the strongest Government could not carry without disturbing the honest convictions of many, and wounding the feelings and sentiments of those whose sympathies are enlisted with the Irish Church. I am not surprised that the question has been raised. It is impossible to be surprised at it. Nor am I surprised at the quarter from which the movement comes. The hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), with that candour which he always uses in this House, has shown us the objects he has in view, and the party with which he is acting; and we see at once that the hon. Member, though he may not be prepared to go as far as those with whom he is acting, is advocating principles which inevitably lead to this result—that they would be fatal to the Church of Ireland, and eventually to the Church in this country. After the Census of 1851, much was heard in this House as to the conclusion at which we were bound to arrive with reference to the facts there detailed; and attack after attack was made upon the Church in England, in consequence of what were alleged to be the results obtained from that census. The census was carefully examined; the facts were inquired into; and they were found by no means to lead to the conclusion which those who relied upon them asserted. We were told that the members of the Church of England had become a minority, and that it was in a state of decline; but when we came to test the figures we found they did not bear out that conclusion—that they utterly failed to establish the proposition which the enemies of the Church had so confidently put forward. The attacks upon the Church of England declined. The Census of 1861 came; and those who had been attacking the Church of England refused to apply the test to 1861, which had been so imperfectly applied in 1851. Such was not the case in Ireland. The Churchmen of Ireland were ready to enter into an investigation. It was entered into; and the result was found lamentable, indeed, in its general bearings, showing that the country had gone through a period of deep suffering, as proved by the decline of population which had taken place. But it was also discovered that the figures showing this decline of population exhibited an increase among Churchmen as compared with other religious bodies in that country. When the hon. Member for Swansea speaks of the number that existed in the year 1834, and of the decline from 800,000 in 1834 to 691,000 in 1861 he omitted to state that in 1834 the Wesleyan Methodists—a body of considerable numbers in Ireland—were reckoned among the Churchmen, whereas in the year 1861 they were not so reckoned, and therefore the decline was by no means in the proportion which the hon. Member supposed. The figures show that there has been a relative increase of the Protestant population, as compared with the Roman Catholics and other bodies in that country. That being so, why is this question now raised? I believe that at this moment, by emigration alone, which is still going on, the proportions between the different bodies are still being changed, and still being changed in favour of the Church. The hon. Member for Swansea has dealt with the question, as said by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir George Grey), as if it were an abstract and theoretical question, upon which we could decide without trenching upon what I will not call the prejudices, but the deep-seated feelings of those connected with the Established Church, either in this country or Ireland. The hon. Member says that this state of things is unsatisfactory; but in the hon. Member's view the Church Establishment in Ireland has always been unsatisfactory, and therefore was unsatisfactory when by a solemn league and covenant between the two nations of England and Ireland it was made an essential compact that the Church in Ireland should be maintained as an establishment in conjunction with the Church of England. The hon. Member for Tralee says that this Church is a badge of national servitude. [The O'Donoghue expressed dissent.] I am not quoting the exact words of the hon. Member, but perhaps I might use those terms, because the hon. Member took part in the National Association in Ireland, in which the expressions in question were made use of. [The O'Donoghue: I have taken no part in it.] Then I beg the hon. Member's pardon; but, at any rate, the hon. Member spoke of the Church Establishment as a degradation to Roman Catholics as being the majority. The hon. Member for Swansea talks of the foundation of the Irish Church as having taken place in 1172, whereas that Church was founded in Ireland in 432, and existed with bishops, priests, and deacons as an independent Church, knowing nothing up to the time of Henry II. of the rule of the Roman Pontiff. I believe that the real time when the badge of national servitude was fixed upon Ireland was when Henry II. compelled the Church to become a vassal of the Pope of Rome. I say, looking back at the history of the Irish Church, beginning with the 5th century, it appears that she was only 400 years under the Roman Pontiff, and that during the remainder of the time—namely, for above 1,000 years, she has been free. The Church that is established in Ireland is a continuation of the Church that existed before Henry II. went there; and I feel that in defending that Church I am defending a Church that is holding the tenets and carrying out the views of the primitive Church. While I defend it upon these and other grounds, I also defend it upon the ground that I believe it to be true. Where is the degradation that is submitted to by the Roman Catholics in Ireland in connection with the Established Church? It was said in 1853 by Earl Russell that he could not agree with those who stated that there was that degradation. The noble Lord agreed that there was an ecclesiastical difference, but said there was no religious difference, adding, "You have perfect freedom for your religion, and with respect to social and political degradation it no longer exists." Then with regard to the ecclesiastical difference. We have heard from the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) that the Roman Catholic body have no wish to receive the revenues of the Church. We have heard that they have no wish to receive endowments from the State, and I think we may feel sure from their statements that they would not be inclined to give up any of their privileges in return for any emoluments they might receive from the State. They have, therefore, perfect religious freedom and equality in the true sense of the words. They have not the endowments which have been conferred upon another Church, but they have religious equality, and they do not ask for endowments to put them upon an ecclesiastical equality. Is this Motion brought forward on the ground of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield), that there is no right for the existence of an Established Church in any country? If so, while combating the hon. Member for Swansea, I am fighting also with those who would destroy the Establishment not only in Ireland, but in England, in Scotland, and wherever else they might meet with it. That being so, am I not justified in saying that this degradation, which is one of feeling, and sentiment is one which must apply in a parish just as much as in a country. Suppose, for instance, in a parish in Wales there be a majority of Dissenters: they see the clergyman receiving his income for ministering to a minority of parishioners. Do they feel this ecclesiastical inequality? Do they feel this moral degradation? Do they feel this wrong? If the argument be put on the ground of ecclesiastical inequality, then I am justified in saying that the hon. Member for Swansea while attacking the Church in Ireland is also attacking the Church in England. Well, is there any pecuniary pressure? The word tithes gives people the notion that there is a tenth of the produce of the land handed over to some person or other; but I venture to say that in Ireland the tithes are so reduced that they do not affect one-fiftieth part of the produce of the land. The pecuniary pressure is not felt. The peasantry have ceased to feel it, and the great majority of the landlords do not object to it, because they are in connection with this Church, and it is paid through them. It is not, however, taken from the landlords in reality, because it is something that never belonged to them but always belonged to the Church. The hon. Member for Tralee says that the property of the Church is a different kind of thing from the property held by landowners; but Lord Plunket laid it down in the strongest terms that in his opinion there was no difference between them. It seems to be thought that you would be conferring a great boon by preserving the life interests in Church property; but in doing this you do not touch the root of the matter, for the property is not for the clergy but for the Church, and the people have a vested right in it. The population who are or may be Churchmen in Ireland have rights in it; for they ought to be able to find in every parish and place a pastor and a church, and the means of grace in connection with the Established Church. The Churchmen in Ireland are not to be put on a different footing to those in England; for it was upon that basis that we obtained their assent to the Union, and it would be unreasonable and unfair now to turn round upon the Protestants of Ireland and tell them "you have entered into a league with us upon this understanding, but now that we have got the Union and you have lost your national Parliament, you shall not be treated as Churchmen in England are treated; but — as the hon. Member has said—there shall be a complete separation between one Church and the other, we will support one and overthrow the other, and that, too, upon grounds which equally existed at the time of the Union as after it." With respect to this question of property I cannot help observing that in connection with the wrongs and grievances of Ireland, as put forward by those who assume to state them—the Association to which I have referred—there is prominence given to the question of what is called tenant-right in connection with the question of the Established Church. There is this agitation with reference to the property of the landlord and the Church, and I say if either of them perform their duty inefficiently let it be proved, and let amendment take place; but I deny that you have any right to take the property of the landlord or of the Church to provide a remedy for these supposed evils. I quite admit that in the Resolutions of the National Association language is carefully framed, so as not to indicate any invasion of the rights of property; but although the leaders may be careful, what are we to say to those who are led? Is it possible to look at the tone used in reference to the question of tenant-right without saying that it goes farther than mere tenant-right, and aims at an unjust violation of the rights of property of the landlord. I say it is remarkable that these two things are connected together, and that when there is what we call in England a “dead set” made at the Church, there is also an attack by the same party upon the property in the land. England, as it seems to me, is materially concerned in this question, and it is for this reason that I venture to submit myself to the House at this early period in the debate. Churchmen in England feel deeply interested in the honour of the Established Church in England, which they feel is bound up in this question of the position of the Established Church in Ireland. I feel as deep an interest in the position of the Church in Ireland as in that in England. As branches of the United Church of England and Ireland, they stand upon grounds so similar that you cannot attack the one without materially injuring the other. I believe that the old proverb, “Those who would England win, must with Ireland first begin,” describes truly the source of this agitation. It is remarkable how the attacks upon the Church in England have been withdrawn, whilst in the previous Session—a tolerably long one—the hon. Member (Mr. Dillwyn) kept his Motion in reference to the Irish Church before the public, though there were several occasions on which he could have brought it forward. [“No, no!”] The hon. Member says “No,” but I may remark that there was an expectation that the previous Session might be the last of this

Parliament, and the hon. Member kept his Motion dangling before our eyes, and as the notion of it being the last Session disappeared, so disappeared the Resolution of the hon. Member. It has now re-appeared—I will not say in reference to future events—though it is probable that hon. Members may think it not undesirable to discuss that question with a view to influencing certain constituencies. I was saying that I view the Church in England and in Ireland as one Church, and that we are bound to maintain them upon the same grounds. The view of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield), and of those who act with him is, that the supremacy of any one religion ought not to be tolerated; and I feel that this sentiment applies equally to England as to Ireland, and that therefore the interests of the two Churches are combined. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has made answer for the Government as to the view which they take of this question, and I do not find fault with him. The Motion of the hon. Member (Mr. Dillwyn) seems to me to be a trap to catch all that will fall into it. He says it is—

I have stated that of late years there has been no change except a change for the better in respect to the Irish Church, and that its relative numbers have increased; and this very question which it is said calls for early attention has been again and again brought before various Governments, and has been considered fully, carefully, and anxiously. It is one that requires the early attention of the House, yet has it not had minute attention from all the great statesmen who have sat in this House? In 1833, 1834, and 1835, there were full discussions upon it. Again, during the Government of Sir Robert Peel, when he was in power, Mr. Ward brought forward the question on several occasions, and it was then most fully discussed. The language used on those occasions by the present head of Her Majesty’s Government (Viscount Palmerston) was not so much against the Established Church as in favour of the Endowment of the Roman Catholic priesthood. Language was then used which showed that if right hon. Gentlemen opposite had to begin again they would not create such an institution as exists in Ireland. They used, no doubt, strong language in reference to the Establishment in Ireland; but what was mainly urged by the noble Lord was, that he had a great desire to see the Roman Catholic clergy furnished with glebes and glebe-houses, and other fit endowments. Much the same opinion was expressed by Earl Russell. A surplus was talked of in reference to the Appropriation Clause, but that surplus never was found, and never will be found; for the funds of the Church are totally inadequate to the wants of the clergy who are doing her work, and to the people who benefit by it. Moreover, Additional Curates Societies and voluntary contributions of all kinds are required to eke out the scanty revenues derived by the Church, not from endowments in the sense of receiving anything from the State, but from property which is her own. Indeed, her property has seldom been given to her by the State. It was mainly the gift of private individuals in earlier times; and I may mention for the information of the hon. Member for Swansea, who seems to imagine that the Irish Church only came into existence in A.D. 1172, that there are lands now belonging to the diocese of Meath which were granted, I believe, as long ago as the sixth century. The hon. Member, notwithstanding these considerations, seems to think that the question is one which has only to be thrown before the Government, and to become easy of solution. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite used the question against the Government of Sir Robert Peel; but a change began to take place when they came into Office, for nothing has been done by them in conformity with the speeches which had been made, and I do not blame them for it, for I believe that they found it impracticable to deal with the Church in the way in which, while in opposition, they had suggested. Speaking for the Government two years ago, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Bernal Osborne), the present Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Cardwell), in that measured and guarded language which it is his habit to use, said it would be—

"To re-open that great question of Irish and British politics, which agitated Parliament, governed parties, and disorganized Ireland. . . . We ought not to disturb a question of this sort, touching the foundation of the moral, social, and political interests of the people, without grave cause, and without a well founded hope of bringing it to a safe and satisfactory conclusion. . . . It is a very serious matter for those who are responsible, as Members of this House are, for the good government and the well-being of the country, to appoint a Committee to unsettle a question without a prospect of bringing it to a safe and satisfactory conclusion. . . . What he (Mr. Bernal Osborne) really means is an abstract Resolution of this House again condemning the Irish Church. . . . I believe this House will not surrender the principle of an Established Church, I believe it will not alienate the property of the Church from the ecclesiastical uses to which it has been devoted."—[3 Hansard, clxxi. 1583-4-5 & 6.]

That was the conclusion at which, after long Parliamentary experience, the Colonial Secretary arrived. But in 1853, speaking upon the Motion of the then hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. Moore), the noble Lord the present Foreign Secretary (Earl Russell) took still stronger ground, and recanted what he had formerly said as to the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church, feeling the difficulties which had arisen to be absolutely insuperable. That noble Lord said—

"Now, as I wish to speak with as much frankness as the hon. Gentleman who spoke last, let me not be misunderstood as saying that this character belongs generally to the lay members of the Roman Catholic Church. I am far from saying so. I am far from denying that there are many Members of this House, and many members of the Roman Catholic persuasion, both in this country and in Ireland, who are attached to the throne and to the liberties of this country; but what I am saying, and that of which I am convinced, is, that if the Roman Catholic clergy had increased power given to them, and if they, as ecclesiastics, were to exercise greater control and greater political influence than they do now, that power would not be exercised in accordance with the general freedom that prevails in this country; and that neither in respect to political circumstances nor upon other subjects would they favour that general freedom of discussion and that activity and energy of the human mind that belong to the spirit of the constitution of this country. I do not think that in that respect they are upon a par with the Presbyterians of Scotland. The Presbyterians of Scotland, the Wesleyans of this country, and the Established Church of this country and of Scotland, all, no doubt, exercise a certain influence over their congregations; but that influence which they thus exercise over their congregations must be compatible with a certain freedom of the mind—must be compatible with a certain spirit of inquiry, which the ministers of these churches do not dare to overstep, and, which, if they did overstep it, that influence would be destroyed. I am obliged, then, to conclude—most unwillingly to conclude, but most decidedly—that the endowment of the Roman Catholic religion in Ireland in the place of the endowment of the Protestant Church in that country, in connection with the State, is not an object which the Parliament of this country ought to adopt or to sanction. Sir, these opinions of mine may lead to conclusions unpalatable to many who belong to the Roman Catholic Church. They may lead to a persistence in a state of things that I quite admit to be anomalous and unsatisfactory; but I am obliged as a Member of this Parliament to consider—and to consider most seriously in the present state of the world—that which is best adapted to maintain the freedom and permanence of our Institutions. I must look around me at what is passing elsewhere. I must see what is taking place in Belgium. I must see what is taking place in Sardinia and in various countries of Europe. I must regard the influence which, if not exercised, has been attempted to be exercised in the United Kingdom of late years. Seeing these things, I give my decided resistance to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman for the abolition of the Established Church in Ireland upon the principles which I have stated, and which appear to me to be conclusive against the Motion.”—[3 Hansard, cxxvii. 945-6.]

Now the noble Lord was one of those who had been most eager and earnest in 1843-4 to support the Motions of Mr. Ward to take the revenues of the Irish Church and apply them to the endowment, not of the Roman Catholics alone, but of all the creeds that existed in the country. I do not mean to say that those who supported the Motion were bound by the result which Mr. Ward was prepared to proceed to; but certainly they were prepared to take away the funds from the Established Church, and to bestow them in some way unconnected with that Establishment and its purposes. This being the case, it was afterwards found that the difficulties had become insuperable, and then the hon. Member (Mr. Dillwyn) calmly says that the Government must give their early attention to the question. Why, the question has been considered and studied by every Government, and it has been found impossible to deal with it without causing evils which would be much greater than those you think that you could cure. I do not believe in the discontent that is so much spoken of, for it is there as it is in this country, the agitation against the Church has come down from above, and does not rise up from below. The leaders tell the people that they have grievances which they do not feel. The peasantry of Ireland do not feel these grievances, for I believe that they have found their warmest and kindest friends in the beneficed clergymen. It has been proved over and over again that those who have emigrated send money for their families and friends far exceeding in amount the stipends of the clergymen to whom they remit it, and they send to them in preference to sending to the ministers of their own religion. I do not say this out of any feeling of disrespect for the Roman Catholic priests, but this shows me that the Protestant clergymen have been the friends of all the people in their parishes, and not only of those of their own communion. And yet, when making comparisons, hon. Gentlemen are accustomed to say, “Oh, this man has only twenty or thirty persons to take charge of;” but in England they always added the Dissenters to the Churchmen, and estimate the whole population of the parish as under the charge of its clergyman. What I have mentioned shows me that the clergy in Ireland, as in England, have acted in all charity towards the people, as resident gentlemen and landlords ought to act, and as their tried friends, and that the people have shown that they appreciate this and repose trust in them. There may, indeed, be instances where the clergymen neglect their duty, as some men in all relations of life do, but it is hard to fix upon one or two cases and charge the facts against all, especially now, for there never was a time when the Irish clergy were doing their duty more effectually than at the present time. Now as to the position which the Irish Church occupies, I feel that I am to a certain extent upon delicate ground when I deal with religious subjects, but I am obliged to look at this country in the position she assumed for herself when she established the Church and the Crown upon the principles of the Reformation. This country is a country with a Reformed Church, and the Act of Settlement provides that its monarch must be a member of that Church. There are one or two great civil offices that are still reserved for members of the Church, and I must say that everything that has taken place has shown that in the main this country, while wishing to give absolute freedom to all other religions, desires her statesmen to maintain the principles of the Reformed Church. I cannot help looking at this question in that light. We have a Reformed Church not so much by a change of Church, for the people who had been in allegiance to the Pope ceased to own that allegiance, and remained members of the Church of England. The succession of bishops and pastors remained the same. In Ireland, there has not been the same change in the feelings of the population though at first there was. I wish to deal with the subject justly, and not to blink anything in the discussion of the question, for it is one which will bear any amount of examination, and come out all the better at the close of it. In the beginning the Irish princes and chieftains accepted Henry VIII. and his supremacy almost universally; but when it came to the reign of Elizabeth things had clearly changed. Still the Church of Ireland has ever since remained in connection with the State as a Reformed Church. At the Union you adopted this principle, made the two Churches one, and thus consecrated it. But it was not a new union of the Churches in their spiritual character, for they had been in union in that sense long before. So early as 1172 there had been an interchange of pastors between them, and their clergy-men passed from one country to the other. The Churches were completely united, and that is the answer to the observation of the hon. Member (Mr. Dillwyn) that the Act of Union did nothing as to the temporalities. It protected these Churches as established; and what is the meaning of this, unless it applies to their revenues and their connection with the State. Of both these you now wish to deprive that Church. No Parliamentary compact could unite Churches which were in religion disunited; but the English and Irish Churches were one in doctrine and discipline. I believe it was intended at the time of the Union to have endowed the Roman Catholic Church, but it was not intended to attach to it the revenues of the Church Establishment. On the contrary, it was contemplated to give the Irish Church even more than she had before, and to add to her dignity. I have found a passage, though in what connection I cannot now remember, in which Lord Grenville, who had taken an active part in the accomplishment of the Union, and knew well what was intended, said—

"The plans which were in contemplation included, in the first place, measures of considerable benefit to the Establishment, calculated to promote both its honour and its advantage, and to render it far more adequate than it now can be to the purposes for which it was provided."

The Union, therefore, in reference to the Church was, it seems to me, one of the most solemn obligations that was ever entered into. They had a Protestant Parliament in Ireland, and it was with that Parliament that you negotiated, and at the same time there were negotiations with the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church, and I believe that when their assent was obtained they knew very much the terms of the arrangement. I believe that they expected to be endowed, and it is a question whether they might not have been then endowed in accordance with that view; but I question very much whether any such proposition could now be submitted to Parliament with any advantage. I quote from a speech of a most distinguished statesman, now no longer amongst us—Sir James Graham—made in 1854, to show that he was prepared to forego his political friendships—when he, in fact, abandoned the Government, and took his place in a different part of the House—rather than join in an attack upon the Irish Church. He said of a similar proposal to the present—

"I regret all these nostrums; they are incompatible with that preference which the Protestant State of England, as a fundamental principle, has decided on giving in favour of the Protestant Church Establishment. I stand upon the choice made by this country at the Reformation, sealed by the Act of Settlement, and ratified by the Act of Union. I hold that preference to be among the firmest foundations of our liberties."

And again, in 1844, he said—

"It has been the object of the Government, and will continue to be its object, to remove all the abuses which exist in connection with the Irish Church, to purify it to the utmost; but, after having removed these abuses, and after having thus purified it, it is the intention of the Government to use its best efforts resolutely to maintain it as the Established Church of Ireland."—[Standard, lxxv. 617-18.]

If there be abuses let them be remedied; and I rejoice to say that the Primate of Ireland has stated in a recent charge, that no one is so ready to remedy them as the bishops of the Church of Ireland themselves. I believe that this is so. But many of these abuses have passed away, and for this reason it is that speeches of hon. Members opposite go back to a period that has long gone by, and turn our attention to things that no longer exist—to abuses that formerly caused anger and irritation in Ireland. I say that the Union was a compact of nations, and that you are bound to maintain it. I need not quote the evidence of bishops and eminent authorities in the Roman Catholic Church before Committees, or state how they repudiated the very notion of any desire to subvert or damage the Churches of England or Ireland. I need not state how Mr. Blake repudiated, in the strongest terms, such a course, and considered it would be a fatal one to adopt, dangerous to the general securities we possess for liberty, property, and order. What did Lord Plunket, the great advocate of the Roman Catholic claims, say? Why, that no wrong so great could be inflicted upon Irishmen as to impute to them that they ever had such designs, or that they ever could entertain them. A passage to that effect was quoted by Sir Robert Peel in reference to the Act of 1829, when speaking on Mr. Ward's Motion in 1844; and Sir Robert Peel added that, "no national compact could have more binding force than that entered into at the time of the Union." Lord Plunket said, on the part of the Roman Catholics—

"There are many who really think, and some who affect to think, that great dangers may result from concession to the Establishment. I declare solemnly that if I could enter into that opinion—if I could see anything of peril to the Church or State—dear to my heart as are the interests of my fellow men, I would abandon these long-asserted claims, and range myself with their opponents. . . . On the part of the Roman Catholics, I will be bold to say that they harbour no principle of hostility to our Establishment. . . . Every rational Roman Catholic feels himself no more at liberty to attempt the subversion of our Establishment than to entertain the unworthy purpose of depriving an individual of his property."—[2 Hansard, iv. 980-2 & 3.]

"I think I had a good right to conclude from the declared opinion of the chosen champion of the Roman Catholics themselves, speaking distinctly with their authority, that the removal of those disabilities was compatible with the maintenance of the Protestant Establishment, and that they did not regard the maintenance of that Establishment in the light either of an insult or an injury. . . . Then, with respect to the Union, I think there cannot be a doubt that Mr. Pitt intended to assure the Protestant mind in England and Ireland that the Protestant Establishment, as it then generally existed, should be thereafter maintained.

. . . . If ever public engagements were made for the maintenance of any public institution, those engagements were made at the time of the Union, when the Protestant Parliament of Ireland consented to the relinquishment of their independence as a Parliament; and I must say, as an actor in the great event of 1829, that I do believe it was the intention of the Government or of the Parliament of that day to create an impression in the Protestant mind of this country that the removal of the Roman Catholic disabilities was not only compatible with the maintenance of the integrity of the Church, but that the integrity of the Church should be maintained."—[3 Hansard, lxxv. 650-1 & 2.]

Are these pledges unmeaning things? Are we to be told that the successors of these statesmen are not to be bound by these pledges? Think what an argument you are putting in the mouth of those who resist further concessions. You are making those who were called "bigoted old Tories and intolerants," who were laughed at and scoffed at for predicting such things, turn out true prophets. I say, Sir, that the national compact made at the Union was confirmed by the Roman Catholics through their agents in 1829. It may be said that the people have arrived at a greater knowledge of liberty since that time, and now see grievances which they did not see before; but I have proved that the grievance is not one of political or social degradation, but one of feeling. It may be said that the Roman Catholics do not want these dignities and revenues themselves, but that they want to take them away from those who possess them. We are then called on by this Motion, for it goes to the root of the matter, to violate the fundamental principles established at four great eras. That is—to violate, first, the principles of the Reformation; secondly, of the Act of Settlement; thirdly, of the Union; and fourthly, of the Act of 1829. And for what? Is it to buy peace? We have been told so before, but it is not by surrendering principles that you can buy peace. The hon. Member for Swansea speaks of the Church of Ireland as being propped up by bayonets. Surely that is a fiction which can hardly exist even in the mind of the hon. Gentleman. The population of Ireland is at peace; life and property are secure; and crime was never at so low an ebb as at present. The peasantry of Ireland do not regard the Irish Church as a grievance, but look upon their pastors as friendly neighbours whom they can trust and who trust them. Is peace to be bought by treachery or dishonour—by violating pledges dear to one portion of Irishmen in order to conciliate another? You have given the Protestants of Ireland the security that this Established Church should be maintained. Do you think they have no feelings and no sentiments, or that feelings of animosity will not be excited by such a Motion as the present? Do you think you will not disturb the peace of the Roman Catholic peasantry by inviting them to a spoliation of the Church you have solemnly promised to maintain? And what will all this do? A debate occurred with respect to Ireland a few nights ago. We heard of her distresses. I grieved for them—my blood runs cold at the recollection of the sufferings she has undergone. No sufferings could be greater; but will you alleviate them by the abolition of the Church Establishment. Will carrying such a Motion alleviate the evils which exist in Ireland? Will it bring trade, agriculture, or commerce, or open the ports of the country? A former hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Miall) recommended that the money obtained from the spoliation of the Irish Church should be devoted to building lighthouses and public works. But if you abstract that money you will lose the money now granted from public revenue, and dry up its source. It was proposed by Mr. Miall, when in this House, to sell the tithes at ten years' purchase; but I trust the landlords too well understand their duty to receive any such bribe. Is absenteeism a great evil in Ireland? If so, you are proposing to remove a large number of resident gentlemen, who, if not in the character of clergymen, as educated gentlemen, are engaged in advancing civilization and administering charity with impartiality and fairness. And, in addition to that, you are still further increasing absenteeism; because, do you suppose that landlords will remain on their estates when they are deprived of the ministrations of their Church, and when the clergy, who are their neighbours and friends, are removed to a distance? There would be a loss to Ireland even in a money point of view. The endowment of the Roman Catholic Church might be set aside. It is said it would be refused. It would be impossible to give it from the funds of the country. But there would be a still greater difficulty, if the endowment were provided by the State by seizing the property of the establishment for the purpose; there would, indeed, be intolerable heart-burning if you took the endowment from the Protestants and attempted to confer it on the Roman Catholics. The hon. Member for Swansea says this Church is not a National Church, because it is not connected with the majority. I say that when it was united with the Church of England it became one united Church, and that after such union you have no more right to isolate Ireland than to isolate any particular parish in this country, or to isolate the principality of Wales. ["Scotland?"] The hon. Member speaks of Scotland; but Scotland has an Established Church of its own, and if I were an Episcopalian in Scotland, and owned property there, I should no more think of refusing to pay my dues to the Scotch Church than I should think of robbing the hon. Gentleman, who has interrupted me, of the property which he possesses in his own right. I do not hesitate to avow that I think any Church is dead which has not an interest in spreading its religion. I am no advocate for buying proselytes—they are the worst gain—but I am in favour of spreading my religion by fair and open argument. I am not ashamed to say that, in my opinion, the great number of those who have come over to be Churchmen in Ireland have, though low in station, formed their opinions on as high principles as if they had been the richest and proudest in the land. The pamphlet of Mr. Hume (pp. 42-3) has shown that in a district where missionary efforts have been made there has been an increase of 344 per cent of Churchmen; that is, the Church's population has nearly quadrupled. And here let me express my thanks to that gentleman and to Mr. Alfred Lee for their admirable pamphlets so full of interesting facts upon this subject. But are you not bound to protect the revenues of the Protestant Church independent of its missionary character? It has been proved beyond doubt that the revenues of the Irish Church are insufficient for the great purposes to which they are appropriated. To 1,510 benefices there are 2,280 clergymen, showing that there are an immense number of the clergy not receiving incomes from the endowments of the Church, but from private sources. Much has been done by the Church of the minority for the religion, the civilization, the health and comfort of the people in many ways, not shown by conversion or missionary exertion. The churches and the clergy have both increased, which would not have been the case had they not been required. What are the facts in this respect? In 1730 the numbers of the clergy were 800; in 1806 they were 1,253; in 1829 they were 1,950; and in 1863 they were 2,281. The increase in churches is as follows:—In 1730 they were 400; in 1800 they were 688; in 1829 they were 1,307; and in 1863 they were 1,632. Is the Church, then, doing nothing? At all events these figures show that she is doing her best to supply the wants of those who are dependent on her exertions. Who can pass over the question of the Church of Ireland without advert- ing to that munificent instance of liberality just afforded in the city of Dublin by a single individual? Who can advocate the interest of the Irish Church without saying at least that she can show what faithful sons she has, when one single man has contributed £150,000 to put the metropolitan cathedral in a satisfactory state? That brings me to another question—What will you do, supposing this Motion is carried? What will you do with churches which Protestants have built, and the advowsons which Protestants hold? Since 1848 the sum of £67,000 has been paid to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners by voluntary contributions for the assisting in the building of churches alone. [Ironical cheers from Mr. HADFIELD and others.] It may be said that if that could be done voluntarily more could be done. The cheer comes very well from the hon. Member for Sheffield, the professed hater of endowments; but Sir Robert Peel had stated that on the question of the Dissenting Chapels Bill, where a question of endowments arose between Dissenters unestablished, he had seen more animosity between different Dissenting bodies than had ever existed between the Established Church and Roman Catholics in Ireland. Again, for Lady Hewley's Charities how eagerly did Dissenters contend for endowments? I wish to know why those who hate endowments are always endeavouring to obtain them at Oxford, and Cambridge, and elsewhere. If you do not like them why do you want to have them? Does it not prove that you oppose their present possessors because you want them for yourselves. It has been shown that endowments have their uses, and in no case can they be more useful than in that of the Irish Church. Sir, I have to apologize for detaining the House so long. If I have said one word which has given offence to any one I trust he will pardon me. I speak strongly for my own creed, but in no hostility to the creed of others. I speak in favour of the extension of my own creed, but I am sure when I see the Roman Catholics establishing mission-houses and chapels all over England, that they believe in the importance of spreading the religion which they hold. Be it so; but let us meet in a fair field; let us have a conflict without animosity, and let the best win. I believe that I hold the truth, and I believe that truth will prevail. I trust this Motion will receive, not from the Government alone, but from the House, a direct and emphatic negative. You will be violating first principles by carrying it. You will be damping and disturbing and destroying the energies of the clergy who are working in Ireland.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

You are disturbing them by constant consideration of their political position. They never know what their position is through the constant attacks made upon their Church from different quarters. The attack on them in this case is made by an Englishman. I, as an Englishman, have ventured to stand up for them. I have feebly advocated their case; but as long as I have the honour of a seat in this House or, failing that, in any sphere in which I may be, I shall be a determined advocate for maintaining the Established Church of England and Ireland, which I believe may be maintained without injury or insult either to Roman Catholics or Dissenters, but which cannot be overthrown without detriment to the best interests of the country, and without violating the most cherished feelings of those who love us best in Ireland.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Hardy) has stated his views, as we must all have expected, with conspicuous ability. I am free to confess that there are points in his speech, and those neither few nor unimportant, in which I agree with the hon. Member, and there are some which will carry with them the almost universal concurrence of the House. For my part, the hon. Member's view of what I may call the ecclesiastical history of Ireland is, I think, more near the truth than that of my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), who contended that until the latter part of the 11th century there was nothing that could be called a Church in Ireland. I agree, also, with the defence of the Irish Church which the hon. Gentleman has made, so far as it rests on the assertion that there is to be found no such amount of flagrant abuses as would of themselves justify a violent interference with its existence, or any licence of Parliamentary attack. My belief is that as far as abuses, in the common sense of the word, are concerned—that is, those which depend on the conduct of the bishops and clergy, and which are remediable by the wisdom and energy of the clerical body, or the purity of life of its lay members—it is my belief that the Irish Church is perfectly free from such abuses. We must all accord to that Church this praise; that her clergy are a body of zealous and devoted ministers, who give themselves to the high purposes of their sacerdotal functions in a degree not inferior to those of any Christian Church. With respect to her prelates, there are many of them men of great learning, of the highest possible character, of extended charity both in act and opinion; and as to that one of her prelates who a few years ago was removed from among men—the late Primate of Ireland—I join in the regret that has been expressed that any single word should have been introduced into this debate which would seem for one moment to call in question the remarkable excellence of that character in which a princely munificence was united with a dignity and meekness rarely, if ever, exceeded by any bishop of any Church. There is great force, also, in what fell from the hon. Gentleman upon the cardinal question at issue with respect to the social influence and utility of the existence of the Irish clergy through all the districts of the country. It would be great presumption in me to found this opinion upon my own personal observation, but the general effect of evidence is that great social utility is exercised by the presence of a body of educated Christian gentlemen throughout the country; and if they are unhappily precluded from ministering to the wants of their neighbours in the highest functions for which they are specially set apart, yet in their moral, material, and social influence they render valuable services to the community. But still, Sir, these propositions, important as they may be, do not touch the essence of the case, for the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Leominster, if I understood him aright—and I do not cavil about words, but take it in its broader meaning and direct purpose—puts a negative not merely upon the Motion which my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea has put before the House, but also upon the proposition contained in that Motion—that the present position of the Irish Church is unsatisfactory. I am not going to fasten upon the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hardy) the assertion that there is nothing to cure and amend in the Irish Church; but I do say that the whole upshot and purport of his speech went to show that in regard to all the great, leading, cardinal conditions that determine the action of Parliament, we are so far from being called upon to assert that the condition of the Irish Church is unsatisfactory, that it ought to be regarded as directly the reverse. I am bound to take my share of the responsibility of the course which it has been announced by my right hon. Friend (Sir George Grey) the Government intend to pursue. We are not able to concur in the Motion of my hon. Friend, and yet those who listened to the speech of my right hon. Friend will recollect that while he declined to affirm that the Motion ought to receive the assent of the House, he was not prepared to deny the abstract truth of a part, and what some may regard as the most important part of the Motion. The Motion before the House may be divided into two propositions—first, that in the opinion of the House the present position of the Irish Church Establishment is unsatisfactory; and secondly, that it calls for the early attention of Her Majesty's Government. And no one can consistently vote for my hon. Friend's Motion unless he is prepared to vote for both these propositions. For my part I confess that I cannot refuse to admit the truth of the first, and perhaps most important, of these propositions. With regard to the second, I think that I am not only not required by the fulfilment of duty, but that it would be a departure from duty on the part of Her Majesty's Government if they were to assent to the Motion, unless they were prepared to grapple with this great problem, of which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Leominster has shown us the difficulty, and to bring this Session, or, if not this Session, still very soon before Parliament some plan for the purpose of removing that unsatisfactory character of the condition of the Irish Establishment which we should have joined in asserting. This is a question on which I do not think that the course adopted by the Government will be a very popular one. Nothing, I admit, can be more unsatisfactory to a deliberative Assembly than to hear admissions made in one portion of a speech and retracted, or, at all events, not followed out to their legitimate conclusions in another, and it is obvious that this must, on the first view, appear to be the conduct of Her Majesty's Government; but, for all this, nothing could excuse our declining to look the truth fully in the face. This, perhaps, is not so much a question for present as for future consideration. Those who now undertake the responsibility of delivering their opinions upon this question ought not to regard so much the satisfaction which they may give to their hearers at the present moment as to be careful in laying down principles founded in truth and justice—principles which cannot be affected by any change of time or circumstance. In the few observations which I desire to address to the House, I shall endeavour to follow the example of most of those who have preceded me, and to avoid the use of a single word which by any possibility can give offence. My hon. Friend desires us to affirm that the present state of the Irish Church Establishment is unsatisfactory, and, following in the path set by my right hon. Friend, I should not be prepared to refuse my assent to his invitation, looking at it as an abstract proposition. Now, what is the position of the Irish Church Establishment? It is this—In a nation of between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000 people, about 600,000 or 700,000 have the exclusive possession of the ecclesiastical property of the country intended to be applied to the religious instruction of all. The amount of the ecclesiastical property has been stated at between £500,000 and £600,000 a year. It is not necessary to argue minutely upon details, but I imagine that these figures will hardly be contested. Over and above that amount one-fourth of the whole value of the tithes of the country was given to the landlords by an Act passed, I think, in 1838, under the plea of a consideration for collection, but, in fact, as an important political expedient for the purpose of inducing the landlords to place themselves between the people on the one side and the Protestant clergy on the other. The ecclesiastical property of Ireland, therefore, were it actually at our disposal, is considerably greater than the sum actually enjoyed by the Established Church. This being the relation between the members of the Established Church and the people at large, are there any other circumstances which tend to heighten the effect of this arrangement? Now, in my opinion, there is undoubtedly this important circumstance, that those to whose enjoyment the whole of this property is devoted form the wealthy class of the community. That is to say, they comprise the great bulk of the wealth of the community—the class, as must, of course, be observed, the best able to make provision for its own spiritual wants; whereas the most numerous portion of the population of Ireland have among them almost the entire poverty of the country. That is the position of those who by the conclusion to be drawn from the speech of my hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) are satisfactorily provided for, but whose position, looking at the question in an abstract point of view, I cannot regard in the same light. The hon. Member has dwelt with great

force and with great ingenuity upon all the arguments which for a long period of time have been made available, and made available, I am bound to say, by persons of great authority, to prove that which he disclaims—and let him have the full benefit of the disclaimer—but that which I conceive to be the legitimate deduction to be drawn from his speech—namely, that after a due allowance for human imperfections, the position of the Irish Church is satisfactory. The hon. Gentleman says that this Motion is an attack upon the Established Church of England, and that the Irish Church is selected for this attack because it is an outwork of the English Establishment. I have, of course, no right to complain of the hon. Member, or of any one else, for employing such an argument if he thinks it will support his views, but those who look at this country as one enjoying free institutions, and those who believe that the institutions of this country have their most solid and most indisputable foundation in the general approval of the public, will be slow to assent to the argument employed by the hon. Gentleman. On the contrary, they might be disposed to say that that argument is capable of being inverted. I do not believe that the Church in England is in the slightest degree weakened by the existence of a different Church established in Scotland, although in the present case there is no question raised as to the existence of a rival Established Church, the only question before the House is whether the exclusive possession of the ecclesiastical property of the country by the Established Church of Ireland is satisfactory. I am bound to express my belief that the English Established Church is in a much stronger position than it would be if across the border there existed an Established Church precisely agreeing with it in every particular of doctrine, discipline, and government, yet representing the faith of only one-eighth or one-ninth of the population. I must, therefore, decline assenting to the belief entertained by the hon. Gentleman that an ulterior intention of attacking the Established Church of England is a fair or natural deduction to be drawn from a Resolution affirming only the unsatisfactory state of the Irish Established Church. Then the hon. Member falls back upon another argument, and asserts that the Act of Union is a perpetually binding contract. His doctrine is that by the Act of Union the Protestant people of England bound themselves to the Protestant minority of Ireland perpetually to maintain the Established Church in that country, with a view to supplying the spiritual wants of that Protestant minority. I am bound to say that I must differ from the doctrine to which the hon. Member appears to incline — that the Protestants in Ireland or the members of the Established Church in any one of the three kingdoms—for I believe them to be all on the same footing — are solely entitled to have provision made for their spiritual wants without any regard being paid to the requirements of the remaining portion of the population. Neither our Constitution nor our history will warrant such a conclusion. There is not the slightest doubt that if the Church of England is a national church, and that if the conditions upon which the ecclesiastical endowments are held were altered at the Reformation, that alteration was made mainly with the view that those endowments should be intrusted to a body ministering to the wants of a great majority of the people. I am bound to add my belief that those who directed the government of this country in the reign of Queen Elizabeth acted on the firm conviction that that which had happened in England would happen in Ireland, and they would, probably, be hardly less surprised than is my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea if they could look down the vista of time and see that in the year 1864 the result of all their labours had been that, after 300 years, the Church which they endowed and established ministered to the religious wants of only one-eighth or one-ninth part of the community. Before quitting the Act of Union, I may say that I do not deny the importance of such great statutes. In one sense they may be regarded as the landmarks of our Constitution. The first responsibility of every Legislature in every age must be to adapt the laws and institutions of the country to the wants of the country which it governs, and it would indeed be a miserable excuse—nay, more, the hon. Member himself, I feel certain, would be the last man to urge it—if we were to say that, although we did not think an institution was beneficial, we thought it ought to be maintained, and we would maintain it because it was made by a Parliament of men now dead, who while alive were not gifted with second-sight, and who were unable to foretell the circumstances in which we should be placed. Sir, I admit it is very natural to say, “We must not be in a hurry in these matters, we must not expect the rapid wholesale conversion of a country.” I think the hon. Member for Leominster considers the work of the Church of Ireland to be that of a Missionary Church. He distinctly intimated the opinion, and I confess I agree with him. That appears to me to be far more rational than the contrary opinion that the members of that Church are a privileged body, to be endowed, while all else are to be left to shift for themselves. But it is very material, after the lapse of so many generations and several centuries, that we should consider what progress has been made in this matter. In the latter part of the 17th century an estimate was made by Sir William Petty of the relative strength of Protestants and Roman Catholics in Ireland. I now take all classes of Protestants together for the purpose of more convenient comparison, and I find the result he arrived at was—Roman Catholics, 800,000; Protestants, 300,000. The date of that estimate was followed by a century of application of most rigid penal laws. There is not, I apprehend, the least doubt that as regards particular classes of society those penal laws to a certain extent did their work, but yet they failed to impress the mass of the population. And now we come to the year 1834, the first year of any trustworthy and accurate religious enumeration of the people of Ireland, and there we find that those who were represented in the time of Sir William Petty by 800,000 and 300,000, had come to be respectively 6,400,000 of Roman Catholics and 1,500,000 of Protestants of various denominations. If the proportion between Roman Catholics and Protestants that existed in the time of Sir William Petty had been maintained, the Protestants of 1834 ought not to have been 1,500,000, but 2,400,000. So far, therefore, under the operation of the system of law then established, although aided by the severest pressure of the power of the civil Government—so far were we from making progress in the direction which upon every religious ground we might desire, that much ground had actually been lost, and the proportion of Protestants to Roman Catholics was more unfavourable than it had been 150 years before. The hon. Member adverted to the Census of 1861, and he paid a compliment to the Churchmen of Ireland for their readiness to have the real figures fairly stated and made known. I agree with him as to that. And undoubtedly we find that the proportion of Protestants to Roman Catholics in 1861 is somewhat less unfavourable than it had been in 1834, for now, while the Roman Catholics are 4,500,000, the Protestants are 1,300,000. But what has happened in the interval? A famine of unequal and awful pressure has decimated the ranks of the majority of the nation, and simultaneously with that famine the vastly extended settlements of America opened the arms of that continent wider and wider to invite the poverty of Ireland across the Atlantic to partake of her abundance. Thousands, tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands year by year quitted the ports of this country in order to settle and establish themselves in America. Of these it cannot be for one moment doubted that the vast mass who had reduced the population of Ireland by something like one-third did not in any degree, as regards religious faith, represent the entire population of the country. It cannot be doubted but that it consisted, not altogether, indeed, but in an overwhelming proportion of the Roman Catholic population. It is a matter of opinion, but I am bound to say it does appear to me, when we take into view the immensely powerful operation, first of all, of the famine, and still more of the emigration, that it is impossible to believe that the slight change which took place between 1834 and 1861 in the proportions of the respective religious communities indicates any real advance of a definite or measurable kind of the Protestant population as compared with the Roman Catholics. I am bound to say that in the times in which we live it is not too hastily to be assumed that the exclusive and peculiar position of the Irish Established Church is to be regarded as necessarily useful to the progress of Protestantism. No doubt it relieves members of the Protestant Church in a great degree from the duty and business of making provision for their own spiritual requirements; but it is a mistake to suppose that the exclusive establishment of one religion is in all circumstances favourable to the progress of that religion. I am quite sure, if we could suppose such a thing as the establishment of the Roman Catholic religion at this moment in this country, that it would be anything but favourable to the progress of the Roman Catholic religion here. The case in Ireland may not be so strong as in the rather violent supposition I have just made, but it may serve to illustrate my suggestion that we are incurring some degree of danger when we hastily assume that, under all circumstances, the aid of the civil Government, in addition to the endowments of the country, is favourable to the propagation of a particular form of religion irrespective of all the other circumstances of the country. In other times, and perhaps in other places, it has been said that the exclusive establishment of the Protestant Church in Ireland is necessary for the maintenance of loyalty and order in that country. We have not heard that argument to-night and I believe we shall not hear it. There can be no more fatal error on the part of those who are charged with the government of a country than to do acts or to make provisions which imply that loyalty to the laws, to the Throne, and to the institutions of the country is the particular and exclusive property of a small minority of the people. In my opinion, no more certain specific for the propagation of disloyalty can be suggested than the use of such language. Then the hon. Member says that there is no surplus available from the property of the Irish Established Church. I then ask myself how does the hon. Member measure a surplus? What is the criterion by which he arrives at it? Is it admitted that the provision for the Established Church in Scotland relatively to the number of its members, and the provision for the Established Church of England relatively to the number of its members are liberal provisions? I think it is. But this is beyond doubt—that the provision of the Established Church in Ireland, although the members of that Church represent a far greater average of wealth than the Church of England or the Church of Scotland, yet the provision of the Established Church of Ireland represents a larger average of public endowment for the members of that Church than do either of the other Churches. It is not necessary to descend to statistics, but not far short of £1 per head, I imagine, would be the quota given by the ecclesiastical property of Ireland, without taking into consideration the 25 per cent, now in the hands of the landlords of Ireland; while I do not think any estimate fairly made of the property of the Established Church of England would give more than something like

7s. or 8s. a head as the quota provided by endowments for the maintenance of the Church. But, unhappily, in the case of Ireland, we are also met with this difficulty. It is not upon the question of what the surplus would be if the endowments of the Church were distributed equally over the country. The hon. Member himself alluded to the immense disparity in that respect, the immense inequality which prevailed in different parts of Ireland. You have towns in Ireland presenting, perhaps not in the same degree, but still, I apprehend, to a certain degree, the same deficiencies in the means of spiritual instruction, as compared with the Church population, as is to be found in this country, and on the other hand you have large portions of the country in which there are equally large and liberal endowments, while the Church population can hardly be said to exist at all. It is sometimes the practice to call this an abuse, and to say there would be a remedy if you would adopt the principle of re-distribution—if you would take all the tithes and estates of the Church in Ireland, throw them into hotch-potch, and then re-distribute them substantially according to the proportions in which the Church populations is distributed over the face of the country. I must confess it appears to me that there are the greatest difficulties not only in practice, but also in principle, to the application of any such remedy. I can hardly imagine that the population of Ireland—especially of the provinces of Munster and Connaught, where the Church population is about 5 per cent of the whole—would be content to see the tithes and endowments of those provinces abstracted in order that they might be carried into Ulster, where the Church has one-fifth of the population, or into Leinster, where it has one-eighth of the population. If that can be done, at least, I know of no Government that has ever yet been bold enough to propose such an act. Some steps, some slight steps, have been taken in that direction; but, in the main, the endowments and the tithes still remain locally applied, and I do not hesitate to say that I believe it would be not only inexpedient, but unjust, especially in the circumstances of Ireland, to interfere with the general application of the principle of local endowments. But if the principle of local distribution and enjoyment of endowments and tithes is sound, then the Church in its present exclusive possession of endowments is doomed, I fear, to the perpetual exhibition of a painful anomaly. For what can be a greater anomaly than that of a clergy appointed to do the work of shepherds of souls, while in many parishes of Connaught and Munster their flocks are to be reckoned, not by tens, but by units, thus presenting a most painful contrast—painful to every feeling mind, painful, I am convinced, to those clergy themselves—the contrast between the actual state of things and a National church endowed for the spiritual wants of the country. The hon. Gentleman in his argument, I am bound to say, has not maintained the proposition that tithes are the property of the landlord. But that is a proposition that is commonly advanced. It is a proposition commonly maintained, that tithes are not paid by the cultivator of the soil, but are paid by the landlord, and therefore that entitles the tithes to be applied exclusively to the maintenance of the system which, in the great majority of cases, is the religion of the landlord. But I apprehend it to be perfectly clear that tithes while not the property of the agriculturalists are not the property of the landlord either, but that they are property subject to restraint and conditions, and for the right disposal of which the country and the Legislature of the country are responsible, and which considered as property, undoubtedly, if their hands were free, in any new case it would be their duty to apply for the spiritual benefit of the largest and the neediest portion of the community. All this appears to me to indicate in the present position of the Church of Ireland inherent elements which show that her difficulties cannot be surmounted by the wisdom of her rulers or by the piety and devotion of her clergy, but that they are essential elements of a false position. All this I say without in the slightest degree being able to point out, any more than hon. Gentlemen who have preceded me have pointed out, what ought to be done with respect to the Church of Ireland. I have spoken entirely with reference to her present position as the exclusive possessor of the largest endowments of the country, and I confess I am obliged to come to the conclusion to which the argument of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hardy) seems to me to lead, that this is an unsatisfactory state of things. My hon. Friend says that this unsatisfactory state of things calls for the early attention of the Government. What is the meaning of these words? Now, we cannot take exception to them on the ground that they are obscure. No doubt the meaning of the first part of the Resolution may be obscure, for, of course, we are to read it according to its words, and not according to the speech of my hon. Friend; but there can be no doubt as to the meaning of the second part. It clearly says that within a very short period—if not in the dying days of this Parliament—the executive Government of the country ought to grapple with these anomalies and inequalities which subsist in the ecclesiastical state of Ireland, and propose a measure for the purpose of settling them. Is that so? What are the circumstances which determine the duty of a Government to grapple with a great national question of first-rate difficulty and importance? The hon. Member who preceded me stated, I think with great force, the many difficulties which we have here to encounter. But, above all, I dwell upon this fact, that neither the hon. Member who moved the Resolution nor the hon. Member for Tralee, who seconded it, while they described the existing evils in terms of a sufficiently strong nature, pointed out a remedy. The whole question is, what is the remedy? I must say, I thought there was the greatest force in what fell from the hon. Member for Leominster when he came to discuss the nature of the remedy. We no sooner come to look upon this question practically than we light upon a whole nest of problems of the utmost political difficulty. This is a subject not to be dealt with in schools or in the closets of philosophers. It is not to be dealt with in the debating societies of politicians. Abstract justice, irrespective of the circumstances of men, might dictate the adoption of measures which, upon the whole, would form, perhaps, as near an approximation of what was fair and equitable as human nature would permit us to adopt; but we live in a country where the course of policy is to be determined by the actual feelings of the country itself. And what are the circumstances under which the Government is to undertake the settlement of the question? Look at the success of those who have gone before us. The earliest dealing with this question was at the period of the Union, when it was the enlightened intention of Mr. Pitt to retain the Established Church in the possession of her privileges and endowments, but to make suitable provision for the Roman Catholic clergy by the side of that Established Church. I cannot concur in the censures which have been passed on Mr. Pitt for the non-fulfilment of that intention. Why did he fail? Because it was beyond his power, because the views represented in the opinions of King George III., who both in his virtues and his errors was a king eminently national, and who represented the convictions of his countrymen—the views I say, of which King George was the centre, were too strong for Mr. Pitt to overcome. At a subsequent period the House of Commons showed its disposition to adopt mild and healing measures—without any interference with the temporal privileges of the Established Church—supplying a provision for the Roman Catholic clergy. But these propositions never received the sanction of Parliament, and it is fair to add that if they failed it was not on account of an opposition such as might, perhaps, have been expected from the vast bulk of those who opposed the concession of privileges to the Roman Catholics. Do not let us forget that we are not dealing with a question of money alone. The endowment of a church is undoubtedly accompanied with restraints—I will not say with burdens—and to those restraints objections have been made by the Roman Catholic clergy, and a doubt has arisen, and is gathering strength from year to year, as to the propriety of accepting any such endowment accompanied by its restraints. Nay, if we are rightly informed, these doubts have reached such a point that the Roman Catholic clergy not only do not desire but would reject and repudiate any share in the endowment of their Church. What, then, is a Government to do with respect to this question? My hon. Friend will not tell me that it will be consistent with the duty of the Government to frame a Bill and throw it on the table to take its chance, and say, “We have done our part; the responsibility rests with the House.” That is not the mode in which we should proceed with such a question. But where are the materials with which my hon. Friend would proceed to work? I suppose him to be in the position of the Government, and to have introduced his Bill. What support does he think he would receive? Would the Presbyterians of Scotland readily support a measure which transferred the endowments of Ireland to the Roman Catholic Clergy? Does he think the Nonconformists of England would support him? Were he on the Treasury Bench, what support does he think such a project would receive with the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) at his post? But it may be said there is another mode of proceeding: you may transfer these endowments from religious to secular purposes. I am bound to say that, in my belief, the mind of the country is against such a project, and I think my hon. Friend would find this a more difficult proposal still. Could he, by the force of his own influence and authority, undertake to heal all these wounds, and solve all these difficulties? He must have men, he must have representatives of the people, he must have the people out of doors. On what plan, by what mode of proceeding, does he expect to be able to unite such a force of public opinion as would enable him, I do not say to pursue this or that particular method of dealing with the question, but to substitute for the present state of things another which would be essentially better? But if he is not prepared to assist us to materials, I confidently expect his assent to my next proposition. Surely it is not consistent with the first elements of the duty of a Government to promote the agitation of a question in this country, and to rake up all the embers of former animosities. [An hon. MEMBER here made an observation across the table which did not reach the Gallery.] What I am doing I can assure the hon. Member is simply performing my duty as a Member of this House, very imperfectly, no doubt, and giving my opinion on the Motion before us in common with other Gentlemen, and in such a manner, I hope, as does not offend the personal feelings of anyone. It is a serious thing for Governments to deal lightly with such questions. We are not without lessons from the history both of this and other questions of the same sort within the last twenty years. This question was taken up in 1834 and 1835 by the Liberal party of this country, then possessed of an ascendancy—the remains of the great triumph of the Reform Bill—such, perhaps, as it has enjoyed at no other period. Frankly, I must say, looking back to the proceedings of those days, and endeavouring to form an impartial judgment upon them, the Liberal party boldly cast in its lot with the fortunes of this question and with the feelings of the Irish people, and well and stoutly was the battle fought. But the result tended seriously to damage the power and strength of the Liberal party in this country. I do not say that that is a reason why the question should not be taken up; but the remembrance of one great repulse and of one signal defeat, for such it was, after a campaign of several years, is a serious warning to those who might be disposed prematurely to revive this question. The first question for a Government is whether what they can do will tend to the good of the people over whose interests they are in an especial manner appointed to watch. The answer to that question must govern their conduct; and it will not do for a Government to shape their conduct according to anything extraneous to that answer. If they could see their way with reasonable probability to the attainment of a satisfactory end it would be their duty to grapple with all the difficulties of the case. It would be their duty to consider—whether surplus or no surplus—what obligations of the Act of Union remain to be fulfilled, and how they ought to be performed. It would be their duty to consider whether in the event of any change, any modification, in the Established Church, the property of that Church ought to be applied in one way or another. But it is not their duty to consider these questions at all—it is not their duty to propagate one opinion or another on the subject, unless they see their way, by casting their influence into the scale, to bring about a state of things in consonance with the general principles of justice, the welfare of the whole community, and particularly with the feelings and happiness of the people of Ireland. The dictates of propriety and good sense must govern the proceedings of any Administration which means to do its duty to the country. These principles must govern us on this occasion, whether or not we may be able to deny the proposition of the hon. Gentleman with reference to the position of the Irish Church; and I, for one, am not able to deny it. We, therefore, feel that we ought to decline to follow him into the lobby, and declare that it is the duty of the Government to give their early attention to the subject; because, if we gave a vote to that effect, we should be committing one of the gravest offences of which a Government could be guilty—namely, giving a deliberate, a solemn, promise to the country, which promise it would be out of our power to fulfil.

MR. WHITESIDE: Sir, the speech which the right hon. Gentleman has just delivered was well deserving of our undivided attention. But there were one or two observations made by the hon. Gentleman who introduced this question, and one or two assertions made by him which I think demand our special notice. Now, the form and words of the hon. Gentleman's Resolution are of no importance whatever. The real object which we have, is to discover what is the purpose of the hon. Gentleman in making this Motion. The terms of this Motion, made from time to time, varied according to the failing fortunes of his party. A few years ago, on a summer night, I heard a Gentleman who then represented Rochdale (Mr. Edward Miall) make a Motion in a speech to which I listened with great interest, never having heard before the opinions of the English Puritan so thoroughly represented in Parliament. I was informed that the Gentleman in question was a leading Nonconformist in this country. He spoke with great calmness, and apparently with an air of philosophic candour. He temperately disposed of the Irish Church by consigning it to the Incumbered Estates Court to be sold by auction, and proposed to appropriate the funds arising from it to the erection of lunatic asylums or some kindred establishments. Now that was the notion of the hon. Gentleman; and the question then arose as to who ought to be the first inmate of the lunatic asylum so to be erected. But there was a remarkable sentence, though a short one, uttered at the end of his revolutionary speech, to which I wish to call the attention of the House. When the hon. Gentleman had thus disposed of the Irish Church property, the glebes, its lands, and tithe rents, one question still remained for solution. What was to be done with the sacred edifices? The hon. Gentleman, in the spirit of a Christian, concluded his speech by saying perhaps the most satisfactory arrangement that could be made in regard to the sacred edifices would be to leave them to the believers in the Church. Now, among those who supported the Motion of the hon. Gentleman to whom I am referring, I find the name "Mr. Dillwyn." The hon. Member now brings forward a Motion which attacks in terms as indefinite as the Chancellor of the Exchequer could desire the Church of England in Ireland. There is certainly no peculiar point or meaning

to be attached to the Motion if it is only to be interpreted by the hon. Gentleman's language this evening; but if we interpret it by the vote which he gave on this question on the occasion to which I have referred, it means the spoliation and destruction of the Established Church in Ireland; with some doubt whether he would allow the Protestants in that country even one sacred edifice in which to worship. Soon after the hon. Gentleman who had represented Rochdale had made his speech upon this question I received a letter from a gentleman residing in Rochdale—the vicar of that place—with whom I was not then acquainted, but who intimated the opinion that that same hon. Member would not be allowed to repeat in Parliament the speech which he had then made as Member for Rochdale. I doubt very much if the sagacious Gentleman who now represents Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) would deliver a speech in the revolutionary strain of the Gentleman whom he has succeeded. I have heard to-night the hon. Member for Swansea use the words spiritual corruption in the fact of a certain bishop appointing his own son or nephew rector of a parish in his diocese. Now, when the hon. Gentleman gives way to feelings of such virtuous indignation at such nepotism, I beg of him to expand his political vision, and to look around him at the conduct of certain Judges and Chancellors, to whom he gives his political support, before he begins to moralize in an affected tone of hypocritical lamentation upon the corruption of the Church in Ireland. The hon. Gentleman has been very properly rebuked by the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary, when he presumed to disparage the character of the late Primate of Ireland, and to speak of the enormous wealth of that eminent dignitary. Ah! but which of the nobility and gentry has disposed of their large incomes as well as he has done? In every action of his virtuous life he displayed a consciousness of his being answerable to a Higher Power, and in the performance of works of munificent charity, piety, and zeal, he spent a long and honoured life. When at length he had gone to receive his final reward his remains were followed by 600 gentlemen, amongst whom walked the head of the Church of Rome in Ireland as well of the head of the Church in Scotland in that country, who thus testified a respect to the Primate's memory in which I am afraid the hon. Member would not join. The hon. Member for Swansea also said that various Resolutions upon this subject have been passed from time to time; nevertheless, nothing had ever been done to relieve the Roman Catholics of Ireland in regard to the property of the Church. Observe, it is immaterial for the purpose of my argument, but, I ask, is it true to say that the abolition of church rates was nothing, that the Church Temporalities Act was nothing, that the abolition of Church cess was nothing? Was it an accurate statement that the abolition of ministers' money was no relief to the Irish Catholics, particularly to those who resided in the South of Ireland? I remember quitting this House with a Roman Catholic gentleman on the night that the question of ministers' money was settled, when he said to me, "Your party seem angry with the Vote of to-night; but if you were wise you would rather rejoice, for this is the last practical grievance we can complain of before Parliament." Well, all these measures have been passed for the benefit of the Roman Catholics. The tithe has been changed into a rent-charge, and the burden has thus been shifted from the tenant to the landlord. The landlords certainly obtained a bonus, but I am happy to say that many of them have declined to accept of the 25 per cent, considering that it is too much for a collection that is so very easy. The University of Dublin refuses to receive it. Now, as to the Church lands, what cause of complaint have you? If there were a tenant of the Church lands outside the door, he would say to the hon. Gentleman, "I implore you to hold your tongues, for we are as happy as we could desire to be." They heard of Irish grievances—of landlords exterminating their tenants—of the want of tenant-right—of the difficulty of purchasing land in Ireland—and of the impossibility of the people obtaining leases. But the bishops have adopted a custom of renewing the leases of their tenants, which now amounts to an equitable title, and they enable the occupiers of the land to purchase ultimately the fee simple of their holdings through the medium of the Church Temporalities Act. More than two-thirds of the tenants of the Church in Ireland have succeeded in purchasing the fee simple of their land. The remainder will, no doubt, follow in course of time the good example set them, and then, indeed, I suppose you will have a political grievance to complain of—namely, that the tenants of the Church lands are more comfortable, happy, and more prosperous than the tenants of any other landed proprietor in Ireland. And this is the case for immediate legislation—to relieve the suffering tenants of Ireland! But to come to the principle of the Motion. Is it, I ask, true to say that nothing has been done for the Roman Catholics in Ireland? The Irish Parliament gave the munificent sum of £8,000 a year to the College of Maynooth, when the population of Ireland amounted to 8,000,000. The English Parliament gives £30,000 to the same institution, when the population is scarcely more than 5,000,000. The late celebrated Dr. Doyle merely asked for a grant of £25,000 a year for schools in Ireland. The British Government grants £300,000 a year for the education of the Irish youth, £240,000 of which sum, according to the Secretary of the Colonies (Mr. Cardwell), goes exclusively for the benefit of the Roman Catholics. The Roman Catholics are now permitted to send their chaplains into the workhouses, the army, and the prisons; and I venture to say, that since the Union the British Parliament has given no less than £300,000 a year to those who never had a single shilling before. Is it, then, true to say that nothing has been done for the Roman Catholics of Ireland? The hon. Member for Swansea said that the Motion of the hon. Member for Poole was merely one for a re-arrangement, but that his was for restitution. Restitution for what? restitution to whom? Now, if the hon. Gentleman's argument is at all intelligible, it means the spoliation of the Church and the handing over the plunder to those to whom it never belonged, and who never had any equitable or legal title to it. Then the hon. Gentleman is not satisfied with having given his own views upon Church property, but he actually ascended into a question of a spiritual character. I should not be surprised if Roman Catholics and Protestants combined to attack him. He says, speaking of the Roman Catholic Church, this is the Church which first took root in Ireland. The hon. Gentlemen has made the discovery that the Island of Saints was only Christianized in 1106. Now if the other arguments of the hon. Gentleman were equally true and applicable, he would be a most valuable instructor to us all. I hope, however, that the hon. Gentleman will do me the favour of reading the writings of some of my constituents in the Irish language; for example, the Confession, or the Hymns of St. Patrick, which he will find in the library of this House. The hon. Gentleman, after perusing such works, would soon find what the old creeds of the old Catholic Church of Ireland were. We venerate that Church whilst speaking of it; and I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the last act of that same Primate, of whose character he spoke with such levity, was to dedicate a sum of money to the translation of the celebrated Book of Armagh, which was written in the Irish tongue in the 6th century, and which begins with a pure version of the four Gospels—Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, for the instruction of those who, according to the hon. Gentleman's peculiar notions of history, never heard of Christianity until the commencement of the 12th century. Our arguments with regard to the Established Church are not to be forgotten, though I do not say it touches the question. Speaking of that Church with respect and veneration, as an ancient, primitive, and Apostolic Church, our argument is that every record that is brought to light and translated and published to the world, shows that the Church of England, as it now exists, does maintain the ancient truth as held by that Church. You may tell me that other things have since been developed; but we reject the theory of development and stand on our ancient faith. In reply to the arguments of the secession of the bishops—I listened to them in silence—I say that the bishops who sat in the House of Lords in Elizabeth's time were confessed and admitted to be the ancient Catholic Bishops of Ireland. They were learned men—well taught in their own profession—they believed in the changes that were then made, and I have a right to argue that those changes were consistent with the ancient primitive Catholic faith in Ireland. I believe that with the exception of one they adopted the change of faith, and sat in the House of Lords in Ireland to their lives end. Dr. Trench is the direct successor of that Archbishop of Dublin who witnessed the signature of the Charter at Runnymede by King John. Archbishop Wauchob, who was put into the picture of the Council of Trent, was no more the Archbishop of Armagh than I am. He was never in possession of the See, having merely been appointed in Rome as all antiquarians well know; but he was put in the show—

he was the representative at the Council. It was Dowdall who was the real Primate of Armagh, recognized as such by Queen Mary, and who sat as such in the House of Lords. The next time the hon. Member for Swansea makes a speech on the subject of the Irish Church I hope he will remember that our Christianity began before the 12th century. The hon. Member also says that many petitions have been presented in reference to the Established Church; and that brings me to a very important part of the subject—namely, to consider what has originated the present Motion. I certainly expected to have seen to-night the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) in his place, and I am grievously disappointed to find that he is not here to maintain in fair and manly debate the opinion which he propounds in letters to the chief magistrate of Dublin stimulating him to form with a Liberal party in this country—it is a mistake to believe in its existence—a combination, I might call it a confederation, to attack the established institutions of the country. Why is he not here, I ask, to maintain his views? He has recently written—that which I presume has led to the petitions spoken of by the hon. Member for Swansea—as remarkable a letter as ever was penned, in which he says, that if the Lord Mayor of Dublin and the people of that country were to join a certain Liberal party in this country, they will all act together for the destruction of the law of primogeniture and the Established Church. That was a very natural and logical course for the hon. Member for Birmingham to take, and if I held the same opinions as he does I would do the same thing, because an Established Church and pure democracy cannot co-exist. Therefore if I were the advocate of pure democracy, I would argue exactly as he has done, and say that, "As I do not look with approval upon the order of knighthood or nobility I will get rid of an Established Church, which is a standing opposition to the principle which I maintain. I must clear her out of the way in order to overthrow the law of primogeniture, and establish a new Constitution in England which may be manufactured in Birmingham but is never heard of elsewhere." This reads us an important lesson, as it shows us how the Church is bound up with the property of the country, and how we ought to understand, as the friends of the Established Church, our duty towards her as her enemies know theirs when they attack the Established Church and the property of the country, under no matter what form of words. If we respect these two Institutions, it is our duty to resist this movement, no matter under what pretence, or under what excuse, or under what sophistry these attacks are covered or made. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Swansea concluded his speech without any plain or distinct idea of what he would suggest to the House to do. Having left us in the dark—not having said anything tangible on the real point he had to deal with—he cast it on Her Majesty's Government to find out what ought to be done, and they have placed the important duty of suggesting what ought to be done upon the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has made as satisfactory a speech upon the subject as it was possible to imagine that he could deliver. The right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department has made a very manly and honourable statement, and I entirely agree in what he has said—namely, that to agree to the Motion in the sense of the Mover, it would directly tend to civil confusion—to the excitement of the worst feelings and passions in Ireland, and to the general disturbance of the country. Now, I believe that is as accurate a description of the consequences that would ensue from our carrying this Motion in the sense in which it is made as it is possible to conceive, and I think it reflects credit upon the right hon. Baronet that, entertaining that opinion, he has had the candour and the manliness to speak it in language that we can understand, and not to spoil it by hypocritical mystification. I thank the right hon. Baronet for having spoken the sense of the Government, for we ought to have some expression of opinion upon questions which touch the fundamental institutions of the country, and I take leave to say that when these institutions are in danger, if they have no established policy, no profound principles, or convictions upon such questions, they are not to be supplied by eloquence, however great, or ability however splendid. Those abilities might captivate and deceive, and that eloquence might mislead and delude, and nothing will atone for the want of clear and settled principles when great questions of this kind come directly before the House, and are in contest. I turn at once to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I ask the House to consider it and to ask themselves this question, what was the right hon. Gentleman's motive in making that extraordinary speech? The right hon. Gentleman censured my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster for saying that the condition of the Established Church in Ireland was not satisfactory. Now, my hon. Friend did not say it in the terms and in the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman has supposed; but I put the question to the right hon. Gentleman, is the Church in England satisfactory—is it satisfactory in London? What does the Bishop of London say upon that subject? Is it satisfactory in many of the parishes throughout the country? Is it satisfactory in Wales? Did not the gentleman who addressed an after-dinner assemblage at Swansea, given in honour of the county Member in proposing the health of the borough Member, state that as soon as the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Dillwyn) has disposed of the Established Church in Ireland he would be the better able to attack the Established Church in Wales? I ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Established Church in Wales is satisfactory? I demand, is it the proper mode of dealing with a great institution which is linked to the monarchy and planted in the soil—which is the mainstay of the monarchy, as I firmly believe—is it, I demand, the proper mode of dealing with the Established Church in this country to ask, as the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer commenced his speech by asking, whether the condition of the Established Church was satisfactory? Why, the condition of the Christian Church is scarcely satisfactory in any part of the world. It has still to contend against the vice, the follies, and the sins of mankind; and if it is sometimes baffled and defeated, he does not show himself, in my judgment, an exalted champion of the Established Church who relies on its comparative failure for its abolition. The right hon. Gentleman says that he votes for the first part of the Motion. The last time I had occasion to offer a feeble reply to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman it was on the subject of Parliamentary Reform. The right hon. Gentleman on that occasion made a speech in favour of the Motion of the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines), but he made it in such a manner—with so many profuse safeguards and involutions—that the hon. Member, who expected his support, found at the conclusion of the speech that the right hon. Gentleman meant nothing practical. It appeared to me then, and I am confirmed in the opinion by his speech to-night, that his object was to lay the foundation of another scheme, a policy of another and not very distant day, when he might be able to say the time had come, and a change of feeling had been provoked out of doors that would enable him to do then what he fears to attempt to do now. This question the right hon. Gentleman says is not for the present but for the future, and the House will observe that principle, that conviction, has nothing to do with the matter. It is not for the present but for the future. Now what does that mean? “A speech has been delivered by the Secretary of State for the Home Department with which I cannot agree; it must be qualified, it must be explained away and evaded, and the best way to evade an honest policy such as that of the right hon. Baronet is to say that the time has not yet come when I can with safety sever the Irish from the English Church, and call upon the Protestants of Ireland to be loyal, dutiful, and respectful when Parliament shall be found insensible to the obligations which past Parliaments have incurred, and, forgetful of their duty as statesmen and men of honour, adopt the part of political swindlers.” I shall not allow the right hon. Gentleman to escape by his argument upon the Act of Union. He shall not mention the names of Pitt and Castlereagh, and imagine that he can shuffle out of a great statute like that by such evasions and quibbles as he has resorted to to-night. Fundamental Acts of the Legislature are not to be got rid of in that manner any more than the fundamental institutions of the Empire are to be placed in danger, not indeed by any present Act, not by any present Motion, but by laying the foundation and sowing the seeds of that future policy which will be adopted when the noble Viscount is no longer at the head of the Government to restrain or to direct it. The right hon. Gentleman says that he cannot negative the first part of the Resolution. It seems to me to be the infirmity of a gifted mind such as he possesses to be unable, when a direct question is submitted to his understanding, to take a direct course in regard to it. He cannot deny the Resolution, and the only way to act is to divide it into two halves, and having separated it into parts to say, “The first part of that Resolution will enable me to make a speech in which I can indicate a policy upon which I do not intend to act now, and I will resist the last part of it because I have no plan, because I have nothing to suggest. What is a Member of the Government to do under such circumstances except what I have done, to make as mischievous a speech as is possible. That I think is the course I ought to take.” I am not complaining of the hon. Gentleman who moved the Resolution and his friends who are conscientiously opposed to the existence of an Established Church, but I do complain of a Minister who, himself the author of a book in defence of Church and State, when one branch of the Christian Church is attacked and in danger, delivers a speech every word of which is hostile to its existence when the right time comes for attacking it. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded to make a statement as to the property of the Church. Was that honest? In the calculation which he gave he seemed to me to have included only the members of the Church in Ireland, but in England every parishioner and all the Dissenting body. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: No, no!] I think you did. That is my opinion. If it was worth my while to detain the House I could show by documents before me that the right hon. Gentleman has enormously exaggerated the property of the Church in Ireland. And why did he do so? Was it not for the purpose of exciting feelings against the Church? Was it in favour of the Church? Was it to protect it? Was it to preserve it? Was it not to draw by the hand of a master a picture of the poverty of the country and the wealth of the Church, and to leave for future consideration what should be done with the institution which, according to the terms of the speech, was condemned? I ask any one to consider what was the meaning of the picture which the right hon. Gentleman drew of the two provinces of Munster and Connaught. His argument, if I understand it, means this:—“The property there reserved for the Church is far beyond its necessities. It is far beyond the wants of the Church in that quarter. That being so, what are we to do with it? It is impossible for me to suggest what should be done with that property. That I leave to the councils of the future. I may hereafter be called upon to say what is to be done with it, but I wish that my speech should be on record in Hansard, showing that my argument was that that property may be abstracted from the Church for some purpose or other, either for the Roman Catholic Church or for some other object; but it is not to remain the property of the Church." If the argument did not mean that, what did it mean? I have from the Bishop of Cork and his chaplain an account of that diocese—which I cannot stop to read—very different from that which the right hon. Gentleman has given—an account of churches built, of flourishing congregations, and of the restoration of the ancient cathedral, partly by the piety and munificence of those attached to the Church and partly by aid obtained from other quarters. Take, too, the case of Connaught. I have from Lord Plunket's son and chaplain an account of that diocese directly contrary to that which the right hon. Gentleman has given. There are now flourishing congregations where formerly there were none; there are twice the number of clergymen and three times the number of churches. "How many," said the right hon. Gentleman, "are there of one persuasion and how many of another?" A great statesman said formerly that it was an evil day for mankind when questions of government and policy were to be decided by a majority told by the head. The men who do most good in Connaught and Munster; the men who are most active there—and I have heard Mr. Guinness describe the people as honest, faithful, and docile—would not go there if they could not enjoy the ministrations of a Christian Church. Abolish the Church, and all the men who are most useful, all the men who stimulate and reward industry would quit the country where they were not allowed that worship. ["Oh! oh!"] You say, "No;" I say, "Yes." The question is, how is it to be proved? I venture to say that I know more of the feeling of these gentlemen than you do. Enlightened men may smile at the notion of persons being regardful of the ministries of the Christian Church, but you know nothing of the Protestants of Ireland if you think that this is a matter of indifference to them. This argument as to the property of the Church, coming from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, fills me with amazement. The Attorney General sits near him; I should like to know whether he will endorse it. The Church is a corporation, and its property is vested in it as such. It got that property by no Act of Parliament. It got it at a period anterior to any Act of Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman is under the delusion, which has been participated in by many, that the property of the Church was spoliated from Rome. I will not open this book (holding a volume in his hand), but it contains the Patent Rolls published under the direction of the Master of the Rolls, and any Gentleman who looks at it will see in Ulster, for instance, estate after estate given to the Church upon condition that they should be enclosed, planted, and built upon. They have been enclosed, planted, and built upon. They have been possessed for 300 years, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer seeks about for arguments to cast doubts upon such a title as that. That is not all. It is true that the fortunes of the Church in Ireland went with the monarchy. As Queen Elizabeth passed through Cheapside the Lord Mayor presented her with a Bible. It was the principles of that book that she undertook to uphold, and those are the principles which the Church of Ireland has upheld since. If that policy was a mistake then the great councillors, the famous lawyers and the wise statesmen of that reign were all wrong when they endeavoured to extend to Ireland the institutions of this country, and to plant among that people a Church with a sufficient number of laymen, who might by their industry and energy maintain and support it. At a period when Ireland was saturated with blood, and her plains were turned into a wilderness, the Institutions of England, and among them the English Church, were planted on the Irish soil, and is it fair to ask that those institutions should now be destroyed? I grapple with those who say that the Protestants have not accomplished their object. Who built the towns in Ulster? The Protestants. Who established manufactures there? They did, and while there were only about fifty Protestants in the Province. There are nearly a million now. There is not a Protestant sect in Ireland which wishes to overthrow the Irish Church. Do you, let me ask, imagine that the Wesleyan Methodists, or the members of the Church of Scotland, who side by side fought in the same breach, will turn against her to accomplish the designs of a few Scotch Radicals and English voluntaries? The right hon. Gentleman opposite does not understand the feelings of those against whom this Motion is pointed. Whom does this flourishing Province of Ulster return to Parliament? Why, thirty Members, some of whom have sat in Parliament for two centuries. If hon. Gentlemen will read the list of representatives for Fermanagh in Parliament in the days of Oliver Cromwell they will find that it was then represented by Mr. John Cole, and Mr. John Cole is sitting here now. It is well you should understand that the principles and convictions which prevailed in that province in the reign of Elizabeth and James I. exist there still, and that on the day upon which the Church of the Protestants in Ireland is struck down the men by whom those convictions are maintained will be likely to become your deadly enemies. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says the argument derived from the Union is nothing, and has come to the conclusion that the Government of which he is a shining ornament can do nothing but sit where they are. But, says the right hon. Gentleman, "the time will come when your patience shall be rewarded if I can only induce you now to believe my mystical speech." That is the way in which I understand his argument; but what, I would ask, does he think of the Act of Settlement? When Charles II. was restored that great fundamental statute provided that the property of the Church, alienated from it in times of violence and confusion, should be restored. That was accordingly done, and I should like, therefore, to know how that Act of Parliament which settled the property of private individuals—including many of the highest of the Roman Catholic nobility and gentry, the Plunkets, the Gormanstowns, and the Taafes—as well as of the Church, is to be disposed of. But passing over the Act of Settlement we come to the Act of Union. I am not here to say what were the intentions of Mr. Pitt at that period. But it is well known that the influential Roman Catholics, more particularly the bishops, privately supported the proposal. Lord Castlereagh, in introducing that measure, pledged the faith of England to the principle that if Ireland assented to the Union there should be one law and one Church for both countries, and that there could be no question of a numerical majority against the Church, because, after the passing of the Union there would be only one Church, and that the members in the whole United Kingdom should be regarded as being in a vast majority in favour of its protection. That principle is embodied in the fifth article of the Act of Union, which is declared to be fundamental, and Lord Lyndhurst, in speaking of it in a judicial judgment, pronounced it to be fundamental between the two nations. Yet we are told that it is in the power of the majority to overthrow this article of the Union. Now, all that I have to say to you is that the day you do so the Union is at an end. The evidence of Dr. Doyle went to show that, even according to the maxims of the Church of Rome itself, it would be impossible to meddle with the property of the Established Church thus settled, and the whole body of the Roman Catholic bishops signed a declaration to the same effect. That was the opinion of Mr. Blake, a distinguished Roman Catholic gentleman, and a friend of Lord Wellesley. I may also remind you that it was maintained by an eminent economist, who was at that time attached to the College of Maynooth, that according to the Roman canon law the Irish Church had acquired an indefeasible right to the property which it held. We now, however, gather from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the whole question is to be re-opened, and that not for the purpose of carrying out any definite plan, but of encouraging all that mischief which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department so graphically described. The speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is, I may add, calculated to separate him from the policy of the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, who stated in his conclusive reply to the Motion of Mr. Miall, to which I have already referred, in a manner worthy of the name he bears—for Sir James Temple was one of those who supported the Act which secured its property to the Church—that upon this question we must do with the Church property in England as in Ireland, and that that property cannot be diverted from the great purposes for which it was originally designed. I have no doubt the noble Lord will vindicate his consistency in this matter, and will not be induced to express approval of the ambiguous policy enunciated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It would be far more useful, far more beneficial for the Government to say plainly and unequivocally what they would do than to cause a question of this kind to agitate and vex the minds and feelings of all classes of the people of Ireland. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman was calculated to produce those results, but its effect was no doubt counteracted to some extent by the speech of the Secretary for the Home Department; and I have no doubt that the noble Viscount, if he speaks, will maintain the principles he has ever expressed, and will not prove himself capable of being acted upon by the fascinating influence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. This is a very plain and easy question, touching the fundamental institutions of the Empire. My argument is based, not upon the numbers we may happen to have in any parish—though we have a greater number in most of the parishes now than at any former period—my argument is that the property of the Church belongs to it as an ancient corporation, linked with the Crown and linked with the peerage in the common bond of our free Constitution. And I trust sincerely that this Church, the United Church—one and the same, indivisible—in England and Ireland may long continue endeared to the affections and cherished in the hearts of the people.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, from the bottom of my heart I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea. If he does not carry his Motion, if he does not gain the present, he has, at least, gained the future. This debate will become historical, for in the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer I see the beginning of the end of the great Irish difficulty. The Chancellor of the Exchequer quite misconceived the object of my hon. Friend. His Motion points not at a Bill, but at an inquiry, and all the arguments directed against him on the supposition that he wished Government immediately to lay a measure upon the table are beside the mark. Turning, however, from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who substantially agrees with us, I address myself to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. The right hon. Gentleman called up the Union spectre, and alluded more especially to the 5th article. But, as has been pertinently asked—is the 5th article of the Union more sacred than the 4th? can it be so sacred, for did not the 4th article settle the proportion of power to be exercised by the two contracting parties in the Councils of the Empire? Well, then, has not the 4th article been altered? Did not the Tory predecessors of the right hon. Gentleman acquiesce in that alteration. Nay, did not they try to alter it more than it was altered? But, really, is it possible for any sane man to maintain the theory of the Union on which the right hon. Gentleman's argument is based? It is idle to argue against such a wild dream as this. The Union exists for the United Kingdom, not the United Kingdom for the Union. There must be somewhere a supreme authority, if mere force is not to decide all questions in the last resort, and over all our national affairs Parliament is necessarily omnipotent. This exaggerated veneration for the Irish Union sounds strange in the ears of a Scotchman when he remembers how the Scottish Union fared. How? Is it possible to maintain that the temporalities of the Irish Church were considered more sacred at the time of the union with Ireland than the heritable jurisdictions at the time of the union with Scotland? And did not the heritable jurisdictions go the same road that we hope to see the Irish Establishment go? There are two views with regard to this institution prevailing amongst its adherents and friends. The one party thinks that it is to some extent at least a missionary Church; the other thinks that it has no missionary duties, but exists for the promotion of the religious weal of its own people. Well, let us accept the view that the Irish Church is a missionary Church. How has she succeeded in her missionary enterprises? This champion of Protestantism may boast that, at the end of three centuries of existence, she has created about 4½ millions of the most determined Catholics in the world. If you compare the Catholicism of Ireland with that of France, or even of Spain, you will find one great difference. The educated class in France sits very lightly by its Catholicism, and vast numbers of persons who make "a good end," as the phrase is, are Catholics merely in name. Even in Spain, where the exterior duties of religion are more practised, you will find below the surface an extraordinary amount of indifference. How is it, then, that Ireland is in a different position, and that the Catholicism of her educated class is so earnest as to be almost aggressive? It is simply because the sagacity of English statesmen took care that, even after the penal laws were abolished, there should remain one grievance, which should fulfil the proverbial functions of a moderate persecution in stimulating religious zeal.

But remember, that even this precious result, in bringing about which so many millions of public money have been sunk, has not been attained by the mere action of the Irish Church. She has had at her back an immense host of supporters in England who have supplemented her efforts by largesses of the most splendid kind. You have the Hibernian Bible Society, and the Irish Evangelical Society, and the Scriptures Readers' Society, and the Church Education Society, and the Irish Society, and the Irish Church Missions, and I know not how many others. And all this good money, and good enthusiasm has done, what? It has helped the Irish Church to make the Irish masses more Catholic than the Castiles. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Irish Church had taken for its ensign an open Bible. How could he make so astounding an assertion, when he knew as well as I do that the Irish Church allowed 120 years to pass by before she translated the Bible into the Irish language? And when the Bible was translated, by whom was it done? Was it by one of the wealthy prelates of whom we have heard in this debate? Was it by a Church dignitary? Not at all. The good work was done at the expense of a layman. Now, let us look at the Irish Establishment, not in its missionary capacity, but as existing for the benefit of its own adherents. Does it present those features which enlightened persons who conscientiously support Established Churches look for in institutions of that kind. First, then, is it a useful engine in the support of order by conciliating to the State the affections of the great body of the people? Far from it. It is the Church of 11 per cent only of the population; and it is the Church almost exclusively of those sections of the population which are, by their own interests, already attached to the existing order of things. Secondly, does it supply religious consolation to those classes on whom voluntary contributions in support of their teachers fall most heavily? By no means; it is the Church of the great landowners, the bankers, the merchants. It is, so far as I know, the only Church in christendom of which it has been truly said that it takes for its motto, "I fill the rich, and the poor I send empty away." Thirdly, does the enormous apparatus for the religious instruction of the few produce any proportionate results? I submit that there is not a tittle of evidence that there is a greater percentage of virtue amongst the members of the Irish Church than amongst the adherents of any of the English or Scotch Protestant Dissenting bodies. Again, the Irish Church is, and ever has been, remarkable for the scantiness of its learning. How few Irish clergymen at this moment whose names have ever crossed St. George's Channel, and there are still fewer which have crossed the Straits of Dover. Perhaps those who have done most for learning, amongst living Irish ecclesiastics, are antiquarians like Dr. Reeves and Dr. Todd, of whom I wish to speak with the greatest respect. But the merits of a handful of men cannot be allowed to outweigh the shortcomings of so large a body. Again, the Church of Ireland contrasts very unfavourably with the Church of England in the production of men of exemplary and exceptional piety—like George Herbert. I am quite ready to let our opponents make the most of the fact that the Roman Catholic population has decreased in the last thirty years by nearly two millions. They have fallen from 6,430,000 to 4,500,000. They are welcome, I say, to make the best of this, and to go through all those pretty juggling tricks with figures, of which figures are always susceptible. The broad, hopeless fact still continues, that the disproportion between the two sects is perfectly enormous, and that there is not the slightest chance of any change being worked in it, by any of the ordinary or extraordinary agencies known to history, during the next hundred years. The case to be made out for the Church from the population returns may be now a little better, now a little worse, but it can never be good enough to merit serious consideration from men who are not blinded by prejudice. The statistics of this subject have, however, been so much ventilated in this debate that I will say no more about them. During the last 300 years, you have had three policies in Ireland. From Queen Elizabeth to William III., there was a policy of persecution—that failed. From William III. down to Catholic Emancipation, there was a policy of ascendancy—that failed too. Then timidly and tentatively you turned towards general endowment, and in 1845 Sir Robert Peel took a considerable step in that direction. It soon became clear, however, that the country would not follow you on that road, and in 1851 the storm of the Papal aggression nearly forced you to abandon your compromise. And if the Encyclical had been directed against this country in particular, instead of against civilization generally, the same difficulty might have occurred. Why not, then, try the only course you have not yet tried—general disendowment? I wish to know what explanation hon. M.P.'s opposite can give of the admitted failure of Protestantism in Ireland. Why has Protestantism not triumphed there? On my theory the explanation is quite simple. I say that your blundering legislation identified the sacred cause of Protestantism with a bad political system, and that the deserved odium which belonged to an engine of oppression made the good doctrines of the Reformation hateful to the Irish people. The Roman Catholic explanation is also intelligible enough, although wrong; but what is or can be the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends? But, if we adopt general disendowment, what shall we do with the money? I take it for granted that Ireland will have a right to the whole sum, and in Ireland the extension and completion of the already very good system of primary education will have the first claim; the creation of a good middle class education, of which hardly any vestiges at present exist in Ireland, will have the second claim; the third claim would be for the extension of the higher education; and the fourth for all those civilizing agencies which supplement the effect of education. The policy which I suggest will have incidentally the good effect of getting rid of many difficulties; for instance, if the Irish Protestant Church is disendowed, the grant to Maynooth, the Regium Donum, and the grant to the Belfast Theological Professors, would all come to an end. It is hardly necessary to say that we have no right to interfere with any vested interests. All these would, of course, be scrupulously respected, and it would only be when the last person pecuniarily interested in keeping up this great abuse had departed, that the Irish people would enter into the possession of the last remnant of their rightful heritage. We do not wish the Government to take any immediate action in this matter. My hon. Friend's Resolution desires only consideration, not action. He would, I am sure, be perfectly satisfied if the Government were to announce its adherence to the views expressed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but, if it make no such announcement, and leave it to be understood that he speaks only as an individual Member of the Cabinet, while the Secretary for the Home Department represents the opinions of most of his Colleagues, I must advise my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea to divide the House.

MR. COGAN said, the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Whiteside) had made an admission which was striking, and might be prophetic. He stated that the arguments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were fatal to the existence of the Church. The proposition of the hon. Member for Swansea was divided into two heads. The first was, that the present state of the Irish Church was unsatisfactory; the second, that the Government ought to inquire into and remedy that unsatisfactory condition. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had dealt with both branches of the question. With regard to the unsatisfactory state of the Irish Church, the right hon. Gentleman had placed it before the House in such a conclusive way that it was unnecessary to pursue the question. The right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Whiteside) said that inquiry meant destruction. He believed that there was something in this view, seeing that inquiry would disclose such anomalies in the Irish Church, as would convince the country that it ought not to be endured. But what would the friends of the Church say to this? He (Mr. Cogan) was at a loss to understand how a friend of the Church could put forward such an argument. Considering that the Parliament was in its expiring days, would it not be desirable to leave out the last portion of the Motion, and simply declare that the state of the Irish Church was in an unsatisfactory state? He believed that an overwhelming majority would affirm this proposition. The Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to think that, as they had been baffled in their last attempt to deal with the subject, they should hesitate before they made another such attempt. But the question was waiting solution; and on it the Ministry must stand or fall. The duty of the Minister was to advocate great principles, irrespective of being in office or out of office. It was great principles that bound party together, and if the Government were wise, they would endeavour to enlist the sympathies of the Liberal Irish representatives and ally with them that large phalanx of Irish Members who had stood by them in every effort which had been made to promote the cause of civil and religious liberty. By doing so they would rally round them a strong party, but he would warn them that if they were not prepared to deal with important questions on great principles they could not expect to receive permanent support.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, that the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) had a short time ago stated that the Established Church in Ireland would not last long. He advised the Government to deal with the measure, to prevent those on the Opposition Benches from leaping over their heads in the matter.

LORD STANLEY said, the observation which he had made was that the question of the Irish Church would lead to considerable discussion.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he concurred in the opinion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that every Government must be more or less guided by public opinion.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, in reference to the statements made by the hon. Member for Swansea as to certain appointments in the Irish Church, and with regard to the Bishop of Derry, to whom the hon. Member attributed so large a revenue, that the late Mr. O'Connell resisted the reduction of that bishop's income, because he was the only prelate in the Irish Church who advocated religious liberty.

MR. GOSCHEN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned." — (Mr. Goschen.)

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that so far as the Government were concerned, they were quite willing to abide by the decision of the House. If the House thought an adjournment desirable, the Government had no objection.

Question put. The House divided :—

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that he objected to the discussion of the clauses being taken at that late hour. Several of the clauses contained principles of the utmost importance, and, in his opinion, full of danger to those who might be invited to lend money upon the security offered. He would feel it his duty to propose Amendments when the proper opportunity for doing so presented itself.

EAST INDIA (GOVERNOR GENERAL'S POWERS, &c.) BILL—[BILL 76.]
COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. VANSITTART said, that this Bill proposed to enlarge the powers of the Governor General for making laws and regulations in India, and to that he entertained no objection. He deeply regretted the result of recent operations in Bhootan, which reflected no lustre on our arms. He wished to know whether, a few months since, instructions had not been issued to Sir John Lawrence not to make any new appointments of greater value than £400 a year without communicating with the Home authorities? He could not reconcile this petty interference with the professed object of this Bill, which would confer extensive powers in important affairs upon the Governor General.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the operations in Bhootan had been undertaken at the recommendation of the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, but the troops were not to occupy territory, but only to hold a line of forts to protect our own frontier. With regard to the second point, no new orders had been issued on the subject, but it had been from time immemorial the standing rule not to make any new appointments above a certain value without the sanction of the Home Government.

Bill considered in Committee.

House resumed.

Bill reported, without Amendment ; to be read 3<sup>o</sup> on Thursday.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that it was not brought forward with any view to the protection of game, but in the interest of the tenant farmers themselves. Great damage and loss was occasioned to the owners of sheep in Ireland by the enormous number of dogs which were at large in that country. From the earliest period of the day to the latest period of the night, all parts of the country swarmed with dogs, and many of the people seemed to think it impossible to perform the ordinary functions of life without having a dog at their heels. The dog had been called the friend of man; that was true, and in that sense the people of Ireland would never want friends; but he thought that in this case, as in some others, they might say, "Save me from my friends." He could best illustrate his case by reading extracts from some letters he had received. One gentleman said it was of very little use that wolves had been destroyed, for in that country they had what was equally obnoxious, an enormous multitude of useless dogs. Another gentleman, who was a medical man, complained that in going his rounds to see his patients he could not do so with safety, being constantly subject to the attacks of these animals. A gentleman from Belfast wrote that half-starved curs roamed about the streets, and were very dangerous to children and old persons, and that he was constantly afraid of being attacked by these animals in the by-streets. The destruction of sheep that went on was hardly credible. Compensation had been demanded by the butchers of Londonderry for the destruction of sheep in the town-parks, and it had been shown that in one district the butchers could not turn out their sheep in these parks, although surrounded by walls, without having them worried by dogs. A valuable Return had been moved for some time ago by the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. Bagwell), which would give some idea of the damage done by dogs to sheep. It appeared by that Return that in 1861 there were no less than 8,809 destroyed by dogs. In 1863 the number of sheep reported by the police as having been killed by dogs was 7,324. This, however, gave little idea of the number of sheep killed, because the Returns only showed the number of which the police had cognizance. Keepers of sheep were placed under a peculiar disadvantage in consequence of this nuisance of dogs being allowed to exist without any remedy, and their position was greatly aggravated by the fact of the Poison Prohibition Bill, which received the assent of Parliament and the Crown last year. He would now call attention to the number of dogs supposed to exist in the country, and this in itself gave rise to a very curious calculation. By the Census of 1861 the number of inhabited houses in Ireland reached nearly 1,000,000. Now it would be a very low average indeed to allow one dog to each house. [An hon. MEMBER: More likely two.] Some hon. Member said that two dogs to each house would be a fairer average; but allowing only one to each house, that would give 1,000,000 of dogs in the country. Let the House but compare that number with the amount of live stock in the country. According to Mr. Donnelly's Agricultural Return there were 3,300,000 head of cattle and 3,056,000 sheep, and 1,000,000 pigs. So that taking those Returns to be correct, there would be nearly one dog to every 3½ head of cattle, and one dog to every three sheep, and one dog to every pig. Those who were in favour of the prosperity of Ireland would see at once that the number of sheep and pigs would probably be very largely increased if the number of dogs in the country was reduced. Now, it was evident from the fertility of its soil, and the mildness of its climate, that Ireland was peculiarly adapted to the rearing of sheep. It was, therefore, of the utmost importance to that country that every encouragement should be given to the rearing and feeding of sheep, and to the sale and manufacture of wool. It appeared to him that his Bill would go far to effect those objects. He would, no doubt, be asked why he did not go to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and request him to put on the assessed taxes in Ireland? Now, he believed that every one who alluded to the statistics which had been recently brought before the House, and which had been disclosed before the Taxation Committee of Ireland, must allow that this was not the time for putting any additional taxes upon that country. Even if it were otherwise, he was prepared to show that the result of the imposition of the tax upon dogs in Ireland would be too trifling to justify any experiment of the kind by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It appeared that the number of inhabited houses rated at £20 a year, which would be liable to the house duty, was only 30,000, and the number of horses not engaged in agricultural or other business, which would be liable to the assessed tax, was 33,000. The taxes, then, upon those two items, which formed more than a half of the English assessed taxes, would only amount in Ireland to £50,000 a year. What he proposed was rather in the nature of a registration fee than a tax. It might be said that it was a hard thing to put a tax or registration fee upon dogs in a country where there was no such thing as assessed taxes. But it should be recollected that in almost every country on the Continent power was given to each commune or municipality to impose a registration fee or tax upon dogs, in the interests of public health. In France the municipal councils were charged with certain duties with a view to the prevention of accidents arising from the multiplication of dogs, and in some cases very severe ordinances indeed were issued in reference to this subject. In May, 1845, for example, it was forbidden to allow more than a certain number of dogs to exist in a dwelling-house, by which the safety or the health of the inhabitants might be compromised. Neither were dogs allowed to go at large without muzzles, or without a plate attached to the neck of each dog, showing the name and abode of the owner. Full directions were also given to the mayor of the town what to do in the case of a person being bitten by a mad dog. In France generally a tax was imposed upon dogs for the benefit of each commune—such tax not to exceed ten francs, nor to be less than one franc. In Belgium, by the law of 1825, which had been repealed but was subsequently re-

enacted, every dog was required to be registered, and commissioners were appointed to go round and inspect the different houses of the commune, with a view of compelling the enforcement of the law in this respect. The tax upon dogs in Belgium, as well as in the Grand Duchy of Baden, yielded a considerable revenue. Crossing the Atlantic, he found that in Massachusetts the inhabitants of each town were empowered to make such bye-laws as they thought necessary for their protection against the danger of dogs. Penalties not exceeding ten dollars were inflicted for offences against those bye-laws, and no person was allowed to keep more than two dogs. It was also required that every dog should carry a plate with the name of the owner and his abode inscribed upon it, and any dog without such an appendage might be killed. In Turkey it appeared there was no particular law against dogs, which swarmed in that country. The dogs, however, there acted the part of scavengers, and, curiously enough, it was said the disease of hydrophobia was utterly unknown. Now, his object was not to tax the country, but to impose such a registration fee as would have the effect of reducing the number of dogs. He proposed, too, that every dog should bear the name and residence of its owner. He did not think that the farmers of Ireland would grumble at a registration fee of 2s. 6d. on each dog. By an old law of George III. there was a tax of 10s. placed upon sporting dogs, and 2s. 6d. for every other kind of dog. He therefore only proposed to go back to the old legislation of the Irish Parliament in imposing this registration fee of 2s. 6d. on each dog, subjecting any person who shall not register his dog to a penalty not less than £2 nor more than £5. He had been pressed to make certain exemptions in the case of sporting and other dogs; but he did not think it advisable to assent to any. It was in the interest of the farmers and of the public health and safety that he introduced this Bill. Now, as to sporting dogs, if they only compared his Bill with the charge imposed upon such dogs in England, the gentlemen of Ireland would find that they were very well treated. According to his Bill a gentleman in Ireland with forty couple of hounds would have to pay only £10 a year; whereas the English gentleman was compelled to pay £48 a year, or, in the event of a fine, £21 a year. He proposed to reduce this to £10 a year. He posed to carry out the provisions of his Bill;—and here he knew he would be met with the objection that it would make the police unpopular in Ireland to impose this additional duty upon them. But if the people saw that the police were enforcing the law with impartiality in what was for the interest of the public, he could not for one moment believe that it would make the police unpopular. The same objection was raised when it was proposed to give the police the power of collecting the excise; but the result had been such that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that since that time the law against smuggling had never been so well enforced as now or the work better done. The objection he thought not worth considering. He proposed that every person keeping a dog shall give notice thereof to the constabulary, who were to enter it in a book kept for that purpose; the constable was to transmit annually a copy of the entries and account of fees to the Clerk of the Poor Law Union; and he proposed to remunerate the constabulary for their additional labour by assigning to them a portion—two-fifths—of the fees. He was not much experienced in drawing up Acts of Parliament, and he was therefore willing to leave it to the Chief Secretary for Ireland and other hon. Members to make such moderate provisions in the Bill, so that something was done to abate the nuisance, as they might consider necessary. Almost daily he had received a large bundle of letters, especially from tenant farmers, medical men, and the inhabitants of towns, in favour of a measure of this kind, and he hoped the House would legislate upon the subject in a manner so as to get rid of the evil complained of. A remedy had been required for some years past, but he delayed bringing in a Bill for the compulsory registration of dogs until after a similar measure had been passed for the registration of births and deaths in Ireland; not wishing that the registration of the former should precede a registration for human beings. He hoped the House would read the Bill a second time.

MR. BAGWELL seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Frederick Heygate.)

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that every hon. Gentleman who had been in Ireland was aware that a vast number of dogs were allowed to prowl about that country, and that they destroyed a large amount of property every year; indeed, the country was literally swarming with dogs. He believed that the Return moved for by the hon. Member for Clonmel was perfectly correct in stating that in one year alone 8,000 sheep were destroyed by dogs, that was no doubt within the actual number; and he particularly recollected that on one occasion the destruction of sheep was so numerous in Donegal that it was at first supposed to be the result of some systematic outrages against property, and the attention of the Government was called to the subject; but upon inquiry it was traced to the enormous quantity of dogs that were kept in the neighbourhood. The hon. Baronet had said that the number of dogs in Ireland might be taken to be 1,000,000; but he (Sir Robert Peel) considered there were a great many more; and if they calculated them as three to every two houses—which would be a fair calculation—there would be found to be between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000 dogs in Ireland at this time. The hon. Baronet said he did not want to have the assessed taxes extended to Ireland; and, indeed, it was quite evident that to impose an assessed tax upon dogs only would not pay the Government, and, therefore, some other machinery must be invented for taxing them, in order to correct the crying evil which every one admitted. But he asked those who had read the Bill whether they thought it possible that Parliament would assent to its provisions? The hon. Baronet wished to throw the duty upon the constabulary, and he had made a joke about the registration of births and deaths in Ireland; but let any one suppose what the police would have to do in keeping the accounts relative to between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000 dogs. They would not only have to register all the dogs in the country, but by the eighth clause they were required to be particularly careful not to register any puppy less than six months old. Now, the idea of the police going about the country with a veterinary surgeon, which he must do in order to ascertain the exact age of a puppy was ludicrous, because if they registered and charged for a dog under six months old they would become liable for some penalty themselves. He at once protested against the constabulary being so employed. He admitted the evil, but they must not attempt a remedy which would be infinitely more laborious than taking the census or collecting agricultural statistics. The constabulary would be constantly registering dogs, going about from house to house in search of them, and then to have to ascertain their ages—duties which would render any public functionary in Ireland most unpopular.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, it was only intended to register the owner's names.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the constabulary would have to keep the books, and do all the necessary work. By the third clause of the Bill the money received for registration was to pass through the hands of the constabulary and the clerks of the Poor Law unions, but there was no effectual check provided with respect to the receipts and disbursements. He decidedly objected to that proposal. He should be happy to amend the Bill in Committee, but he thought it would be almost impossible to do so satisfactorily. He had turned his attention to the subject, assisted by the Inspector General of Constabulary, and the latter had submitted to him provisions for a measure which might meet to some extent the evils complained of. The heads of proposals were as follows:—That no person should be allowed to keep a dog without a licence, and was subjected to a penalty if he did so; the licence to be issued by the Inland Board of Revenue, and supplied by all the distributors of stamps and postmasters, the charge to be 2s. 6d. for one dog, 2s. for two dogs, and so on, and 5s. above a certain number. The licences to be in force for three years, and to be filled up in due form by the clerks to the justices of the petty sessions districts, who should register them in a book, for which they should receive a fee of 6d.; the licence to be signed by one or more justices of the peace, and the books to be kept by the magistrates' clerks open to the inspection of every one who wished to inspect them. The owners to be liable to a penalty for damage done by their dogs if they were allowed to go at large unmuzzled; and any one finding a dog within his field or enclosure was to be at liberty to destroy him, and the owner, if discovered, should be made liable for any sheep destroyed by that dog. [SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, the owner was liable under the present law.] In that case the provision would not be required, but it might be desirable to re-enact it if any new Bill were introduced. It was proposed that the penalties should be recoverable at petty sessions.

Sir Robert Peel

With regard to property destroyed by dogs, the owners of which were not known, he thought the value should be recoverable by grand jury presentment. ["No, no!"] These were simply suggestions with the view of meeting a crying evil, and he thought if a Bill to such effect were submitted to the House with the sanction of the Treasury, it would be far more likely to meet the evil complained of than the present Bill, which he could not support, and which he trusted the hon. Baronet would withdraw.

COLONEL DICKSON said, there was no doubt that the subject was one of great importance to Ireland, but he could not concur in either of the propositions submitted to the House. He thought that the tax of 2s. 6d. for a dog was too small; in his opinion the amount ought to be 10s. for the first dog, 5s. for the second dog, and 2s. 6d. for every other dog. He agreed in thinking that the eighth clause should be struck out of the Bill, for he would rather place a tax on a puppy than upon a grown-up dog, as a man with a grown-up dog might have an affection for it, and be willing to pay the necessary tax for keeping it. He felt great regret in not being able to support the present Bill, but he hoped the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland would introduce a measure on the subject after consulting with some individual more qualified to give an opinion in the matter than the functionary he had named.

MR. BAGWELL thought the Bill suggested by the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland would answer the purpose as well, if not better than the measure under consideration. Colonel White, a large farmer in Ireland, had written to him that he had forty sheep killed by dogs in one year, and that, having reason to believe that the dogs belonged to his tenantry, he assembled them and asked them to reimburse him for his loss, and, on their refusal to do so, informed them that he would allow no one of them to keep a dog unless he paid 5s. a year to the schools on the estate, the result of which was that he never afterwards lost a sheep. The right hon. Baronet objected to the Bill on the score that it would throw a great deal of work on the police; but there was every reason to believe that the registration fee would tend greatly to the decrease of dogs, and the consequence would be that very little work would have to be done under the Bill. He objected to the employment of the constabulary in this matter. They were a highly respectable body of men, but as a police force he regarded them as a failure. If the present Bill were withdrawn, he hoped the Chief Secretary for Ireland would give a pledge to bring forward a measure on the subject.

Lord NAAS said, that the nuisance resulting from the number of dogs in Ireland was almost indescribable. He knew that in his county at lambing season a farmer having twenty or thirty sheep was obliged to keep a man up all night watching them to guard against the depredations of these animals; and yet, in spite of all precautions, a great number were always destroyed by the dogs. The evil was admitted on all hands ["No, no!"] He should like to know who said "No." The dogs in his hon. Friend's neighbourhood must be of a different race if they did not attack his sheep and lambs. The chief objection taken to the Bill before the House was that it would impose duties on the constabulary which they would have difficulty in performing; but he had always observed that any attempt to place additional duties on the constabulary was invariably opposed by those having the direction of that force. He had himself proposed that certain revenue duties should be performed by the constabulary, and the gentleman at the head of the force was terrified at the proposal; but he had since seen cause to change his opinion, and admitted that the plan worked well. The constabulary performed their duties generally in an efficient manner, but the Chief Secretary for Ireland, when he wished it to be believed that the constabulary were already overworked seemed to be drawing too largely on the credulity of the House. The plan suggested by the Chief Secretary was a very fair one, and he suggested that the present Bill, when read a second time, should be postponed until after the discussion on the proposed Government Bill, and if the House sanctioned that Bill, the one now under consideration would not, of course, be proceeded with.

Mr. SCULLY believed that the destruction of sheep in Ireland by dogs was greatly exaggerated, and objected to a different legislation on this subject applied to Ireland from that which was in force in the dog was of an age to require registering? Was he to examine its teeth—a process that might in some cases be attended with inconvenience to the examiner? Really, to make the Bill complete, they ought to have a registry of the births of all dogs; and as soon as a litter of puppies was born, a constable should be sent for to ascertain which of them was to be kept. In conclusion, he was glad that the Chief Secretary had acquitted the people in the county of Donegal of all blame for the destruction of sheep in the mountains. These poor persons had been persecuted, and in many instances utterly ruined, owing to the groundless accusations preferred against them. The hon. Member then moved, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read the second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Scully.)

Mr. BRADY said, the police were in truth a standing army, and if they were to be employed in the duties cast on them by this Bill, they would become ten times more distasteful than they were to the people of Ireland, and believing the principle of the Bill to be exceedingly exceptionable, he would second the Amendment.

THE O'CONOR DON thought the general feeling was in favour of something being done to check the undue multiplication of dogs in Ireland. Such a proposal was intended as much for the benefit of the poor as for the benefit of the rich; for many small farmers were unable to keep their sheep in consequence of the ravages committed by dogs. He did not wish to interfere with the gratification which any man derived from keeping a dog, but against the loss of that gratification must be set the loss now occasioned to property from the excessive number of those animals. A system of registration would enable them to make the owner look after his dog, and more effectually to enforce against him his present legal responsibility for the injury it did to other people. The only reason for making the constabulary the instruments for giving effect to the law, and also for conducting the primary registration, was that by the fees paid upon such registration they would have some interest in seeing that the law was carried out. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland proposed that, instead of a registration under the constabulary, there should be a licensing system under the Board of Revenue or the clerks of Petty Sessions. But even under that plan, who were to see that dogs really were licensed? If the constabulary were to do so, then the objections urged by the Chief Secretary would equally apply to his own plan.

Mr. McMAHON said, the Bill afforded an excellent illustration of the system on which the legislation for Ireland was generally conducted. A local, exceptional, and temporary state of things was found to exist, and straightway they based upon it a universal and permanent law. In certain parts of Ireland there had been a great depopulation, and as a necessary consequence of that there was a great surplus of dogs. These animals, having nobody to look after them or claim them, ran about the country wild, doing occasional mischief. But that only happened in Londonderry, Donegal, and those districts where the people, having had their dwellings levelled, had emigrated, or had gone into the workhouse, or had died by the roadside; and how were they to get at and register such dogs, which really had no owner? Were the police to shoot them, or hunt them down, and bring them before a jury? No depopulation had taken place in his own county (Wexford), and he had not heard of a single complaint there on this matter. Because a grievance existed in a few places, why were they to punish the whole country? Under that Bill nobody could keep a dog for the protection of his sheep or cattle without registering it; but in England the farmer could keep farm dogs free of trouble or charge. It would be better that the English assessed taxes should be extended to Ireland than that the present measure should become law. There was no warrant whatever for such a Bill; nobody would think of proposing it for any other country but Ireland. The Bill could not, in his opinion, be altered so as to be acceptable to the House, and probably the best way of dealing with it would be to reject it altogether.

After a few words from Captain BRACROFT,

Sir THOMAS BATESON briefly supported the Bill, observing that he had only the other day received a letter from his steward informing him that he was obliged to keep men on the look-out all night in order to prevent the destruction of his sheep by dogs, and he knew that many persons in the county Down had given up keeping sheep in consequence of the loss of them by the depredations of the dogs.

Colonel DUNNE thought it was generally admitted that some legislative remedy was needed in this case, and he believed that in Committee it would be easy to amend such of the details of the Bill as required improvement. He thought the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland might devise such a measure if he would consult with the Irish Members on the subject.

Mr. HENLEY said, he would vote with the Chief Secretary for Ireland if the House went to a division. If the Government said the constabulary were not fit to take charge of the working of that measure, he must accept that opinion; and that objection was fatal to the Bill. In England they taxed the dogs which had been kept in the preceding year, and they did that from the utter impossibility of taxing them prospectively. That fact, also, went to the root of everything in the present Bill, which required, as the first thing, that the owner of a dog should give a certain notice. In England they did not attempt to deal with puppies, but left them alone. By the Bill, every man who had a dog that was not registered was made liable to a fine of 5s.; so that if a man happened to have a number of bitches, it was easy to see to what cumulative penalties he might be exposed almost before he was aware of it. He knew nothing of the number of dogs or puppies in Ireland; but if legislation was needed on the matter, it would be much better to follow the English mode, which was recommended by long experience of the assessed taxes, and make people pay for the number of dogs they had the year before — a fact which could be got at, and which would equally serve their purpose. Was it intended that there should be a license to shoot dogs that did mischief? It was very questionable wisdom to encourage people to take the law into their own hands, and if there was to be a shooting of dogs it was possible that some other shooting might take place.

Sir FREDERICK HYGATE, in reply, said he was surprised that the Chief Secretary should object to a measure which the Bill entrusted with the would impose upon them, because he had thought the right hon. Baronet's confidence in the force was very large. The county of Londonderry and many other places where large numbers of sheep had been destroyed by dogs were not at all depopulated, and it was quite an error to suppose that it was only in a very few exceptional and isolated districts that the evil against which the Bill was directed prevailed. The tenant farmers in many parts of Ireland had sustained serious loss from the ravages of dogs, and no effectual remedy for the evil existed. He was quite ready to agree to the proposal of the right hon. Baronet, if this Bill were now read a second time, to postpone going into Committee till the Government had brought in a Bill on the subject, and then both Bills might be considered pari passu.

SHEEP AND CATTLE BILL—[BILL 57.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. H. FENWICK, in moving the second reading of the Bill, stated that its object was to make the owners of dogs liable for injury inflicted by them on sheep and cattle. In fact, the Bill was one to assimilate the law in England with respect to injuries by dogs to sheep and cattle to that of Scotland and Ireland. At present there was no remedy as against the owner of a dog for injuries to sheep and cattle, unless it could be proved that the dog had been in the habit of worrying sheep or cattle, and there was often great difficulty in obtaining that proof. Such a law was obviously very absurd and unjust. The information he had received led him to believe that in almost every county in England very considerable injury was inflicted by dogs on sheep and cattle. In his own county, according to Returns received, there were no fewer than 962 cases of such injury to sheep alone, and in no instance had any compensation been obtained. The grand jury of the county, Poor Law Guardians, highway authorities, and agricultural societies had petitioned in favour of the Bill.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, the hon. Gentleman was mistaken in supposing that the law in Ireland was as he had represented it. It only extended to sheep, not to cattle. But in Scotland the law applied to both sheep and cattle, which was the proper state of things. He hoped this Bill would be made applicable not only to England, but to Ireland, and he thought poultry might with great propriety be added to sheep and cattle.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed for Tomorrow.

CHEMISTS AND DRUGGISTS BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR FITZROY KELLY, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, it was a measure which had been long and urgently required for the protection of the public, and it was desired by all the members of the respectable profession of chemists and druggists. It was well known to the House that as the law now stood there was absolutely no protection whatever for the public in general against the carrying on of the business of chemist and druggist, and consequently of the making up of medical prescriptions by persons altogether ignorant and incompetent. It had long been felt that the law ought to provide some protection against the dangers to which the public was exposed in this respect. The Medical Council had recently called the attention of the Government to this important subject in the hope that the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary would himself introduce a Bill to provide a remedy against the evils complained of. It was not for him to arraign the Government, who he had no doubt had very good reasons for not attempting legislation on the subject; but as the Government had shown no disposition to act upon the suggestion made them, the Pharmaceutical Society, which had been long established, and whose acts and proceedings had conferred great benefit upon the public, thought it their duty to submit this measure to the consideration of the House. As the law at present stood, there was no qualification required, nor was any licence necessary to enable a man to start into business as a chemist and druggist. By the present Bill it was proposed to subject chemists and House. Both Bills, however, admitted the necessity of affording to the public some protection against incompetent and ignorant persons carrying on the trade of chemists and druggists; they agreed that some examination should be applied to all; and the only difference between them in that respect was by whom the examination should be conducted. His Bill proposed that it should be in the hands of the already recognized body—the Pharmaceutical Society—who had conducted their operations in that respect with great effect and success. The other Bill proposed that there should be a Council of twenty-one members, who were to appoint the examiners, no provision being made for the qualification either of the Council or the examiners, and they were equally left in doubt as to the character of the examination. That was a point which he thought might be as well, if not more properly, discussed and decided in that House than in a Select Committee, because it was a point upon which they did not require to take evidence.

—(Sir FitzRoy Kelly.)

SIR JOHN SHELLEY distinctly disclaimed, on the part of those whom he represented on this occasion, the slightest intention to infringe or interfere with the privileges of the chartered body who were the clients of the hon. and learned Gentleman. The question was a public one—the sale of drugs. Dr. Taylor had recommended to the Government that the question of the sale of poisons should be taken into consideration. The Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman went no further than this: it prescribed a certain examination, under the Pharmacy Act, to be undergone by all before they were qualified to make up medical prescriptions; but there was a very large portion of the trade carrying on a lucrative business, that did not see or make up a medical prescription once in a week, and the Bill as to these would be comparatively useless. The trade was divided into two classes—namely, those who wished to become scientific chemists and those who carried on the trade of chemists and druggists, who required little or no qualification for the branch of the trade in which they had embarked. His Bill proposed to deal, not with common things sold over the counter, but only with poisons. The Pharmaceutical Society had no doubt existed for many years, was possessed of great privileges and wealth, and had done a great deal of good in towns, but its benefits had not reached the agricultural districts. It was well that the House should know that the members of the Pharmaceutical Society numbered at one time 4,000, but since then they had decreased to 2,300, including the foreign and colonial members. The United Society of Chemists, whose Bill he would have the honour of proposing to that House, was composed of over 3,000 members. It was clear, he considered, that the examination prescribed by the Pharmaceutical Society was too expensive, and this accounted for the falling off in the number of its members, and the superior numerical strength of the Society of Chemists and Druggists. Care should be taken that while the doctors differed the patients did not die; and it was their duty to see, in the public interests, that some legislation should take place by which the sale of poisons would be efficiently regulated. If he understood aright the Bill proposed by his hon. and learned Friend, it would prohibit any person from making up a prescription who had not undergone the examination of the Council of the Pharmaceutical Society. The House would agree that it was a great pity that the two great Societies which had been referred to had not come together and mutually agreed upon the principles of a Bill which would not have interfered with the freedom of the trade, and have given the public that protection which they required in the sale of dangerous drugs. The Chemists and Druggists Society had made advances with that object, but the Pharmaceutical Society would not recognize it, and now each Society had come forward with a Bill of its own. The examinations of the Pharmaceutical Society cost ten guineas; and in addition to that there were the expenses necessarily entailed upon persons coming from the country to London, and remaining there till they had passed their examination; so that the outlay would not amount to less than £30 or £40. He did not wish to interfere for a moment with the privileges of the Pharmaceutical Society; on the contrary, he would still be glad to see chemists wishing to raise themselves in the grade of their profession, taking the advantage of the examination which the Pharmaceutical Society afforded; but he could not assent to the principle of forcing the whole of the chemists and druggists to pay for that examination, when they could be registered for half the amount. The public required more protection than the Bill proposed by the hon. and learned Member provided, and he (Sir John Shelley) ventured to say that that Bill did not meet with the support of the trade at large. The House should not look upon the two Bills as a mere squabble between two great Societies, but as an important public question. Let the Pharmaceutical Society go on with their hall and lectures, and they would no doubt do much good; but this Bill of the Society was not calculated to promote the interests of the trade at large, nor yet to reduce the danger to which the public were exposed in the sale of drugs. The Bill which he (Sir John Shelley) had brought forward did not interfere with those now carrying on the trade of chemists and druggists, but it proposed that chemists should be registered under an Act, and, after that, that a Board of Examination should be founded upon the principle of the Medical Practitioners Act. He believed if these two Bills were referred to a Select Committee, the result would be satisfactory. The sale of poisons was a difficult question to deal with, and he heartily wished the Government had taken it in hand, especially after the strong representation that had been made on all sides as to the mode in which drugs were dispensed in agricultural districts, where everything, from laudanum to a pair of boots was sold in the same shop. The question of the sale of poisons was no doubt difficult to deal with, but when they found that a Society that had been established so many years shirked it, and the Government did nothing, it was right that some one else should take steps to put the matter on a right footing. A Select Committee might find the groundwork of a good public Act in the Bill which he had brought before the House, rather than that in which had been proposed by his hon. and learned Friend opposite. He had, however, no objection to the second reading of this Bill, hoping the House would see the necessity of referring both Bills to a Select Committee.

Mr. BRADY supported the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend (Sir FitzRoy Kelly), and contrasted the importance of the two Societies referred to, and their respective claims upon the consideration of the House. The Pharmaceutical Society was composed of men of the highest knowledge in chemistry, and the examinations were formed upon a

and; while the Society of Chemists and Druggists admitted clerks, apprentices, and many other persons as members who knew nothing whatever about chemistry. He attributed the decrease in the members of the Pharmaceutical Society to the fact that there were a number of enthusiastic persons joined it at first who had since resigned, not having any real interest in the science of chemistry. It was incumbent, he thought, upon the Home Secretary to take the matter into his own hands.

Mr. KINGLAKE said, he did not admit that there was any force in the argument of the hon. Baronet as to the greater number of members composing the Chemists and Druggists Society compared with the Pharmaceutical Society. The one submitted its members to a very difficult examination, whereas the other did not subject its members to any examination whatever. The claim of the Pharmaceutical Society rested entirely upon the fact that it had ready a machinery suitable for conducting the proposed examinations; whereas, if the Bill of the hon. Baronet were adopted, it would be necessary to begin de novo and constitute new machinery. There were some alterations which he would like to see made in the Bill, which would place all chemists and druggists now in business on an equality with those who should hereafter pass the examination of the Pharmaceutical Society. If that were done, he should not object to the second reading.

Mr. ROEBUCK wished to know what steps the Government intended to take in this matter; as he would feel himself very much bound by what they did, because this was a matter which fell particularly within their cognizance.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he had no objection to the second reading of the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir FitzRoy Kelly). The Pharmaceutical Society was a very important and useful body, and if there were to be examinations of chemists and druggists those examinations might with safety be placed under the direction of the Council of that Society. There was no doubt these subjects required very careful consideration. The hon. and learned Gentleman was quite right in saying that Bills with reference to medical subjects had hitherto been very carefully inquired into. That was the case with the Pharmacy Act, which received the close attention of a Select Committee, of which his right

hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. E. P. Bouverie) was Chairman, and the Bill which was brought in was essentially altered, the House having adopted the recommendations of the Committee with regard to it. There was again the Medical Registration Act, with regard to which he recollected the difficulty that was experienced in bringing together the different branches of the medical profession; and it was only after an inquiry before a Select Committee, that this object was effected, and an amended Bill was submitted to Parliament, which was ultimately adopted, with the general approval of the medical profession. He had seen the representatives of the Pharmaceutical Society, and also of the general body of Chemists and Druggists, and his advice to them was that they should meet together, and agree upon a general outline of a Bill. He could not concur in all parts of the Bill which the Pharmaceutical Society wished him to introduce, and he stated certain objections to it. Unhappily, though it was, perhaps, not a matter of surprise, there were jealousies existing among members of the same profession, and it had not yet been possible to bring them together and induce them to agree to the principles of a Bill. The Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman was good as far as it went, but it dealt with a very limited portion of the subject. It professed only to provide an examination for chemists who were to make up prescriptions for medical practitioners. In the other Bill before the House there were provisions with regard to the sale of poisons and deleterious drugs, and it would be extremely desirable when dealing with the subject to embody in the Bill, if possible, these provisions. He thought there were points in both Bills which recommended them to favourable consideration, and if a Select Committee were appointed who would bring before them a limited number of the representatives of the two conflicting parties, a Bill might be the result which would effect to the fullest extent the object in which they had so deep an interest. He would recommend that both Bills be read a second time, and referred to a Select Committee, a course which he believed would be the most satisfactory to the House.

LORD ELCHO said, he had some objections to the Bill proposed by the hon. and learned Member (Sir FitzRoy Kelly). He had been asked by the Pharmaceutical Society to undertake the conduct of that

Bill through the House, and the reason, he apprehended, why they came to him was that in 1858 he had taken an active part in the subject of medical reform. There was much need felt for raising the standard of education. There were so many different bodies bidding against each other that the result was the lowering of medical education. Certain bodies also had monopolies which it was felt desirable to do away with. When the representatives of the Pharmaceutical Society came to him with this Bill, he told them they went a little too far in one respect, and an injustice would be inflicted. He contended that it was necessary to allow certain persons in country villages to dispense medicines, and even to make up prescriptions, although it could not be expected that those people should undergo examinations. Having met with an accident in the Highlands during the present year he had had occasion himself to get a prescription made up in one of these country villages. He had to go for this purpose to the post-office of the village, which he found to be a store for the sale of almost every article, from fiddles to hobnails. His prescription, however, was made up, and did him great benefit. Now he believed it to be unadvisable to do away with shops of that description; and, at the same time, it was unreasonable to expect that such shopkeepers should submit to an examination. He should support the Bill brought in by his hon. and learned Friend in preference to the one introduced by the hon. Baronet, because, of the two, he believed it to be the more liberal. He should also observe that the former measure was promoted by the Pharmaceutical Society, who had a good library, laboratory, and lecture-room, and they had expended £70,000 on the education of the chemists and druggists of the country; while the Secretary of the Chemists and Druggists Society, who had framed the other Bill, were nothing more than a trading body, and a sort of benefit society. Under these circumstances he could not help thinking that if the present law were to be changed it would be better to raise the new system upon the foundation furnished by the former, rather than upon that furnished by the latter of those two bodies. He should, however, recommend the hon. and learned Gentleman to accede to the proposal that his measure should be referred with the competing scheme to a Select Committee.

MR. BEECROFT also recommended the hon. and learned Gentleman to allow his Bill to be referred to a Select Committee.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he would assent, though reluctantly, to this proposal.

PRESENTED. FIRST READING. (No. 49.)

LORD KINNAIRD, in presenting a Bill making provision for enabling persons engaged in working certain metalliferous mines to do so with greater regard to health and safety, said, that the usual practice was to lay a Bill upon the table without making any statement of its object at that stage, to defer any observations until the Bill came on for second reading; but on this occasion he should pursue a different course, and ask the attention of their Lordships for a few moments while he explained the object of the measure. In the Session of 1860 a Bill was brought before their Lordships for the regulation and inspection of mines, which gave rise to some discussion. During the progress of the Bill in the other House all reference to metalliferous mines and iron stone mines not in coal measures was excluded, but a pledge was given by the Government that an inquiry should be instituted into the state of those mines. In 1862 that pledge was redeemed, and a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire and to report as to the health and safety of the persons employed in lead, tin, copper, and iron-stone mines not in the coal measures. He had the honour of being Chairman of that Commission, which devoted two years to a very searching and laborious inquiry into the condition of the miners working in mines of that description; and the result was that at the end of last Session a Report, agreed to unanimously by the Commissioners, was presented to Parliament. The inquiry brought out a very fearful state of mortality amongst the metalliferous miners. On comparing the mortality of miners with that of other classes in the same district, they found that between the ages of thirty-five and fifty-five there were double the number of deaths among the miners. They also ascertained that this did not arise from the immediate effect of working underground, because on comparing the Returns of the Registrar General of the deaths in the colliery districts in the north of England they found that the colliers in those districts were more healthy and longlived, notwithstanding the numerous accidents that occurred, than any other class of workmen in the country. It was true that the colliers were somewhat better fed than the metal miners; but it was clearly proved that the metal miners were suffering from something especial in connection with their employment; and it was also clearly proved that the difference was owing to the better system of ventilation which was in practice in the collieries. In the collieries it was absolutely necessary that there should be a perfect system of ventilation, or explosions would take place; but in the metal mines there was no danger of explosion, and consequently ventilation was much neglected. The Commissioners employed scientific men to examine the air in the mines; they obtained upwards of 300 specimens of air, and had them submitted to the tests of science, and the result was that a large proportion of the air in these mines was found to be totally unfit for men to work in.

The Commissioners also had many of the miners examined by medical men, who all agreed in saying that this fearful state of disease and mortality was principally owing to the want of ventilation. It might have been expected that the men employed in these mines would be strong and muscular; on the contrary, the miners were found to be pale and emaciated, few reaching middle age without showing symptoms of disease. It was a common expression that a man of fifty was an old man for a miner. There were other causes also which tended to produce this melancholy state of things. In collieries the men on returning from work were lifted by a hoist, but the metal miners had to climb 1,200 or 1,600 feet after the fatigues of an exhausting labour. When they got to the top they were in a state of such exhaustion and profuse perspiration that they easily took cold, and having no proper place in which to change their clothes, much sickness and many deaths were occasioned. The miners themselves gave up all hope of being cured, and no provision was made for any who were out of work owing to sickness. Certain deductions were made from their wages as an assurance against accidents and to obtain the services of a doctor, but no benefit society would admit miners, no provision was made for them when off work, and they had no resource but to fall back upon the poor rates. The Commissioners did not think it desirable to point out how these evils were to be remedied, but the necessity for legislation was clearly established. It was, he admitted, a difficult subject to deal with, but having given much attention to it, and having lived among the miners for two months, during which time, as well as during the entire period of the existence of the Commission, he was constantly underground, he was prepared to show that the evils under which these men laboured might be remedied. Such a state of things as that which now existed could not be allowed to continue, and he had, therefore, prepared this Bill. But he wished to state that he presented this measure to their Lordships entirely on his own responsibility; he had not submitted it either to the other Commissioners or to the Government, but he trusted it would receive the support, not of Parliament only, but of the mining interest; because many persons connected with mining were totally ignorant, till this inquiry took place, of the state of things existing among the men, and when the inquiry was being made the Commissioners met with most cordial support from those who were interested in mines, who were quite willing to give every information, and who admitted that some legislation was necessary. He would not go at length into the details of the measure, because that would be done at the second reading; but he might state that it was not proposed to imitate the system of inspection instituted under the Mines and Collieries Act, which, he thought, would be objectionable. First, they would not be able to obtain for the salaries that could be given the services of men as Inspectors, possessing the same experience and qualifications as many of those who have now the charge of the mines and upon whom the responsibility should rest; next, because the metalliferous mines were so much scattered that an immense staff of Inspectors would be required; and lastly, because an Inspector resident on the spot would give rise to suspicion. There was great speculation in mines—the prospect of many mines varied from day to day, and if there were any resident Inspector he might be tempted to give information, and if he did not he would be suspected of giving it. But what he proposed was that there should be a Board or Department under the Government, somewhat similar to the Railway Department of the Board of Trade, and there was in the Office of the School of Mines an admirable nucleus for carrying out the provisions of the Bill. He thought this proposition would meet with the concurrence of the mining interest. It was proposed the mines should not be under regulations prescribed by Act of Parliament, on account of the difficulty of making one regulation answer all the mines, but it was proposed that the Board should inquire into the state of the different mines, and have full power to direct what was necessary for the health and safety of the miners. And the Report, he thought, would point out upon what points it was necessary to have regulations. He did not wish to press the measure forward, but to give full time to all who were interested to consider it. The mining interest was a very important interest; it was at this moment suffering under great depression owing to the state of things in the United States; but he ventured to think that if the propositions in the Report were carried out, not only the mining interest would be benefited, but their Lordships would have the satisfaction of feeling that they were promoting the welfare and lengthening the lives of one of the most industrious, well-conducted, moral, and religious classes of Her Majesty's subjects.

REPORT.

Amendments reported (according to Order.)

LORD REDESDALE moved a New Clause—

"Where, in accordance with the Standing Orders of either House of Parliament and of an Act of the Ninth Year of Her present Majesty, Chapter Twenty, a Deposit of Money or Stock is made with respect to the Application to Parliament for an Act, the Money or Stock so deposited shall be a Security for the Payment by the Promoters of the Bill for the Act of all Costs or Sums in respect of Costs, if any, payable by them under this Act; and every Party entitled to receive any Costs or Sum so payable, shall accordingly have a Lien available in Equity for the same on the Money or Stock so deposited, and the Lien shall attach thereon at the Time when the Bill is first referred to a Committee of either House of Parliament; provided that where several Parties have the Lien for an Amount exceeding in the Aggregate the net value of the Money or Stock their respective claims shall proportionately abate."

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY opposed the clause. The money deposited with a private Bill was deposited as a security that the proposed works would be executed, whereas by this clause this money would be made applicable to an entirely different purpose. Besides, to require money to be deposited as security for costs was an entirely novel principle, for it was one not adopted even in the courts of law.

LORD HOUGHTON said, that though the clause in itself might be a good one it was not germane to this Bill, and, if adopted, might imperil the measure. The Bill ought to be kept strictly within its own purposes and for its own objects; and he therefore trusted that if the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees thought the object of his clause a good one, he would find a better opportunity of proposing it.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH did not think his noble Friend's clause was open to the objection which had been made to it by the noble Lord the Postmaster General; because it was well understood that the money deposited with a Private Bill was no real security for the execution of the works.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR thought that the proposition of the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees would not operate at all unreasonably in the cases in which a Bill happened to be rejected; but in the event of a Bill passing, it would certainly be open to objection that a lien on the deposits should be given. He hoped, therefore, the noble Lord would re-consider the matter, and bring up the clause in a modified shape on the third reading.

LORD REDESDALE said, that in accordance with what appeared to be the general wish of the House, he would, on a subsequent stage of the Bill, bring up a clause the operation of which should be limited to those cases in which a Bill was lost.

An Amendment made; Bill to be read 3<sup>a</sup> on Monday next; and to be printed, as amended (No. 51.)

COLONIAL NAVAL DEFENCE BILL.

(No. 39.) THIRD READING.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he thought it would be hardly right to allow the Bill to pass through the House without saying that it would honourably distinguish the administration of his noble Friend at the head of the Admiralty even though he had rendered the country no other service. It was a measure which had for its object to assist our colonies in undertaking their own naval defence, and it was but just to them that we should, while calling upon them to expend considerable sums in providing for their protection in a military point of view, aid them by taking a step which would place them in a position of comparative safety, not merely against the operations of regular warfare, but against the attacks of those privateers which, at the opening of a war, might make an attack upon their commerce.

Bill read 3<sup>a</sup>, with the Amendment, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

THE SAFFRON HILL MURDER—CASE OF PELIZZIONI.—QUESTION.

LORD HOUGHTON, in rising to put a Question to the Government on this subject, said, that he would in a few words explain the object of his inquiry, but it was unnecessary that he should enter at length into the circumstances of the murder which was supposed to have been committed by a foreigner named Serafino Pelizzioni on the person of a man named Harrington. After Pelizzioni had been found guilty of that crime and condemned to death, another Italian named Gregorio Moggi confessed that he was the culprit, and mainly through the agency of a benevolent Italian gentleman, Mr. Negretti, the matter was so strongly pressed on the authorities that Gregorio was put upon his trial for the same offence, and was convicted mainly on his own confession that he had used the knife freely, not of murder, but of manslaughter. A respite was, in consequence, granted to Pelizzioni, who was now lying in prison awaiting his second trial. But it had been stated elsewhere that it was the intention of the Government to place Pelizzioni again on his trial on the charge of having stabbed another person in the same fray, he believed, in which Harrington had met his death. That was a point upon which of course their Lordships could pronounce no opinion; but it had been represented to him that there was a strong feeling among the Italians resident in London that Pelizzioni would be placed at a disadvantage by being in custody, because if he had been at liberty he would have been taken before a magistrate, the witnesses would have been examined afresh, and he would have had an opportunity of cross-examining them. He need not impress upon their Lordships the importance of avoiding in the case of a foreigner any appearance of prejudice or unfairness — more especially after the late very painful correspondence between Mr. Negretti and Sir Richard Mayne, in which the former philanthropically contended for what he believed to be right, and the latter with equal zeal defended the force which he so ably commanded. He would, in conclusion, ask, Whether, if Serafino Pelizzioni, now lying in prison under respite from Her Majesty, be arraigned for a fresh offence, care will be taken that he should have all the Opportunities and Advantages of Defence that he would have had if he were at liberty?

EARL GRANVILLE said, that he did not exactly understand under what disadvantages it was feared that Pelizzioni would labour. No obstacle would be thrown in the way of his defence by the authorities, and every care would be taken that justice should be properly administered.

LORD HOUGHTON explained that the fear was that Pelizzioni might suffer from not having the witnesses examined afresh before a magistrate, and thus being able to cross-examine them, and to place himself in a totally unprejudiced position.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the noble Lord might rest assured that every fair opportunity of defence would be accorded to the prisoner, and he would not suffer from having been convicted upon another charge.

THE EASTER HOLYDAYS.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that it might be convenient to their Lordships to know that on Friday the 7th of April he should move the adjournment of the House till the 27th of that month.

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, till To-morrow,
half past Ten o'clock.

MIDDLESEX INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL.

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 193.

SIR GEORGE GREY moved that Standing Order 193 should be suspended, and that this Bill should be committed to a Select Committee of ten Members, five to be nominated by the House and five by the Committee of Selection. The Bill was a Private Bill to amend a Private Act of Parliament, the object being to place this school under the general provisions of the Reformatory Act. The result would be that the school would be entitled to receive a considerable amount of public money, in which case the usual course was to refer the Bill to a Select Committee of the kind he had proposed.

MR. CAVE said, he thought that the object of the Bill ought to be accomplished, if at all, by means not of private, but of public legislation, applicable all over the country. If the principle were conceded, and schools like these were to receive public grants, the result would be a considerable annual addition to the Estimates.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he desired to point out that inconveniences frequently arose in connection with the way in which his right hon. Friend proposed that this Committee should be appointed. The Members whom the Committee of Selection should nominate would not be obliged to attend, and if the Committee of Selection should happen to select Members to whom it would be inconvenient to attend, the services of the selection would be entirely inoperative. He wished, therefore, to suggest that it would be very desirable if the Members appointed by the Committee of Selection in cases like the present were subjected to the same rules as were applied to Private Bill Committees, on which the attendance of Members was obligatory.

Ordered, That Standing Order 193 be suspended in the case of the said Bill, and that the Bill be committed to a Select Committee of ten Members, five to be nominated by the House, and five by the Committee of Selection:—Five to be the quorum.—(Sir George Grey.)

CASE OF THE LATE MR. DRAKE. QUESTION.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to the report of an inquest held at the Strand Union on the body of Mr. George Drake, from which report it appears that this gentleman, in an apoplectic condition, was taken there by the police, supposed by them to be of unsound mind from drink, and left without any information by what means he came into their hands, and whether he will cause a Communication to be forwarded to the police authorities requiring that, in future, when any sick person, incapable of giving any explanation of his or her condition, be taken to a Union Infirmary, all the facts bearing on the case which the police can furnish should be forwarded in writing with the patient for the guidance and information of the medical officer?

SIR GEORGE GREY, in reply, said, he did not know anything of the case until after he saw the notice of the hon. Gentleman on the paper. It appeared that this person was in a hotel, where he was found in an excited and frantic state. He was taken before a magistrate by the police, whose duty it was to do so. By order of the magistrate he was removed to the workhouse. The policeman who took him, in obedience to the orders of the magistrate, could not state in writing all the circumstances connected with the case, but he stated that he brought him there by order of the magistrate who had all the facts before him when he made the order. He (Sir George Grey) would communicate with the magistrate on the subject, with a view to the object of his hon. Friend.

NAVY CHAPLAINS' QUARTERLY REPORT.—QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY TRACY said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is true that the Chaplains' Quarterly Report has been abolished, and, if so, what has been substituted in lieu?

MR. CHILDERS said, in reply, that he had already stated a few evenings since that the Chaplains' Quarterly Report had been abolished. In its place, full information would be given by means of additional questions in the Inspection sheets, with respect to the performance of Divine Service on board ships, the administration of the Holy Communion, the attendances at school, visits to the sick; or to other ships not having chaplains. These Inspections averaged about twice a year. An annual Return, besides, was now called for with respect to the educational state of the whole of the crews in the navy, and their religious denominations.

PUBLIC HOUSE CLOSING ACT (1864) AMENDMENT BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. COX said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, having regard to some observations made by the right hon. Baronet in reply to a deputation which had waited on him yesterday with reference to the Bill for the amendment of the Public House Closing Act, he was prepared to state what course the Government intend to take with regard to the measure?

SIR GEORGE GREY, in reply, said, he had received two or three deputations with regard to the Bill from persons whose representations were entitled to consideration; and if it were possible, without infringing on the principle of the Bill, the Government would endeavour to exempt certain houses from the operation of the Bill during certain hours. At all events, he would consider what could be done in the matter.

MR. COX said, that being the case, he would postpone the second reading of the Bill to that day week.

QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, seeing the difficulty of arranging the matter in dispute between the ironmasters and their men in respect to the Lock-out, he wished to know, Whether the hon. Member for Rye (Mr. Mackinnon) intends to introduce his Bill for the establishment of Courts of Conciliation?

MR. MACKINNON was understood to say that it was not his intention to introduce such a measure, for the present, at all events.

COURTS OF JUSTICE CONCENTRATION

(SITE) (re-committed) BILL—[BILL 71.]

COMMITTEE. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [23rd March], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL presented a Petition from the Treasurer of Lincoln's Inn, signed by him on behalf of himself and the other Masters of the Bench of the Society. The Petition stated that in former Sessions of Parliament similar Bills had been introduced; that on those occasions the Benchers of Lincoln's Inn had petitioned against them, under the belief that the concentration might be attained by the Courts of Equity being allowed to remain in Lincoln's Inn, the Courts of Law being provided in the neighbourhood; but that during the present Session, the Petitioners, being unwilling to oppose the further progress of the measure, had determined to withdraw all further opposition, and in so withholding their opposition were influenced mainly by the consideration that the northern side of the proposed building was to be in close proximity to Lincoln's Inn, and that the portion which was to be appropriated to the Courts of Equity being nearest to Lincoln's Inn was calculated to obviate the inconvenience of the removal of the courts from Lincoln's Inn. The Petitioners went on to state that they had recently learnt that the question was being agitated for the abandonment of that site; and they expressed their opinion that if a site were to be selected at a distance from Lincoln's Inn, the members of that Society who were practitioners in the Equity Courts would be greatly inconvenienced. They prayed, therefore, that if the Courts of Law and Equity were to be concentrated, no change would be made in the Carey Street site.

MR. LYGON said, he did not know whether the Government were prepared to give effect to what appeared to be the general feeling of the House when this matter was last before them; but, in order to raise the question, he meant to conclude by moving, as an Amendment to the Motion for the Speaker leaving the Chair, that the Bill be re-committed to the former Committee, and that it be an Instruction to such Committee to inquire into the capabilities of the Thames Embankment as a site for the proposed building. Notwithstanding the attention devoted to this measure in former inquiries, no opportunity had yet been afforded for considering whether the Thames Embankment would or would not present the proper site for the concentration of the new courts of justice. Only two sites had hitherto been considered. First, the Carey Street site, now adopted by Her Majesty's Government, and secondly, the only alternative site—a portion of Lincoln's Inn Fields—coupled with the offer on the part of those who possessed the freehold of Lincoln's Inn to make a very considerable metropolitan improvement. The latter proposition was rejected, and the Carey Street site approved of. But he maintained that the fact of the Carey Street site being approved of furnished no reason whatever why that House should be debarred from considering the large and important question of the site which was opened by the Embankment of the Thames. The extent of the site proposed to be taken in Carey Street the House was already familiar with. He would not, therefore, describe it beyond pointing out some material facts that would assist the House in the consideration of the question. The cost of the Carey Street site was estimated in 1861 to cost £678,000, and he apprehended that its value had not in any degree diminished since then. He did not find that the Select Committee to which that Bill had been referred had given any precise Estimate of the expenditure, but he would assume that the Estimate of 1861—namely, £678,000—was accurate, but it should be remembered that that was the cost of the site alone. The next point to be considered was whether that site would be sufficient. Now, the evidence of Mr. Pennethorne, the architect of the Board of Works, who was called as a witness by the promoters of the Bill, showed that several very important courts remained unprovided for by the measure. Mr. Pennethorne was asked whether he proposed to bring to that concentrated site the Central Criminal Court, and his reply was “No.” He was subsequently asked whether the Bankruptcy Court was included in the list of courts for which provision was made, and he answered that it was not. The same witness also admitted that there was no provision in the plan for a court in which all the twelve Judges should assemble, similar to the present Exchequer Chamber. It might, however, be thought that the Carey Street site was so ample that accommodation might be found for those courts; but Mr. Pennethorne admitted that his plan was so made as to occupy the whole available space, and that if another Judge were appointed equivalent in rank to a Vice Chancellor, and as Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, accommodation could only be found for him by removing some of the offices upstairs. Thus, then, upon the showing of the witnesses called in support of the Bill, after a very large expenditure of money, several large and important courts would still be left wholly unprovided for. Now, since the Commission had sat, and since the Committee of 1861 examined this subject, another site had been opened which at all events deserved consideration before they incurred an enormous outlay upon the purchase of ground and the erection of buildings which would be inadequate for their purpose. At any rate, the suggestion deserved careful consideration. But, further, the Carey Street site would be difficult of access. The Strand was at present choked up with traffic, and although it might be said that the Thames Embankment would relieve the Strand, yet they knew that the more facilities were offered for the traffic of the metropolis the more that traffic was found to develop itself. He was a bold man, therefore, who believed that the Strand would be materially relieved by the Thames Embankment. The traffic along the New Road had in no degree been diminished in consequence of the opening of the Metropolitan Railway. It was possible, no doubt, to provide large open spaces in front of the new concentrated courts, and to widen the Strand in that part; but by doing so they would diminish pro tanto the space at their command for the new buildings. What had they at the Thames Embankment? They had the most perfect means of access on all sides. Some persons thought an excellent site would be available in the immediate neighbourhood of Westminster Bridge; others preferred the neighbourhood of Fife House, where a very large tract of land would remain at the disposal of the public. Of course, it was too late at the present moment to take any active measures to carry out either of these proposals; but when they were going to make a building that was to last for all time, and when they were about to lay out a very large sum of money, they ought to take care that in the choice of a site they did not perpetrate a blunder which would be a disgrace to the country for ages. Happily, they were living in times of peace, when there was no excitement connected with the administration of the law; but times might come when they could easily conceive it would be of great importance that there should be ready and easy access to the Courts of Justice. Such access, he thought, could not be had if the Carey Street site were selected. He begged to move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be re-committed to the former Committee, and that they be instructed to inquire into the capabilities of the Thames Embankment as a site for the proposed buildings.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY, in seconding the Amendment, said, he was well aware that in the course proposed by the hon. Member for Worcestershire they were opposing the opinion of the lawyers; but the question really was whether when they were going to spend a large sum of money in the erection of a Palace of Justice they should not select the best available site for the purpose. The site afforded by the Thames Embankment was not in existence and could not be taken into consideration when the Bill was originally before the Committee. If there was room enough on the Thames Embankment nothing could be finer than the façade of such a building. The access to the Carey Street site was one of its great difficulties—nothing could be better than the access to the Thames Embankment. The question was, after all, one of finance; and looking at the question in a financial point of view the expense of the Thames Embankment site might be fatal to its selection; but that was a mere assertion, and he had been told on the other hand that it would be the least expensive of all. A portion of the property of the Duke of Norfolk might be taken, which consisted not of first-class houses, and a most magnificent site might thus be obtained. It had been said elsewhere that the Suitors' Fund would not be available if the site selected were the Thames Embankment; but he could not understand that objection. Either they had power over the Suitors' Fund, or they had not. The question could not depend on the choice of any particular locality. This was one of those questions on which he thought they could not have too much inquiry. He believed they would only be doing justice to the future as well as to the present, by having this matter further inquired into.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be re-committed to the former Committee, and that they be instructed to inquire into the capabilities of the Thames Embankment as a site for the proposed buildings,"—(Mr. Lygon,) —instead thereof.

Motion made and Question proposed, that the words proposed to be left out, stand part of the Question.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: I believe I express the opinion of the great mass of hon. Members present, as well as my own, when I say that I trust the Government will not accede to this Amendment. I have not the least doubt that it has been brought forward in an earnest desire on the part of my hon. Friend that every consideration should be given before so important a step is taken as the selection of a site for this great building. But the House must observe that to carry this Amendment will be equivalent to the defeat of this measure for the present Session: and in a future Session no one can venture to foretell what may happen. But even suppose at this period next year we may get to this stage, who is to say whether hon. Members may not get up and propose inquiring into a third site, different from Carey Street and the Thames Embankment, which no one thought of in 1865? We shall then be in the same position as we are now. I confess I was anxious to hear from the two hon. Gentlemen who supported this Motion what are the reasons of greater convenience to the public on which the proposal of the Thames Embankment site rests. I did not hear them. No doubt the hon. Baronet (Sir John Shelley) says it would be a fine thing to have the ornamental façade of the Palace of Justice fronting the river. That may be; but the great consideration which puts Parliament in motion is the great inconvenience of the present arrangements; and the question is, which site will be most suitable for the purpose. Can there be a doubt as to what will be most convenient to the public? The hon. Baronet talks of lawyers; but who are the lawyers on this question? They are the great body of solicitors of London, who transact not only the legal business of London, but the legal business of the whole kingdom; and on what ground do they prefer the Carey Street site? Because on all sides in the immediate neighbourhood north of that locality they have their offices, and they could not get the same accommodation elsewhere—therefore, they say, give us some central Courts of Justice, which we can get at without going very far from our own offices, for our time is that of our clients. Then, on the south side of the Carey Street site is the Temple, where the barristers say the very same thing. Carey Street, then, stands exactly in the centre of these two localities, and would obviously be most suitable as a site for the proposed Courts. I will not enter into the question of finance; but I know of no obstacle on that score to the Carey Street site. As regards the extent of ground, indeed, it is said that Mr. Pennethorne in his examination says the arrangement does not include the Central Criminal Court in this Palace of Justice. Now I, for one, am very glad to hear it. I hope there will be no Criminal Courts there. We all know, if there was no other objection, there is the fatal one that when you get Criminal Courts you must have the gaols in immediate connection with them. To bring prisoners to the centre, where the civil business of the country is transacted, would, I think, be extremely inconvenient, it would be unsuitable to them, and it would disturb the conduct of the other business. Then, as to the Exchequer Chamber, Mr. Pennethorne says no arrangement has been made for the twelve Judges meeting in the Exchequer Chamber. Now, any one at all conversant with the detailed arrangements of the Exchequer Chamber knows that it is composed of the Justices of any two of the three superior Courts of Common Law, and when the time for their sitting comes—on very few days in the year—there must of necessity be a cessation of the business of the two Justices' own Courts, either of which would be available, pro hac vice, for the Exchequer Chamber. So, also, it is said, there is no arrangement for the Bankruptcy Court. Now the registrars and accountants being connected with the mere administrative and financial details of bankruptcy, I think their presence would be unsuitable in the Palace of Justice; but if any judicial business is to be transacted by a Judge in bankruptcy or by a Judge of appeal, accommodation would easily be found for business of that kind. It only remains that I observe upon what has been said with reference to access. I confess I am not moved by the objections arising from the crowding of the Strand; because anyone who knows the sort of people who go to Courts of Justice know perfectly well that there is very little crowding of carriages about them. I do not think the erection of the new Courts will cause any great addition to the traffic of the Strand; but if it should prove otherwise it must be remembered that one of the great advantages of the Carey Street site is that you have two parallel lines of access, one at the north and the other at the south; and if it should appear that there is not width enough for the Strand and Carey Street, it would be very easy, in pulling down the houses in Carey Street, to add a few feet to the width of the roadway, and thus give as much access as could be required. I believe the site chosen is the best that could be selected, and in saying this I am satisfied I speak the opinion of all those engaged in legal pursuits. I do not think a single valid objection has been urged against it. As to the Thames Embankment, you might, perhaps, erect a very imposing building there; but you would sacrifice what is the first object which we should have in view—namely, the convenience of the public and all those engaged in legal pursuits.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he was afraid the House was going to commit another great blunder in erecting a building, at an immense expense, upon a site where a sufficient access could not be provided, and where the building could not be seen; whereas 100 yards further towards the south the finest situation in London could be obtained, and where now a great public work was being carried on. He had not been convinced, by all the high legal authorities, as to the propriety of the Carey Street site. So many errors had been committed with reference to our public buildings—and every year added to their number—that he believed any Englishman who had travelled through Europe was justified in giving an opinion upon this subject. In other countries we found utility and beauty combined, and the public buildings placed in a fine situation; but here it was the direct contrary—they were going to erect a Palace of Justice which would be inaccessible to the public, and where it could not be seen—while on the Thames Embankment they had a most accessible site, and where any beautiful building could be seen and admired. All our public buildings were a reproach to us in Europe, and he hoped the House would not allow the Government to add to our defects in that respect. He could not put the slightest confidence in the recommendations of the Committee, the constitution of which was very unsatisfactory. It was composed of a Minister of Works, an ex-Minister of Works and one other Member, with three Members added by the Committee of Selection, but the Report was arrived at without any one of the three independent Members being present. On these grounds he should deem it his duty to support the Amendment.

MR. MALINS said, he considered the Carey Street site to be the best that could be selected, and he earnestly hoped that the Government would not accede to the Motion. It was impossible to disguise from themselves that the result of that Motion, if adopted, would be to defeat the scheme altogether. A plan which had met the universal approbation of the profession of the law had at last been arrived at, and he therefore hoped it would meet with no serious opposition. Carey Street was the site universally approved of by the profession, from its being the centre of the legal world. It was surrounded on the north, south, east, and west by the chambers of the lawyers, and that which would be convenient to the lawyers would be so to their clients, who were the public at large. Should they sacrifice to architectural beauty the convenience of the public and all the other objects which they desired to attain? Mr. Pennethorne's evidence had not been justly dealt with by some Members of the House. No plans had been prepared, it being the intention of the Government to appoint a Commission for that purpose; and the great question, therefore, before the Committee was as to whether the Carey Street site was of sufficient area. It had been abundantly proved that  $7\frac{1}{2}$  acres, which the Carey Street site contained, would be abundant for all the accommodation required. The members of the legal profession would rather that the whole scheme were abandoned than that the new law courts should be erected on the Thames Embankment. The approaches obtainable for the Carey Street site would be amply sufficient, because all those who were in the habit of attending at Lincoln's Inn knew that there were very few carriages driving along the approaches during the day, and a comparatively small number of people attended the courts. He contended that the cost of the site on the Thames Embankment would be as great as that at Carey Street, as it would be necessary to purchase property in Essex Street. He did not consider that the hon. Members who had moved and seconded the Amendment were so competent to judge of this matter as the 10,000 legal practitioners who were unanimous in favour of the Carey Street site.

MR. COWPER said, that he had never heard weaker arguments urged in opposition to a Bill than those of the Mover and Seconder of this Amendment. He maintained that an unfair construction had been put upon Mr. Pennethorne's evidence. From the year 1860, every one appeared to agree that  $7\frac{1}{2}$  acres would be amply sufficient for the new Law Courts, and in that opinion Mr. Pennethorne himself concurred. He distinctly stated when called before the Committee that the site was sufficient. But supposing for a moment that the Courts of Law could not be properly accommodated on the ground floor, nothing could be easier than to increase the accommodation by placing some of the courts on the first floor. He believed that even without this increase, which could be easily made,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  acres would be found sufficient for building, not only for the present but also for future requirements. The site itself was also not limited, because additional property in the immediate neighbourhood could easily be purchased. His hon. Friend behind (Mr. Henry Seymour) had stated that the Bill ought to be re-committed, because it had been considered by a Committee consisting of only three Gentlemen; but that was the number of the Committees on unopposed Bills, among which this measure might practically be included. It was practically an unopposed Bill. A large number of petitions were presented in its favour, and only three against, and those referred not to its principle but merely required alterations in the clauses. It could not be urged that the Members of the Committee were all selected from one side, for one of the Members was the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Selwyn). Therefore, there was not the slightest ground for re-committing the Bill, because of the constitution of the Committee. If, however, the object were to render this great building subservient to the embellishment of London, it was an object with which he sympathized. From its natural features, the fine buildings about it, and the proximity of the river, the Embankment would be the finest feature of the metropolis. Having introduced the Embankment Bill, he naturally felt desirous that it should be adorned. After full reflection, however, he had come reluctantly to the conviction that it would be totally impossible to place the Courts of Justice upon the Embankment. If erected between Somerset House and the Temple the new courts could not be built in advance of their line of frontage, because if such a course were adopted the appearance of Somerset House and the Temple would be injured. They would, therefore, have to be erected upon that portion of the Strand between Somerset House and the Temple, on which there stood at this moment the best houses to be found in that part of the town. By choosing this site a great sacrifice both of convenience and money would be incurred simply for the purpose of procuring additional beauty and ornament. Although, therefore, having had a great share in forming the Embankment, and being naturally desirous of seeing it lined by fine buildings, he had been obliged to come to the conclusion that the Palace of Justice ought not to be erected there. It was obvious that by adopting this site the chief purpose for which it was proposed to incur this expenditure would be frustrated. The concentration, which they so much desired, could only be obtained by the selection of a site in the immediate neighbourhood of the Inns of Court, the chambers of counsel, and the offices of solicitors. As all the

Inns of Court, with the exception of the Temple, were situate on the north of the Strand, the access to the new courts, if erected between Somerset House and the Temple, would be extremely inconvenient for Gray's Inn and Lincoln's Inn. Barristers from the latter Inn especially would have to make their way through the tangled maze of courts and alleys which by the present Bill were to be swept away to make room for these new courts. The inconvenience consequent upon the distance from the chambers of counsel would fall upon the suitors, whose convenience would be best consulted by a concentration, which would enable them at any moment to procure, if they desired it, the services of those learned gentlemen. The chief difference, however, between the two sites, was one of cost. The Carey Street site was at present occupied by wretched and unhealthy buildings, while that on the south side of the Strand would, from the very nature of the buildings which covered it, be extremely expensive. A competent authority had estimated the compensation in the latter case at about double what would be required in the case of Carey Street. This was too great a price to pay merely for embellishment, and he thought it was not a proposition which could be entertained. The only result, too, of the Embankment site being selected in preference to that in Carey Street, would be the postponement of the erection of these courts. If the Bill were defeated, in the hope of procuring a better site, a vexatious delay would be occasioned, which would continue the present waste of time, and the separation of the Courts, which nearly the whole profession concurred in regretting.

Mr. ARTHUR MILLS said, this question had been viewed in two lights, the architectural and philanthropic. It was said the Carey Street site, as proposed in this Bill, would dispossess a number of poor people. That point had been got rid of, as it was shown that the removal of these houses would be a benefit to the poor people themselves. As to the architectural view, he thought the House ought not to allow itself to be influenced by that, since in very many cases where it had been considered the result had been far from satisfactory. The simple question for the House was whether this site was the most convenient. He thought it was, and that the object of the Amendment was simply to defeat the Bill altogether.

Mr. CRAWFORD wished to point out

one feature connected with the Thames Embankment which had not been noticed. One of the arguments in favour of selecting that site for the Courts of Justice was its presumed cheapness; but it should be remembered that the Courts of Justice were for the benefit of the whole nation, while the cost of constructing the Thames Embankment was defrayed by the ratepayers of the metropolis. It would not be fair to deprive the ratepayers of the improved value of the property which their outlay had created. He might also observe that the site on the Thames Embankment would be as inconvenient to the great body of solicitors whose offices were in the City, as the present arrangement of the courts sitting at Westminster.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3. (Description of Purposes of Act.)

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE expressed a hope that care would be taken to acquire sufficient land to insure proper access to the new courts, and that there would not be the same necessity as had arisen in the case of the new Foreign Office of purchasing additional land to provide proper approaches. It was bad policy, first, by the outlay of public money to increase fourfold the value of surrounding property, and then to purchase at that enhanced value.

Mr. COWPER assured the right hon. Gentleman that every care would be taken to make proper approaches, and he thought he might venture to state that there would be good access to the new courts, on all sides of the building.

COURT OF CHANCERY (IRELAND) BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in moving that the House should go into Committee on the Bill, said, it had originated in the Report of the Commission appointed in 1862 to consider the measures which should be taken for the purpose of removing, as far as might be, the differences in the administration of justice in the courts of equity and of common law in England and in Ireland. This Bill dealt only with jurisdiction in equity; the other branch of the subject remained to be dealt with hereafter. As to the principle of the measure, it was one which would, he thought, excite no difference of opinion, for it rested on the desirability of assimilating as far as possible equity procedure in Ireland to the procedure of England. Until 1850 there was substantially but one system in operation in the courts of equity on both sides of the Channel. In that year a measure was introduced for the improvement of Chancery procedure in Ireland. It was not founded upon any inquiry by Commissioners, and the principal change introduced was that the old mode of commencing and prosecuting suits by regular pleadings and issues joined was put an end to and procedure by petition substituted. It was provided that whoever desired to prefer any claim to relief in the Irish Court of Chancery might present a petition in which he stated his case, and verified that petition in a certain sense by a short affidavit, saying that everything he asserted was true to his knowledge or belief. Thus the suit was launched; and if the petition so verified was not met by counter allegations on oath, it was held that the defendant admitted everything which was stated by the plaintiff. The burden of proof being thus shifted and thrown on the defendant, he told his own story, traversed the case of the petitioner, and his statement was held to be true until contradicted on oath. But then the plaintiff was again at liberty to traverse the statements of the defendants. The war of affidavits was thus prolonged indefinitely; there was no regular pleading; the parties might travel into all sorts of irrelevant matter; and great inconvenience resulted. The working of the whole system was very graphically described by Mr. Smith, a witness who gave answers to the questions circulated by the late Commission, as "a sort of competitive examination in swearing, little calculated to subserve the cause of truth or the interests of justice." In the very next year, 1851, a Commission was appointed, consisting of very eminent persons in the law, with others, to inquire into the system of Chancery jurisprudence and procedure in England. They reconsidered the whole subject and did not think fit to adopt the new Irish system, but recommended extensive reforms in the old mode of pleading, cutting off excesses and superfluities and the abuses to which that system was liable. Their recommendations were afterwards embodied in two Acts of Parliament. One abolished the Masters in Chancery and substituted a system under which it was intended that the Judges, with the assistance of Chief Clerks, should work out their own decrees, under their own superintendence, in their own chambers. The other carried into effect all the improvements recommended in the then existing procedure. Besides introducing the peculiar procedure he had described, the Irish Act of 1850 had provided for the immediate reference to the Masters in substance of the entire conduct of a large variety of very important suits. Thus there grew up an original jurisdiction exercised in their chambers in the absence of the public and even of the profession beyond those immediately engaged in the case, and important questions of law were there determined. Personally the Masters exercised this jurisdiction very creditably; but their decisions were not reported, were frequently inconsistent, and had little authority. In England the working of the Masters' offices was in many respects similar; but, as he had said, the Chancery Amendment Acts abolished them, transferring their business to the Judges, aided by the Chief Clerks, but maintaining, with the necessary reforms, the old system of procedure. Of course every human system had its imperfections, and even systems good in themselves would in their working not always be found equally satisfactory. On the whole, however, the working of the system introduced by these Acts of Parliament in England had been answerable to the expectations of those who framed them. Under these circumstances a Commission was appointed in 1862 to inquire what ought to be done with a view to get rid of the differences in the modes of administering the law in the two countries. That Commission consisted not, indeed, of all the most eminent men in the country, for his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Whiteside) was not a Member of it. He wished that his right hon. Friend had been a Member of the Commission, for then it was probable that there might have been greater unanimity than was likely on this occasion. Having regard, however, to the necessity of limiting the number, and of having some Members from each country, representing both common law and equity, it would have been difficult to appoint a Commission likely to make a more satisfactory Report on the subject referred to them. The Commission consisted of the Master of the Rolls (Sir John Romilly), the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns), the ex-Lord Chancellors of Ireland, Napier and Blackburn, Chief Justice Monahan, Justice O'Hagan, then Attorney General for Ireland, and others. That Commission recommended the measure which the Government in substance had introduced. They took a good deal of evidence, particularly from Ireland, and they collected the opinions of many eminent persons who had considerable knowledge and experience of the subject. The result was, that there was a general agreement of opinion as to the propriety of assimilating the practice and procedure of the two countries, and of taking the English practice as the basis of that assimilation. One reason assigned for making that recommendation was, that both countries would be able to take advantage of the body of decisions which might be given in one country or the other. Again, appeals from the Irish Court of Chancery were heard in the House of Lords, and assimilation of the two systems would be a great advantage, because, as long as they were different, wherever there might be a competition between the English and Irish systems in points which ought to be substantially governed by the same principles, a Court of Appeal sitting in England would have a tendency to decide in conformity with the system with which it was most intimate. It was the general opinion among the witnesses that, on the whole, they would prefer adopting the English system; and there was also a great preponderance of opinion in favour of abolishing the Masters and allowing each Judge to work out his own decisions in his own chambers. With regard to procedure there was some difference of opinion; but the tendency was in favour of the English system—at least to the extent that was recommended by the Commission. The Incorporated Law Society had petitioned in favour of the Bill. The usual course when Government had taken charge of a subject of this kind and had introduced a measure was, that any one who differed from their views in matters of detail should wait till the Bill got into Committee, and then propose Amendments. The right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Whiteside), however, had taken the unusual course of introducing a rival measure of his own, or rather two measures. He was happy, however, to say that, except upon points of detail, there was little difference between him and the right hon. and learned Gentleman—save that the right hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to do in two Bills what the Government proposed to do in one. The Government did not think it necessary, like the right hon. Gentleman, to propose the appointment of two Vice Chancellors. They believed that one, at a salary of £4,000 a year, would be sufficient. The salaries which the right hon. and learned Gentleman contemplated were not mentioned in his Bill, so that he was unable to give a comparative view of the expense of the two measures. The proposition of the Government was to create one office of Vice Chancellor, at a salary of £4,000 a year; a Chief Clerk to the Vice Chancellor, and also a Chief Clerk to the Master of the Rolls, commencing in each case at salaries of £800 a year, and rising by a graduated scale to £1,000. The total cost, therefore, would be, according to circumstances, £5,800 or £6,000 a year. Some further officers would be requisite; among them one of assistant registrar and four junior clerks, entailing an outlay of somewhat exceeding £2,000; but as these positions were to be filled by existing public servants the extra charge under this head to the public would only be about £200. In case circumstances should render it absolutely necessary, power was taken in the Bill still further to increase the machinery of the Irish Equity Courts to the extent of a further amount of £4,500 annually; that, however, would be the maximum of expenditure, and it was not at all likely that it would be reached. On the other hand, the total saving that would ultimately be effected under the Bill, and which would have to be set off against this new expenditure, exceeded £10,300 annually; but, of course, the whole of this would not be realized till the claims of the present holders of office were satisfied or extinguished. The House would probably be of opinion that two Vice Chancellors were not necessary; but in any event they would, he trusted, regard as objectionable the proposal to determine by the Bill the gentlemen who ought to be appointed. The right hon. Gentleman asked them to declare that one of the Vice Chancellors should be offered in the first instance to the senior Judge of the Landed Estates Court; in case of his refusal, to the second Judge, and in like manner to the third Judge. The second Vice Chancellorship, according to his scheme, was to be tendered first for the acceptance of the senior Master in Chancery, and so on in rotation. This method of limiting the pleasure of the Crown, acting on the opinion of its responsible advisers, was highly objectionable, as well as novel in principle. The Judges of the Landed Estates Court, he was prepared to admit, were gentlemen of the highest respectability and worth, who had discharged the duties of their office in a manner deserving the highest praise. To the Masters in Chancery also he wished to allude with the fullest acknowledgment of the services they had rendered. But was it reasonable, was it wise, was it in accordance with the experience and judgment of his right hon. Friend, to ask the House blindfold to adopt a rule which might prevent them getting the men best qualified for the positions to be filled? The House must see at once that if particular persons were brought by name under the notice of the House, personal discussions of the most invidious character might be excited, and therefore he hoped this proposition of the right hon. and learned Gentleman would not find favour. The next point of difference was as to the Chief Clerks. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said, "Do what you will, at all events avoid the office of Chief Clerk," and he appeared to attach great importance to that suggestion. The first question that arose upon that point was—did the hon. Gentleman avoid that office in his Bill? He (the Attorney General) undoubtedly proposed to adopt the nomenclature of the English Court of Chancery in cases where the offices were practically similar. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said, in his Bill, that it should be lawful for the Lord Chancellor to attach to each Judge an officer, to be called an Examiner. But that officer would, in point of fact, be a Chief Clerk, for he would have not only to assist in examining titles, but he would have to assist the Judge in the general business of the Court. He defied the right hon. Gentleman to show any practical distinction between the office he proposed to create and that of a Chief Clerk in the English Court of Chancery. What, therefore, could be gained by a simple change of name when the office was the same to all intents and purposes? The duty of a Chief Clerk was to meet the parties in a cause, and to go through the figures and papers and all matters of detail with them; they having a right, whenever a matter of controversy arose upon questions of fact or law, to go before the Judge, and to have the advantage of his personal judgment on the subject in dispute. Some people in Ireland, including many gentlemen of eminence, apparently thought it would be preferable for the Judge to give his personal attention to every matter of detail and account in every cause which came before him; but in that case the Court would be completely blocked up, and its business would be practically put an end to. The right hon. and learned Gentleman further said that the Examiner might or might not be a barrister; but he (the Attorney General) thought there were many sound reasons for giving the appointment exclusively to members of the other branch of the profession. In the first place, the Judge would be strictly responsible for what was done under his directions; secondly, there would be greater security for that deference and feeling of subordination towards the Judge which, in the relation in which he would stand towards such an officer, was indispensable, if the officer were not taken from the same ranks to which the Judge himself, while at the bar, had belonged; thirdly, because it was only fair, that there should be some offices of importance, to which solicitors should have a preferable claim; and lastly, to avoid the expense of unnecessary attendances of counsel, who would attend before a barrister, but would not before a solicitor. He believed it would be found in the end that the right hon. and learned Gentleman and himself differed more in name than in substance with regard to this office.

Coming to the other points of the Bill, he was very much gratified at being able to state that the remaining differences between himself and the right hon. and learned Gentleman really came within a small compass, although he did not by any means wish it to be inferred that the matters upon which they disagreed were without importance. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, with regard to the points affecting the procedure of the court, had, in the main, followed the opinion of a most eminent legal personage, whose judicial learning and acumen were universally respected—he meant the Master of the Rolls in Ireland. That learned Judge had published a pamphlet expressive of his views, and containing certain reasons for preferring, in several points, the practice of the Irish Court of Chancery to that of England. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had in a great measure reproduced those opinions in his Bill; but he (the Attorney General) could not agree with all the provisions therein sought to be introduced in accordance with the existing Irish system. By the measure of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, the plaintiff in Chancery would be permitted, by a verifying affidavit, to swear that everything contained in his Bill before the Court which related to his own knowledge was true, and that what was not within his knowledge he believed to be true. The onus probandi was then to be thrown on the defendant. This verifying affidavit was perfectly worthless, and he was afraid that the mere requirement of it would operate as a premium on loose swearing. They would never keep a man out of Chancery by requiring him to file an affidavit of this kind. This was not his own view merely—he found that some of the most eminent men at the Irish Bar held the same opinion. Mr. Warren stated that the affidavit had come to be considered little more than a matter of form, and it was very embarrassing in the future prosecution of the suit. The House would see how it was embarrassing. Many a man, an honest suitor, did not know how to shape his case when he went into Court. It was not until the case had been sifted, until the suitor got a discovery from his adversary and the documents, that he knew exactly how the case stood. A man should not be called upon to swear in that kind of way. When the proper time came, let him give his evidence upon oath of that only which he knew. Mr. Smith took the same view of the matter. He said that the system led to competitive swearing little calculated to serve the cause of truth and justice. But the great advantage which was supposed to be derived from it was more objectionable still. It seemed to him the ne plus ultra of injustice that such an affidavit should invert the onus

probandi. A man put an affidavit upon the file in the common form. He might know nothing at all, or certainly not a great deal, of the facts; his statement of his belief as to things which he did not know would not be received as evidence, for a moment, in any court of justice; he could not even be asked a question about it, when examined in chief, in the witness-box; and yet, forsooth, he was in this way to throw the burden of proof upon his opponent. That was the system which his right hon. Friend wished to preserve. Why should that be allowed in Chancery which was permitted nowhere else? By another provision in the right hon. Gentleman's Bill, interrogatories could not be filed by the plaintiff without the special leave of the Court. Now, he had always thought that one of the principal objects of a Bill in equity was discovery, and that a party in a suit had a right to sift the conscience of his adversary, and get from him all the facts within his knowledge. His right hon. and learned Friend made it another great point in favour of his own Bill that it abolished demurrers altogether. The Bill of the Government abolished all demurrers except those for want of equity and for multifariousness. Thus they would get rid of merely formal demurrers, and retain demurrers of substance. There were cases in which great expense and vexation were avoided to litigants by means of demurrers. In many instances the question at issue turned upon a point of construction or a question of right under an instrument, or some other matter equally clear upon the pleadings, where the grossest injustice might be done by allowing a man to drag his adversary through a series of interrogatories and answers when it was plain, upon his own showing, that he had no right to come into court at all. Such cases were most properly met, and could only be met by demurrers for want of equity or for multifariousness. It seemed, also, that in Ireland those gentlemen whose minds had been led by their experience to conceive a just and righteous horror of the working of cause petitions in that country, were alarmed lest they should be retaining or bringing back the evils of that system if the English practice of moving for a decree were introduced. Every one acquainted with the operation of the practice of moving for decrees in England would say that that was an idle alarm. That practice was found to be very salutary and beneficial in England, and to be unattended by any of the evils which had arisen from the Irish cause petitions; and there was no reason to apprehend any mischievous consequences from its introduction into Ireland.

Another provision of the measure proposed by the Government was that it should not be competent for any defendant in any suit commenced by Bill to take any objection for want of parties in any case to which certain rules, specified in Clause 68, should extend. In Ireland there was no rule as to want of parties which could be called settled or inflexible; but if at any stage of the case, even at the final hearing, the court discovered that there were persons absent from the record whose interests were concerned, and whom it was important to find, the court might make an order nisi to bind those persons unless they showed cause to the contrary. That, he thought, was carrying matters to an inconvenient and dangerous extent. There remained one other subject on which, when they got into Committee, he should be disposed to listen without prejudice to any argument from his right hon. and learned Friend. He alluded to vivâ voce examinations. That was one of the most difficult and the least satisfactory branches of the English system; but if it were found to be consistent with the proper despatch of public business in Ireland that all vivâ voce examinations should take place before the Judge in court he should not on his own part interpose any objection, although certainly he should wish to have the opportunity of communicating with those in Ireland who were most conversant with that matter.

He had now stated the various points on which his Bill differed from that of his right hon. and learned Friend; the whole subject could be most conveniently discussed on the Government Bill, and he thought no useful purpose would be served by dealing with it in any other way.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

MR. WHITESIDE said, he thought the Bill which his hon. and learned Friend had described with so much ability should be referred to a Select Committee—not for the purpose of defeating a good Bill, but for the purpose of making a good Bill, which it was quite clear the Government Bill was not. The statement of his hon. and learned Friend attested his conviction of the importance of the questions raised by this measure, which were among the most interesting that could be submitted to the attention of an enlightened jurist. His hon. and learned Friend first of all spoke of the frame of his Bill. Now, he (Mr. Whiteside) objected to the frame of the Bill. It was clear that the patronage portion of it was considered its most important part, and it had been dealt with as they sometimes dealt with a money Bill—tacking a clause to it, because they were determined the Lords should pass it. The constitution of the Court and its procedure were mixed up together. The two were entirely distinct. He had, therefore, placed on the table two Bills, one of which related to the constitution of the Court and the other to procedure. And for this reason. How had the present movement originated? In another place the Marquess of Clanricarde had discussed the relative costs of proceedings in the Courts of Chancery in England and Ireland, and the result of that discussion was that a Commission was issued to inquire as to the reduction of costs to suitors and the expenditure of the public money. But the Report of that Commission was of a most extraordinary character. The reference to the Commission was to inquire into the means of reducing the costs to the suitor. That was quite legitimate and proper. There could not be a more desirable thing than to reduce the cost of proceedings; because, although it was no doubt very well to get easily into the Court of Chancery, it was still more important to get out of it as cheaply as possible. The next object of the Commission was to inquire into the procedure, practice, and fees of the Court of Chancery in Ireland; and they were also to inquire into the difference between the constitution and form of practice of the Court of Chancery in England and Ireland. They took the last subject first; but what was most extraordinary was that the relative costs of procedure in England and Ireland was entirely passed over, not a single question being asked with regard to it. There was not one word in the Report upon this all important subject—the real object of the Marquess of Clanricarde in moving in the matter. It would be his duty to prove that, so far from lessening costs, this Bill of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would much more than double them in the Court of Chancery in Ireland. The Bill would involve the creation of new places to the amount of £10,000 or £12,000 a year. The expenses of the staff was a small consideration compared with the administration of justice; but the Bill proposed to repeal every clause of the Chancery Regulation Bill, except the clause relating to pensions. Who carried the Bill of 1850? The Master of the Rolls, Sir John Romilly, who had signed the recommendations on which the present Bill was founded. But he preferred on certain points the deliberate opinion of Sir John Romilly expressed in that House some few years ago, supported by the most eminent men at the Chancery Bar, and not altogether unassisted by men whose names commanded considerable respect on this subject. By the Bill carried in 1850 it was enacted that parties taking certain proceedings in the Court of Chancery in Ireland must make affidavit that what was stated therein was true. Now, he found upon referring to the Act of Parliament that it was enacted that when a petition was presented it was to be verified by affidavit according to the form set down in the schedule of the Act; and that form was to this effect—the petitioner declared that so much of the petition as related to his own acts and deeds was true, and so much as related to the acts and deeds of others he believed to be true. That was the form which was so much censured by his hon. and learned Friend. Was it not right that a plaintiff who was about to put his adversary to an oath should be obliged to verify his petition by an oath also? The Master of the Rolls, in support of the change, stated that the effect of it would be to bring the matter at issue much more speedily before the Court, and the practice of filing pleas and demurrers, which led to so much delay, would be put an end to. But the extraordinary part of the legislation now proposed was this—that they were called upon to go back to all the technicalities which they had got rid of fifteen years ago. Again, the Master of the Rolls recommended his measure on the ground that it would enable the Court to take viva voce evidence; but now it was proposed to restore the very mode of taking evidence which Sir John Romilly had condemned. Mr. John Sadlier, whose authority he would not wish to quote upon some other points, but whose experience as an attorney entitled his opinion to weight on this, said that written evidence was futile. Mr. Henley was of opinion that it would be impossible to resist the extension of the improvement to England. His right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole) gave, it was true, a more qualified opinion, for he held that to expedite the business in Chancery the proceedings in the Masters' offices should be thoroughly reformed. But when Lord St. Leonards came to Ireland that very thing was done. Sir John Romilly also quoted the opinion of the late Mr. Bell, who said that in all his experience he had never cross-examined a witness unless he could examine him in chief, or cross-examine him on the ground of interest.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he did not propose to go back to the old system. In England they had entirely got rid of the system of interrogatories, and the examination was viva voce not only in substance, but in form.

MR. WHITESIDE said, it was to be done in a dark chamber, and that was the very thing to which he objected. The Master of the Rolls was strongly opposed to it, and here it was to be observed that the reformers were the Judges, and the anti-reformers the Law Officers of the Crown. He had seen a few days ago in Ireland an examination despatched in an hour which if conducted in a dark chamber would have lasted two or three days. The Master of the Rolls also said that the system of the Court of Chancery at that time amounted in a great measure to a denial of justice, and it was admitted by Mr. Pemberton Leigh that nobody could venture into that court unless the sum at stake was at least £1,000. An opinion was also expressed by a gentleman not then so well known to the House as he was now, but nevertheless admitted to be skilful, discreet, and learned, and that gentleman was Mr. Roundell Palmer. Mr. Roundell Palmer was then fresher and younger than now—he would not say more learned, but he was quite as competent to pronounce an opinion upon those principles which he had that night denounced with so much ability. He could not allow his hon. and learned Friend to escape. Mr. Roundell Palmer said it was an opinion very uniformly entertained that a very extensive reform must be carried out on such a principle as was incorporated in the Bill, and that such a remedy was absolutely necessary to restore efficiency and complete utility to the Court of Chancery both in England and Ireland. His hon. and learned Friend proceeded to say that the former system had brought discredit on the Court of Chancery; that practitioners in the Court were as nearly unanimous in favour of the principle of the measure as possible, and that a Bill formed upon the same principle ought to be applied to the Court of Chancery in England also. He would refer to Mr. Headlam as another authority who had spoken strongly of the value of sending cases for administration directly to one Judge, and said some of the great defects of the Courts of Chancery in London were the expensive and voluminous proceedings, and the great mass of documents that were accumulated in consequence of all the evidence having to be in writing. The Bill passed for Ireland provided a remedy for these, and enabled the Master to dispose of all orders of the court. Mr. Keogh also said during the discussion that the Bill would be regarded as a boon to Ireland, and he censured very severely, with that eloquence which belonged to him, an unfortunate English gentleman who had ventured to open his lips — Vice Chancellor Stuart. Sir Page Wood found in the Bill the principles he admired, and recommended it to the House as one that would pull up old abuses by the roots, and he contended that the same principles ought to be adopted in England. The present Lord Chief Justice, when speaking on the same subject, derided the lawyers who objected to changes, and said if a measure were brought in to alter the constitution the lawyers would be quiet, but if it were to touch a cobweb in Westminster, the lawyers would be up eagerly opposing it. The measure, he said —

“Was calculated to work a most salutary reform in the proceedings of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, and if extended to England he had no doubt it would be found to work with equal advantage here.”

And he wound up by saying:—

“He wished, as a member of the legal profession, to express his unbounded acknowledgments and grateful thanks to his hon. and learned Friend for having taken up a course of legal reform in that House, which would be most gratifying to the public, and which showed that he was treading in his father's footsteps and was likely to add lustre to the honoured name which he bore.”

Was it possible that the Government was now going to destroy a Bill which had the approval of such men, and which had proved one of the greatest blessings that Ireland had obtained from the Government of England for a long time? In the Bills which he had himself introduced he had yielded a great deal in order to get rid of opposition, but he could not yield those principles which these eminent men had approved in 1850, and which had been acted on ever since. In regard to the mode of verification proposed by the Bill now before the House, he contended that the measure would overthrow the Act of Parliament which had been found to work so satisfactorily. In England the vocations of the Master were added to the Vice Chancellor, and in Ireland the powers of the Vice Chancellor were given to the Master. In the 15th section of the Irish Act, it was enacted that all suits should go direct to the Master, and now it was proposed to introduce a Chief Clerk in the proceedings. He quite agreed that it was of great advantage that one mind should begin, continue, and end the cause; but the Attorney General, while professing to be in favour of the principle, by introducing the Chief Clerks, created the very evils he deplored. After all, the principal question, so far as the suitor was concerned, was the question of costs. When sitting upon a Committee for the re-arrangement of the County Court Acts for Ireland, the Irish Chancery Act was brought prominently before him, and it was found to be a most useful measure. That Committee had to consider how cases under £200 should be dealt with, and they recommended that County Court Judges should be empowered on moderate terms to wind up suits under that amount. A question had arisen within a few days in England as to what was to be done with cases between £200 and £500. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, in arranging his new and costly machinery, seemed to have forgotten what had recently passed in another place. Ireland was too poor a country to pay such excessive costs. By the County Courts Act for England the scale of costs and the fees of the Courts were fixed by the Judges, and he believed they might amount to £10 as against £2 10s. in the Irish County Courts. The Lord Chancellor had in the present Session introduced a Bill giving the County Courts of England equitable jurisdiction in cases not exceeding £300. Why was that increased jurisdiction to be given? Lord St. Leonards objected to the second reading. He was unwilling to send litigants, even in small cases, before an inferior tribunal, and he said that questions might arise in cases of no greater amount than £300 as important to the litigants and involving questions of as much nicety as if thousands of pounds were concerned. Lord Cranworth argued that courts which were intrusted with the duty of ascertaining whether debts were due were competent to wind up these small estates, to ascertain who were the creditors, and to divide the assets. The Lord Chancellor reminded Lord St. Leonards of the effect of the reduction already made in the fees of the court. He said—

“I find that there was a suit instituted in the Court of Chancery to get a decree for some property not exceeding in value £150. The costs amounted to £95 13s; but the court fees, the reduction of which is the panacea of my noble and learned Friend, were only £5 7s. 6d. The next case is something still worse. There was a small suit instituted for the administration of an estate. The whole estate was £400, and the debts on it £100. The costs amounted to £139 8s. 8d., the court fees being only £9 12s.”—[3 Hansard, clxxvii. 1040.]

And the Lord Chancellor proceeded to express an opinion to which he entreated the particular attention of the Attorney General—

“The great fault of lawyers is that they become so enamoured of the old system in which they have been bred and in its principles, that they refuse to see anything but good in its application, and they look with suspicion on any plan which is likely to make the form of judicial procedure less elaborate and less costly as likely to cause a departure from that exactness in which they believe justice resides.”—[3 Hansard, Ibid. 1041.]

He did for a moment imagine that the cases cited by the Lord Chancellor must be extreme cases, and he called upon a solicitor in large practice, who assured him, however, that there was nothing remarkable in the costs in those cases, and that he did not see how the suits could be carried through for less. That gentleman added that he himself had several cases in which the costs considerably exceeded those referred to by the Lord Chancellor. He thereupon sent to Dublin and got four bills of costs. In one case the value of the estate was £651, and the cost of winding it up was only £59. In a second case the costs were £49; in a third £42, in a fourth £50 2s. He had received a communication from Master Fitzgibbon as to the way in which these Acts were worked out. And he confidently asserted that if a speedy decision at a trifling cost was a desirable object the present practice of the Irish Court had attained that object. The question was, whether substantial justice could be got for the public, and he said that cheap and substantial justice had been obtained. The Masters did the most work, and they were Vice Chancellors under the present system. In a Committee of the House which sat six years ago, of which he (Mr. Whiteside) was a Member, the question was considered whether Masters should be abolished. The Committee, so far from so thinking, agreed that the Masters ought to have an original jurisdiction. They reported that the practice of taking viva voce evidence in Chancery was a sound one, and that there ought to be a more extensive application of the principle. The Attorney General was accordingly directed to draw a Bill founded in fact upon the practice in the Irish Court of Chancery, and giving the Judges the power of reforming the practice of the English Court. That Bill would have prevented the necessity of even applying to Parliament again on the subject. He was sorry, however, to say that the Judges had refused to agree on the plan proposed. The Committee proposed to give power to the Judges to do by a general order all that the Committee thought necessary for the public good; but the presumption was that the Judges did not think that the proposed changes were required. The Committee admitted that it would be well to allow of a Parliamentary title being given to all landed property, whether encumbered or unencumbered; but then came the question whether the function of dealing with landed estates should be given to the Court of Chancery or to a separate tribunal; and the Committee was not in favour of throwing the additional duty on the Court of Chancery. Accordingly, he (Mr. Whiteside) brought in a Bill under which the present Landed Estates Court was created. He proposed that the work should be discharged by two Judges, but objection was taken to this, and in Committee on the Bill the number was increased to three. That he was right in supposing two would be sufficient to do all the business was evident from the fact that on several days the Judges of the Landed Estates Court rose as early as one o'clock. The business of the court had greatly diminished, for you could not sell the entire soil of a county twice over in twelve or fifteen years. The three Judges of the Landed Estates Court were able men, and had discharged their duties in a very satisfactory manner. Instead, therefore, of appointing some gentleman of the bar to the office of Vice Chancellor, which his hon. and learned Friend proposed to create at a salary of £4,000 a year, he would appoint one of those learned Judges. He said this without having had any communication with them on the subject. He would also, if his hon. and learned Friend's Bill was to pass, amend it by a provision to retain one of the four Masters in Chancery who at present discharged their duties in so efficient a manner. Lord St. Leonards had appointed the best men to be Masters in Chancery; and of all the cases that had come before them three only had been reversed. He desired that one of these officers should have the functions of a Vice Chancellor; but the Masters among them sometimes decided forty causes a day, and it was not to be expected that a Vice Chancellor could do the same. He was quite aware that the moment a man ventured to speak seriously of economy in the public expenditure he involved himself in difficulties; but he must express his conviction that, between doubling staffs and paying pensions, the measure of his hon. and learned Friend would increase the expenditure for the administration of justice by much more than £12,000 a year. He objected to the system of Chief Clerks, and his hon. and learned Friend would not introduce it into Ireland if he could help it. The Judges of the Landed Estates Court had Examiners, and these gentlemen were barristers. If there were to be Examiners, and solicitors were to be appointed to the office, he wished them joy of it; but if asked whether he should prefer to have nice questions of account taken by the Masters in Chancery or by a Chief Clerk, he should unhesitatingly give the preference to the former. Sir James Graham himself advised the House to beware of the system of Chief Clerks. The Examiners in the Landed Estates Court had distributed £30,000,000, and he believed that no one would deny that that distribution had been made to the entire satisfaction of the public. By the practice advocated by his hon. and learned Friend great delay would take place in the progress of the suits, because it was not unlikely that matters which were speedily settled by the plan now adopted would occupy weeks before they were decided by the Chief Clerks. For simplicity and brevity he infinitely preferred the former system. As the public were well satisfied, he should like to see a uniform system adopted in the Landed Estates Court and in the Court of Chancery. At a lecture lately delivered in London it was correctly stated that the increasing power of the Chief Clerks should be viewed with some alarm. He thought that his hon. and learned Friend in seeking to extend to Ireland what was advantageous in England ought to consider more carefully the advantages which that country already possessed. In making a beginning it had naturally been thought better not to engraft the old dilatory proceedings of the Court of Chancery on the Landed Estates Court, but the quick proceedings of the Landed Estates Court upon the slow method employed by the Court of Chancery. Mr. Gibson had expressed his admiration of the simplicity of the Incumbered Estates Court, and the extreme facility which was afforded for personal communication with the Judges. That gentleman also said that it was the feeling of the profession generally that it would be better not to delegate authority to the Chief Clerks. Mr. Adair, in like manner, suggested that the principle of the Incumbered Estates Court should not be abandoned, but that it should be engrafted upon the Court of Chancery. His hon. and learned Friend had said, with an air of triumph, that the body of solicitors generally approved his Bill. Now, he did not believe that those gentlemen would be influenced in favour of a scheme which they did not approve by any hope of place, but he did not believe that his hon. and learned Friend was acquainted with the evidence given by that body. Regarding these gentlemen, as he did, with the greatest possible respect, he had examined their evidence. Those gentlemen said that the Irish Chancery Regulation Act was working well for the public, and had effected a great saving of expense. In answer to questions as to the working of the 15th section, which gave independent jurisdiction to the Master, they approved that section with some modifications. Those gentlemen suggested that a time should be fixed after which no further affidavit should be received. He had acted upon that suggestion, and had framed a clause in his Bill to carry it out. They would have no plea or demurrer, and he had abolished both. They would have no interrogatories without special leave of the Court, and that recommendation he had acted upon in his Bill. They thought that the business before the Chief Clerk should be mere matters of vouching and figures, and he had adopted that view in his Bill. In respect to the question of interrogatories, about which the Attorney General had been so triumphant, he (Mr. Whiteside) thought the system of taking further evidence by an Examiner was vicious, and so thought the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, the Chancellor, and the great body of solicitors. He was at issue with the Attorney General upon that point, but he was fortified by the opinion of the Master of the Rolls, expressed in the able pamphlet which the hon. and learned Gentleman had not answered, and by the practice of the Chancellor, who took evidence himself, and prevented counsel putting useless and irrelevant questions. Then, he would ask, was the House of Commons to surrender its convictions to a blue book, and because certain gentlemen recommended uniformity was a bad practice to be introduced into Ireland? He was authorized by one of the Commissioners to say that this Bill had never been placed before them, nor had their opinion been taken as to the propriety of the mode of obtaining uniformity. Then, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General urged them to have the demurrer, but the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, with his sixteen years' experience as a Judge, declared that the idea of avoiding expense or preventing delay by means of a demurrer was a simple delusion. The accident of the Master of the Rolls being in London together with a chief officer of the Court of Chancery made it a convenient opportunity for inquiring into the matter before a Committee, which could take into consideration the whole of these Bills. He was told that the number of steps in a Chancery suit in England was double the number of those in a suit in Ireland. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be committed to a Select Committee,"
—(Mr. Whiteside,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he concurred with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Whiteside) in considering this a most interesting question, not only to the suitors of the Irish Court of Chancery, but to the country at large. Several steps had been taken in the direction of a reform of the Irish Court of Chancery; the first of which was that taken by Sir John Romilly in the year 1850. He was perfectly justified in saying, considering the number of Commissions and Committees that had examined this subject, that it had received every consideration, and the House was qualified to decide the question upon its merits without again referring it to a Select Committee. It was hardly correct of the right hon. Gentleman to say that in proposing the abolition of the Masters in Chancery, and the substitution of a Vice Chancellor, he had yielded to the opinions of others rather than acted upon his own conviction; because that very provision was contained in a measure upon this subject which was brought in in the year 1856, by the right hon. Gentleman himself and Mr. Napier. It was perfectly true, as the right hon. Gentleman stated, that several eminent men, including Sir Page Wood, supported the Bill of 1850; but that was because it was a step in the right direction in the commencement of Chancery reform. The Commission appointed to inquire into Chancery reform in England adopted the principles not of the Chancery Act of 1850, but of the Bill now before the House. The right hon. Gentleman said the expense of proceedings in the Court of Chancery in Ireland was much less than in that of England, but that was a matter of opinion, and he (Sir Colman O'Loghlen) did not believe the Irish system was so cheap as the English. One main principle of the Bill of 1852 was that a suit should be commenced and finished before the same Judge, and the Bill now brought forward by Her Majesty's Government was framed upon that principle. The right hon. and learned Gentleman objected to the Bill introduced by the Attorney General, because it differed from his own by providing for the appointment of a Chief Clerk instead of an Examiner. Now, the right hon. Gentleman in his own Bill really did provide for the appointment of a Chief Clerk, although he called him an Examiner, and the very clause proposing to appoint an Examiner was copied from the clause in the English Chancery Act appointing the Chief Clerk. The words of the two clauses were identical, and the duties of the offices were precisely the same. Another objection taken by the right hon. and learned Gentleman was that the Attorney General's Bill allowed a de-murrer. In this matter the opinion of the Commission of 1852 had been, as he believed, rightly followed. With regard to the question of the examination of witnesses, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had made a mistake when he supposed the Bill proposed to introduce the system of interrogatories before the Examiner. All these questions could be discussed and settled in a Committee of the Whole House, and were not of a character which ought to be referred to a Select Committee. It certainly would be most unwise and imprudent to limit the discretion of the Crown in the selection of Judges in the manner proposed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman; and he demurred entirely to the right hon. and learned Gentleman's statement that the Judges of the Landed Estates Court had at present little to do. Their duties took up much time, and would be considerably increased by Bills now before the House. The Attorney General had shown that, even allowing for all the new appointments which would be necessary, £4,000 a year would be saved to the Treasury. The Bill had received the sanction of every man practising in the Irish Court of Chancery and of the Incorporated Society of Attorneys. All the questions of importance at issue between the Attorney General and the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite were of such a character as ought to be settled, not in a Select Committee, but by a deliberate vote of the House, and the mere matters of detail were so few that they might very properly be disposed of in Committee of the Whole House.

MR. GEORGE supported the proposal that the measure should be referred to a Select Committee, together with the Bill introduced by his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin. He would remind the House that the Commission which had inquired into that subject did not include either the Lord Chancellor or the Master of the Rolls in Ireland; and he could state that the Master of the Rolls disapproved of many of its provisions. He was surprised not to find in this Bill any reference to the Report of the Committee which had sat upon the same subject. From 1850 to the present time the Masters in Chancery had been acting, with what success was shown by a Return obtained last year, from which it appeared that since the 1st of January, 1851, when increased jurisdiction was given them under Sir John Romilly's Act, down to the 1st of April, 1864, the five Masters made in all 14,443 decretal orders, of which only 134 were appealed against, and but forty-two reversed. As long as these able officers were intrusted with the same powers, it mattered little to the public whether they went by the name of Masters or Vice Chancellors. The Bill of the Government purported to have in view the same objects as the Report of the Commission — namely, to reduce costs to the suitors, to prevent undue expenditure to the public, and to assimilate as far as practicable the procedure of the two countries. But so far from this, the measure would in practice greatly increase the expenditure to suitors, add enormously to the public expenditure, while in the name of assimilation it was proposed to force upon the profession changes some of which were opposed to the wishes and opinions of a very large proportion of the best informed members of the profession in Ireland. The Incorporated Solicitors, he perceived, were now disposed to look favourably on the plan of the Government, though before the Commission they warmly supported the existing system, as administered by the Masters in Chancery. He could scarcely believe that a body of gentlemen so respectable would allow themselves to be influenced by the fact that the Clerks in Chancery were to be chosen exclusively from members of their own profession; but it certainly was remarkable that the change in their opinion was coincident in point of time with this determination on the part of the Government. The Bill proposed to appoint a new Vice Chancellor and a Chief Clerk, to give the Master of the Rolls two additional clerks, and to appoint another registrar and other officers — causing an additional expenditure of £12,500 a year. It abolished at one stroke four Masters in the fullest enjoyment of their faculties, with full will to continue their duties, they would be entitled to pensions, amounting to about £3,000 a year, and there was a shoal of clerks employed in their offices who would also be entitled to compensation. For what purpose was all this waste of money, and why should the country be saddled with such an expenditure? The new offices would cost from £10,000 to £12,000 a year; the retiring pensions to the Masters would amount to much more. No case had been made out for such a scheme, and in times of economy like these the House of Commons would do well to look closely at a Bill which would create a large number of good places, and displace able officers who would become pensioners on the State. The Government made a constitutional difficulty to the appointment of the existing officers to the new offices, but it would be impossible to find Judges more able or more esteemed than those of the Landed Estates Court. It required much to justify the course of proceeding the Bill proposed, and to show how far it was necessary in furtherance of the ends of justice to adopt the scheme proposed in this Bill. With regard to the question whether the Bill would increase the costs to the suitors, he would remind the House that there were some points in which the Irish practice was superior to that of England. For example, though all were agreed on the propriety of abandoning the system of successive affidavits, verification of the pleadings on oath ought not to be lightly abandoned, and the plan now proposed would certainly add to the expenses of the suit. Again, the practice in Ireland with regard to demurrers and pleas was the best, and the Master of the Rolls also disapproved the proposed voir dire examination before the Examiners, believing that days would be occupied instead of hours, as would be the case, if the examination took place before the Court, and that a large additional expense would thus come upon the suitor. In a country like Ireland it was better to have justice administered, if less elaborately, with less expense to the suitor than was the case in England. It had been shown conclusively that whereas the Commission was intended to save costs to the suitors and lessen the expenditure of public money, the Bill which pretended to carry out the Report of the Commissioners, did exactly the reverse. He and those who thought with him were of opinion that it would be fairer to ask the House to refer the subject to a Select Committee rather than crowd the notice paper with Amendments, which would be numerous and voluminous, and might lead to a great loss of time. If the Government would allow these three Bills to be referred to a Select Committee they would be able in a short time to combine them into a useful and satisfactory measure.

MR. SCULLY had heard four interesting speeches from four learned Gentlemen, and the details of the Bill appeared to him to be thoroughly threshed out. The real question left for the House was, whether or not the Bills should be referred to a

Select Committee. It had been truly said that, in the present case, the bone of contention was the question of patronage, and he thought it would be a wholesome regulation if in a Bill of this sort the practice and procedure clauses were framed by the Government, and the drawing up of the patronage clauses handed over to a patriotic Opposition, in order that the existing staff might be utilized. This the Government Bill did not propose to do. He did not see the use of sending the question before a Select Committee; and, as they had only had some twelve Members present on an average throughout the discussion that evening, they had practically had a Committee quite select enough. The only drawback to that was, that when the bell rang a number of Members would rush in, and by their blind votes overrule the judgment of those who had carefully attended to the business of the House. He thought it would be advantageous if, in the case of all Commissions of Inquiry into matters of that kind, the Commissioners were directed to frame a Bill to carry out their own recommendations in order that it might be submitted to the Government and Parliament. He regretted that in this case the Commissioners should have entirely overlooked one of the paramount objects for which they were appointed—namely, to inquire how the cost to the suitor and the expense to the public could best be reduced. But he presumed that if the new procedure secured expedition it would necessarily diminish expense. In the Masters' Offices some cases had been going on for ten years, and they seemed likely to continue there for another ten. The Attorney General admitted that his measure would cause an immediate increase of charge to the public of £6,200, and that there might be a still further increase of £4,500. If permission was given for the creation of additional offices, and the incurring of additional expense, they might take it as a settled matter that the extra appointments would be made and the extra money spent.

MR. WALPOLE said, that the main difference between the Bills before the House seemed to be this—that whereas one of them recommended the appointment of one Vice Chancellor, whose selection was to be left to the responsible Advisers of the Crown; the other Bill recommended the appointment of two Vice Chancellors, whose offices should be placed in the first instance at the option of certain judicial officers now in existence. Of those two principles he much preferred that contained in the Bill of the Government; for he thought that public officers, and especially judicial officers, should be appointed on the responsibility of the Advisers of the Crown, and it hardly became Parliament to suggest to the Crown the persons who should even have the option of accepting such an office. At the same time it would be for the Advisers of the Crown in the exercise of their discretion to consider whether they should select competent men who held existing appointments, or should give their patronage to other persons. There were some principles involved in the two Bills to which he wished to call attention. Parliament had thought proper to proceed on two entirely different principles in reforming the Courts of Chancery of England and Ireland. In 1850 it proceeded to reform the Irish Court of Chancery on the notion that all these matters could be conducted by cause petitions, and on evidence principally supplied by affidavits. From all that had occurred during the present discussion, he was led to believe that the objections taken to the Bill of 1850 had been completely sustained, and he was glad to find that the Attorney General had adopted the view then advocated. In respect of the English Court of Chancery, the Act of 1852 proceeded on a totally different principle, and was really one of the most successful amendments of the law which had been made in our time. The first credit was due to the Commissioners for the recommendations they made, and great credit was also due to his noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) for the manner in which those recommendations had been carried out. But there was one point in which that Act was defective. He referred to the Examiner's Office. He did not believe there ever could be a good administration of justice unless the evidence was taken before the Court which had to determine the matter in issue. There was very great difficulty in working out that result; but on that point there were clauses in the Bill of his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Whiteside) preferable to those in the Government Bill. There was another defect in the English Act of 1852 with reference to the working out decrees by the Chief Clerk. After the onerous duties of the Judge were got through, the labour imposed on him was too great to attend to the details of the Chief Clerk's office.

The Judge was also naturally interested in supporting that officer's position, because he was his own Chief Clerk. These were the points to which he wished to call the attention of the House. Everything else was matter of detail, important indeed, but hardly fit for general discussion in that House. The question then arose, how should they deal with the Bills? If they could secure the attendance of the Attorney General, his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns), and his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin, and other Members, who really understood the subject, he believed they would be enabled to work out the result better in a Committee upstairs than in a Committee of the Whole House, where the matter would be discussed perhaps in presence of twenty or thirty Members, and divisions carried by those who had not heard the discussion. He should be glad to give his own assistance, either in a Committee upstairs or in a Committee of the Whole House, to put the Bill into as perfect a form as possible.

MR. MALINS confessed, that after listening to the whole of the debate he had seldom found himself more embarrassed. He had thought they were all agreed that the system at work in Ireland was unsatisfactory, and that it required amendment; but he collected from his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Whiteside) that he was satisfied, and that the people of Ireland generally were satisfied, with the existing system, subject to some slight correction. If that were so, his hon. and learned Friend, instead of submitting Bills of his own on the subject, should have opposed the measure of the Government upon the second reading. The Government were under considerable disadvantage in legislating on this subject. The Attorney General in dealing with the question must have felt the disadvantage of never having observed the working of a single Irish Chancery suit, and during the debate he had been unsupported by any Members on his own side of the House who had had that advantage, with the single exception of the hon. and learned Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loughlen). He had known a good deal of the Court of Chancery in England before the Bill of 1852. His right hon. Friend who preceded him, had correctly stated that the Bill was an enormous improvement. It had corrected a system which was a disgrace to a civilized country.

The country now had as much reason to be proud of the system as it had before to be ashamed of it. There were, no doubt, some defects still—one being as to the mode of taking evidence; and another, the system of proceedings in Chambers by the Chief Clerks; but, upon the whole, it had worked exceedingly well, and if there were imperfections in the Irish system, the proper course would be to extend to Ireland the system in operation here. He quite agreed that the evidence should be taken vidé voce whenever it was practicable; but vidé voce evidence in the Court of Chancery here was impossible, on account of the weight of business, and the system of examination before the Examiner was, he admitted, objectionable. The working out of decrees was also a great imperfection. It could not be denied that a Judge who for six hours of the day had devoted all the energies of his mind to the hearing of causes must be too much exhausted to be able to give three hours afterwards to duties in Chambers. The Court of Chancery had been vastly improved of late years; great expedition was now used; general satisfaction was given, and if there were any defects in the Irish system it was only right that they should be amended. But he could not imagine anything more simple than the plan of defending suits by demurrer, and there could be no more convenient mode of deciding cases, if the facts were agreed upon. Nor could he fall in with the suggestion that the plaintiff should be required to verify his bill on oath, because it might be filed upon imperfect information, and he ought to have the opportunity of improving his case, and it was only to the way in which he ultimately put his case that he ought to swear. Upon the whole he came to the conclusion that it was desirable that the system in England should be extended to Ireland, and, therefore, he felt bound to support the Bill of the Government. During the present debate there had been the greater part of the time four or six Members sitting on the Government side and ten or twelve on the Opposition Benches; but if they sent the Bill to a Select Committee those who were most competent to deal with the subject would not be able to attend. He suggested to his right hon. and learned Friend that he should endeavour to amalgamate his Bill with the Bill of the Government, and the question should then be considered in a Committee of the Whole House.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, that a remark had been made that no Irish Member who had served on the Commission had addressed the House in favour of the present Bill, and as he had the honour to be on the Commission he hoped the House would allow him to make a few observations upon it. The object of the Commission was to ascertain which was the better practice, that of Ireland or that of England, in this matter. The first thing which the Commission endeavoured to ascertain was the practice in the Court of Chancery in England and in Ireland, for the purpose of seeing which was the better. They also aimed at discovering the opinion of gentlemen in Ireland who were competent to speak upon the subject, and they therefore examined the Master of the Rolls, Master Litton, and Master Brooke. There were three great points upon which they were examined, the first as to the substitution of compendious printed forms for the old written pleas, the second as to the mode of taking evidence, and the third as to whether the Masters' jurisdiction should be retained or abolished. On the question of written pleadings, the Master of the Rolls said that the English practice was by far the best, that he thought that the English practice of taking evidence ought to be adopted in Ireland, and that the English practice as to Masters was the best. Mr. Litton said that he thought that the system of procedure adopted in England was nearly perfect; and Mr. Brooke said that the most valuable of all reforms would be the adoption of the English practice in the Courts of Chancery in Ireland. Not a single witness before the Commission gave evidence on the other side. On that Commission there were several persons acquainted by experience with the practice in England and in Ireland, and they were unanimous that the practice in England should be introduced into Ireland. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Scully) said that the fault he found with the Commission was, that they had neglected to inquire into the question of reducing the costs to suitors—the only question they were appointed to deal with. Now, what the Commission were instructed to inquire into was the differences between the constitution, forms, practice, procedure, and fees of the courts in England and Ireland, with a view to reduce the costs to suitors, and the expenditure of public money on the establishment charges. These were two distinct questions. As regarded the costs of suitors, the Commission knew perfectly well that the very great and cardinal point in which the English system had been successful was the diminution of costs to the suitors. [Mr. WHITESIDE: No!] My right hon. Friend disagrees. [Mr. WHITESIDE: Entirely.] He must be allowed to have a little experience in the matter. He knew what the costs were before the new procedure, and he knew what they were now. He knew also what the cost was in Ireland, and what the expenditure of time and money was in Ireland, in arriving at a result, sometimes occupying months and sometimes years, which in this country was arrived at in a few weeks at a very slight expense. The other point was a different matter—that with reference to the expenditure of public money upon the salaries of the Judges and officials. That was a question with which the House was as competent to deal as the Commission, and therefore the Commission did not interfere in that matter. It was not necessary for the Commissioners to do more than make the recommendations they did as to the Judges. The salaries were for the Government to propose and justify to the House. His right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole) said that if he could mention one respect in which the improvements introduced into this country in 1852 had not been successful, it was the mode of taking evidence and the proceedings before the Chief Clerks. But the House must remember that since the year 1852 the mode of taking evidence had been further extensively altered, and that there was a small amount remaining of the practice of 1852. It was not the practice now, when there was any serious dispute as to facts, to take the evidence before the Examiner, or otherwise than in open court. As to the question of Chief Clerk, he owned there was a great deal of truth in what his right hon. Friend said upon the subject. The practice required most careful watching. He owned, upon the whole, that it had worked successfully up to this time, owing to the very great care which the present Judges of the Court of Chancery had taken never to let go their hold over the proceedings before them; so that whenever a person wished to have a matter heard personally before the Judge he could have heard it before him, instead of before the Chief Clerk. It was impossible for a Judge to transact every minor detail of cases, to go through accounts, and similar business, which could be performed by a Chief Clerk. At the same time there was the danger of allowing the Chief Clerk to go out of his province; and that could only be guarded against by public opinion, and by that House taking care that that officer should not pass out of his jurisdiction and assume more authority than belonged to him. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Whiteside) had raised a very delicate question connected with the Landed Estates Court in Ireland, by stating that there were more Judges than were required for the business coming before the Court, and suggesting that one of the Judges should be made Vice Chancellor. He (Sir Hugh Cairns) believed that to be quite true; but the remedy was that the Government, if they adopted that view, should not fill up any vacancy that might occur until the opinion of the House of Commons was expressed upon the subject. He did not accept the argument that they should take away a Judge from the Landed Estates Court and make him a Vice Chancellor. It would be dangerous for the House to take that course. The appointment to a judicial office should be made upon the responsibility of the Government. As to the proposal to send the question to a Select Committee, he would say for himself that the Government having in their Bill carried into effect the recommendations of the Commission he would be satisfied that that Bill should be dealt with by a Committee of the Whole House; but, at the same time, the Government would do well to consider whether a greater amount of satisfaction would not arise by complying with the inclination of the House, if there was a general inclination in that direction, and referring these Bills to a Select Committee.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he had had some experience of the Court of Chancery as counsel, and also unfortunately as a suitor, and it was in the latter capacity that he was able to speak of the functions performed by the Chief Clerk. The system of warrants was the great objection to the Masters' offices. The number of Masters should have been diminished, and they should have had a paper of cases as the Judges had. Instead of this the Masters were abolished. Cases now went technically before the Judge in Chambers, but practically before the Chief Clerk. The Masters used to be men of considerable standing at the Bar, and counsel appeared before them. But the Chief Clerk was usually a solicitor, and counsel could not go and argue before an attorney. It was said that the parties could go before the Judge if they were not satisfied with the decision of the Chief Clerk; but this involved additional expense, and the Chief Clerk naturally exercised considerable influence over the Judge. He had heard from many eminent and experienced solicitors that they had great difficulty in knowing how to deal with the Chief Clerks, because they often knew nothing and cared nothing about the law of evidence. Things were thus admitted before the Chief Clerk which would not be admitted in any court in the kingdom, and which were never admitted before Masters in Chancery. The fact was the practice in the Chief Clerks' offices was becoming as bad as it was formerly in the Masters' offices, and before such a system was adopted in Ireland there ought to be an examination before a Select Committee. Another point on which he wished to say a few words referred to the manner in which the judgments of the Court were given. What was the judgment of the Court? It was often a speech made by the Judge, such as might be made in the House of Commons or elsewhere, in which he introduced every possible topic that could support his view of the case. He had heard a Judge make statements in these speeches in regard to matters which were not only not in evidence, but which the parties would not have been allowed to prove in evidence if they had attempted to do so. A Judge sometimes spoke for two hours, and then at the end of his speech there was not a counsel in court who could tell what the result of his judgment was. Counsel endorsed upon their briefs what they supposed the judgment to be, and then the parties went before the Registrar to try and find out what the Judge had decided. There were minutes of decree, attendances of solicitors, and other expenses incurred, and ultimately the parties sometimes had to go back to the Judge and obtain an interlocutory opinion upon the matter. He knew cases in which a Judge had made a speech of two or three hours, but in which two or three months elapsed before the actual decree was settled. But the Judge's speech was reported and became a precedent, although the actual decree of the Court when settled was very different from the speech.

Sir George Bowyer

Until the Judges were obliged to draw up their own decrees, giving the reasons for those decrees, there would be no reform in the Court of Chancery! He should support the proposition for sending those Bills to a Select Committee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, reminded the House that both the Bills embodied, to a great extent, the same principle—that of establishing in Ireland the English system; the two Bills also agreed in abolishing the office of Master in Chancery; and really the points of difference between himself and his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Dublin were reduced to eight matters of procedure, and two important questions as to the constitution of the court, which were peculiarly fitted for discussion in that House rather than for a Select Committee. It was for the House to decide whether certain officers should be appointed, and whether the patronage of the offices they were to fill was to be assumed by Parliament or to rest with the Crown. As to the points of procedure, if these were to be considered by a Select Committee, it was highly probable that those hon. and learned Gentlemen who were most competent to deal with them would not be able to attend the Committee; and the consequence would be that all those points would have to be discussed over again in a Committee of the Whole House. If his right hon. Friend should succeed in getting the House to agree with him, there would be no difficulty in giving effect to his views; and if, on the other hand, he should succeed in carrying the clauses as they stood, he was sure his right hon. Friend would throw no difficulty in the way of having effect given to the pleasure of the House of Commons.

MR. WHALLEY rose to address the House; but the cries for a Division were so loud that but a few detailed sentences of the hon. Member's speech could be heard.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. C. P. VILLIERS, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that if his Motion met with any opposition he should not press it at that late hour. The object of the Bill was merely to continue another which had already expired. As many people were anxious to know whether the measure was to be continued, and as he understood that no opposition was to be offered, he hoped the House would allow the second reading to be carried, and any discussion to take place on the Motion for going into Committee on Monday next.

Mr. BROMLEY thought that a question of such great importance ought not to have been brought on at such a late hour, involving, as it did, the credit of the metropolis, as far as the poor were concerned. [Mr. C. P. VILLIERS: The discussion can be taken in Committee.] He might say, that if he met with any encouragement on the part of the House he should propose to add to the Bill what he regarded as a most important clause when it went into Committee. The right hon. Gentleman had latterly, as he knew, exerted himself very much with a view to amend the condition of the poor; but he did not think that matters were in quite so satisfactory a state as the right hon. Gentleman had led the House to suppose on a former occasion. A glance at the streets would show that they were never so crowded with vagrants as at the present time, and that professional mendicancy had never attained such a height. The newspapers had lately been full of clothes-tearing cases—charges against mendicants who had gone into the workhouses seemingly for the purpose of rending their garments and going out again. Although the right hon. Gentleman would, no doubt, say that these cases arose, for the most part, from the establishment of refuges by private charity, he must say that a great many of these vagrants found their way into the metropolitan refuges established by the right hon. Gentleman. What was it, however, which had necessitated the establishment of refuges by private charity? Nothing but the deficiency of the Poor Law. It was that very deficiency which induced people to think that it was better that a percentage of imposition should take advantage of these refuges than that numbers of people should starve nightly or weekly in the metropolis. By a Report laid upon the table of the House on the previous evening, but not yet printed, he perceived that these refuges could accommodate about 1,000 people nightly, and that the total number received during the month of January last amounted to 27,583. Now, there were two points to which he wished specially to direct the attention of the House. The first was the practical working of the Act as regarded cases of real distress, and the other its practical working as regarded professional mendicancy. In respect to the former point he might say that the alleged emptiness of the workhouse wards might easily be accounted for, because as long as the doors were kept shut empty houses must be the result. The workhouses nearest to that House—St. Margaret's and St. John's, Westminster—according to the Return, contained sixty-two beds. He was there himself some time ago. He found some twenty or twenty-two beds. Where, then, did the remaining forty persons go? They had to go to Kensington, a distance of three miles, and at the termination of their walk they received four ounces of bread. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman considered four ounces of bread was sufficient relief for a poor and destitute man, but he must say he should be sorry to see the right hon. Gentleman reduced to the condition of a casual pauper. If the right hon. Gentleman were so reduced, he should like to learn the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman as to the satisfactory working of his own Act when, after surmounting the difficulties connected with one workhouse, and after arriving at another, tired and weary from the effects of a three miles' walk, he received that amount of sustenance as the reward of his labour. [The hon. MEMBER here held up a packet containing a very small quantity of bread.] The relief given was capricious and unequal, as was usually the case in the administration of the Poor Law. The average, however, was about 5½oz., according to the Report. In every case some warm and nourishing drink ought to be given. In the workhouse of St. Olave's Union the amount of relief given was 5oz. of bread in the evening, and the same in the morning, with as much water as the pauper chose to drink. They had all heard of cafés abroad where pain à discrétion was supplied; but it was reserved for an English workhouse to boast of its liberality in cold water. Beyond that he had to complain of the insults that were too frequently cast upon unhappy applicants for relief. A few days since he accompanied a poor man, a casual pauper, to the workhouse of a rich parish where he had been refused admission. At his request the man was admitted, but the workhouse porter told the poor man to "come in" in about the same tone in which a surly gamekeeper would address a half-broke retriever. The first amenity the man met with when he went into the workhouse was that, in answer to a statement he made, he was told he was a liar. It appeared that the man really told the truth, and the workhouse porter, who was above the average of such officials in courtesy, probably meant nothing by his language, which was only the ordinary workhouse mode of addressing casual poor. The recipient of out-door relief met with the same insulting treatment. He was informed by a gentleman that at Lambeth workhouse he saw a poor woman waiting with an order for some meat, and when she told her object to the porter she was told she could wait until she got it. She did wait three-quarters of an hour, and then she got it — but it was flung across the hall to her as to a dog, and she caught it in her lap. That kind of treatment had the effect of excluding the deserving poor, but did not exclude the regular vagrant, who was accustomed to that kind of language and could return it. According to the Report, in the parish of St. George's, Hanover Square, there had been 558 men who were refused relief in the month of January on account of the fitting up of the wards. He could not understand such an excuse in the middle of winter, when the Act was passed in June or July last year. However, he was not surprised at such conduct in St. George's, Hanover Square, which was a rich but eccentric parish, for he remembered a placard which hung outside the workhouse in Mount Street to the effect that notice was thereby given that the tramp ward of that workhouse was closed; consequently, although not strictly in accordance with the law, the poor had to go away unrelieved. In the City of London Union, according to the Report, there had been 3,116 males, 542 females, and 191 children relieved as casual poor. He thought he might safely say that at least 90 per cent of the males were young and able-bodied men, who were often relieved three or four times a week. The numbers showed a great inequality between the numbers of males and females, the latter of whom were principally deserving poor. The fact was that the treatment of the vagrant was too good, while for the deserving poor it was not good enough. There had been twenty-one deaths from starvation between November and February. He had heard it gravely stated that some of those persons so died by their own choice, and that they were sometimes even in possession of property, real and personal. He asked hon. Gentlemen whether they had ever found such convenient and accommodating eccentricities among their wealthy relatives. The Act was really inefficient. He had a letter from a workhouse chaplain, who, seeing some people lying on the steps of the workhouse, asked the porter whether they had been there all night; to which the man replied that probably they had. It was true that such a practice was often resorted to by professional beggars, who found it profitable to extort money from the sympathetic passers-by; but he had a clause to propose which he thought would prevent that practice in future. His proposition was simply to make the police relieving officers in their various districts. The idea was not a new one. In 1846 a similar plan was adopted, and London was divided into six districts. An asylum was to be built in each. Two of those districts consented to build such asylums, but the other four refused, and so the scheme fell to the ground. It was not necessary now to build new asylums, for the present accommodation would be found sufficient, if properly applied. In St. Paul's, Covent Garden, and the Strand Union the system he advocated was in full force. The poor person received a ticket for relief from the police, who were better judges of real distress and better acquainted with regular vagrants than workhouse porters. The right hon. Gentleman might reply that such was practically the case at present—that when a policeman took a poor person to the workhouse he received relief. But it was not the duty of the police to do so, and he wanted to make it their duty, and to make it the duty of the workhouse officials to relieve the poor so brought to them. The casual poor should be taken to the police station and then taken to the workhouse. If the casual ward should be full, the relieving officer should be called upon to find dustrious classes of the community, who maintained themselves, and whose interests ought to be considered.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he did not at that hour of the night feel called upon to reply to puerile personalities, and he would shortly therefore proceed to state a few facts to show that the Bill was not open to the objections which had been urged against it. It was a measure founded on the unanimous Report of a Committee upstairs, and the only objection which had been taken to it last year was that it was proposed at too late a period of the Session. That circumstance, indeed, it was which had induced the House to limit its operation, while the cause of its enactment was that no adequate provision was made for the destitute wanderers in the streets of the metropolis, inasmuch as they did not belong to any particular parish. It was thought, and with some reason, that the property of the metropolis should provide for the maintenance of those people, and there was a Return stating what had been the result of the proposal. The House would learn from that Return that whereas before the passing of the Bill there was no certain provision made in the union for the wandering destitute poor, under its operation sleeping accommodation had been secured for them to the extent of 900 beds. It should be borne in mind, he might add, when the superior treatment which they received in the refuges was spoken of, that they were subjected to no test or no check on imposture; but the Return from these refuges had been sent to the Poor Law Board, and it would, he believed, be in the hands of Members tomorrow. As to the present measure, however, it might have fallen short of the expectations of some, it had not failed in its purpose, and there were under its operation thirty-nine or forty houses where there were persons up during the night to receive those who stood in need of shelter. The reason why the police were not at first authorized to take persons to the workhouses was that it was not certain that the guardians of all unions would adopt the Act. They had now done so, and had made adequate provision for the reception of these poor people; and he therefore intended to propose—and he had informed the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Bromley) of that intention—that the police should be empowered to take to these places any person whom they saw simulating misery or soliciting alms in the streets. Under these circumstances he hoped that the House would agree to the second reading of the Bill.

INCLOSURE BILL—[Bill 89.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. T. G. Baring.)

MR. LOCKE asked the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of the Home Department, to omit from the schedule "Epsom Common" and "Epsom Common fields," which were only about seventeen or eighteen miles from London, and therefore within the area to which the inquiry of the Committee now sitting extended.

MR. T. G. BARING said, that these two cases had been specially reported upon, and the Report was in the hands of Members. Epsom Common fields were cultivated land, belonging to twenty-eight persons, over which the public had no rights, and he therefore could not consent to omit them from the Bill. The other case referred to—that of Epsom Common—was one of the inclosure of a real common, and as some part of it was within fifteen miles of London he would consent to postpone its consideration.

MR. COX said, that unless the public had some right over these fields he could not understand why their owners should have thought it necessary to apply to the Inclosure Commissioners at all. He believed that the public had some rights over them, and therefore he thought that neither of these inclosures ought to be sanctioned until the Committee now sitting had made its Report. In order that the hon. Gentleman might have an opportunity of again addressing the House, he moved that the Bill should be read a second time that day week.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day week."—(Mr. Cox.)

MR. T. G. BARING said, that this was a question which affected private property, and he could not consent to omit these fields from the Bill.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he was sorry that the hon. Gentleman would not accede to the reasonable proposal which had been made to him. There wanted some reform in this matter of inclosures. Inclosure Bills were intended to be a protection for the public; but instead of that they had been made the means by which open spaces had been withdrawn from the enjoyment of the public.

MR. BRADY hoped that the hon. Gentleman would accept the suggestion of the hon. Member for Finsbury.

MR. BONHAM-CARTER said, that as to the Epsom Common fields there were no public rights whatever, and this Bill could not harm the public.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY pointed out that there was a great distinction between commons and common fields.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

IRELAND — ROYAL HIBERNIAN MILITARY SCHOOL.

RETURNS MOVED FOR.

Moved, That there be laid before the House—

“Returns of the Officers, Teachers, or other officials of the Royal Hibernian Military School appointed since the date of the last Parliamentary Return; specifying their names, religion, employment, annual salaries, annual value of their allowances, residences, and whether they are still on the staff of the establishment or whether they have since died, resigned, or have been promoted to other positions in the same or similar institutions:

“Of Offices now vacant; specifying the nature of such Offices, the annual salaries and allowances of said Offices vacant, and the dates when said vacancies occurred:

“Of any changes in the Books in use at the date of the last Parliamentary Return, either for the general, secular, or religious instruction of the boys; and Copy of all Correspondence relative to such changes:

“Copy of all Correspondence, since the date of the last Parliamentary Return, relative to the ‘quarters’ and salary of the Roman Catholic Clergyman attached to the institution:

“Returns of the average number of the Roman Catholic and Protestant Boys in the Royal Hibernian Military School during the years 1861, 1862, 1863, and 1864:

“Of the number of Roman Catholic and Protestant Boys at present in the institution:

“Of the number of applications for admission into the Hibernian School during the same years, specifying 1st. The names of the boys admitted each year, with the dates of their applications and admission; 2nd. The religious registration of the boys so admitted; 3rd. The religious faith the boys so admitted were baptized in; and 4th. The names of the boys at present on the books of the institution as applicants, and the religious faith in which these children were baptized:

“And, Copy of the application-papers and all Correspondence relative to the admission and religious registration of a boy named Joseph O’Callaghan, son of John O’Callaghan, late Colour Sergeant in Her Majesty’s 9th Regiment of Foot.”—(Mr. Maguire.)

MR. VANCE opposed the Motion as being unnecessarily inquisitorial, invidious, and offensive, as regarded the authorities of the establishment in question.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON was of opinion that the Returns moved for ought to be granted. They were only a continuation of the Returns which had been given for many years past.

MR. WHITESIDE denied that a Return of this kind, specifying the names, religion, employment, and salaries of the officials of the Royal Hibernian Military School, was a legitimate one. He deprecated any such information being furnished on the Motion of a Member of that House.

MR. WHALLEY moved the adjournment of the debate. He considered that the opposition to this Return was a substantial and reasonable one.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN seconded the Amendment.

Motion made, and Question put, “That the Debate be now adjourned.”—(Mr. Whalley.)

The House divided:—Ayes 10; Noes 29: Majority 19.

Original Question again proposed.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN also objected to the granting of the Return, which he described as being very inquisitorial.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at a quarter after Two o’clock.

DESTRUCTION OF METROPOLITAN

STANDING ORDER NO. 191.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY, in rising to move an Amendment of Standing Order No. 191, relative to the demolition of dwellings inhabited by the working classes, said: My Lords, during the last two years in this metropolis, in whichever direction we turn, we find great railway works in progress, which are for the most part constructed on the site of dwellings that are being removed. The question naturally arises where the population thus displaced are to go to, and whether any kind of provision is made for them? We are not only to ask this question with regard to those who are thus displaced, but we have also to consider what is to be done in respect of those who are coming year by year to reside in the metropolis; because, my Lords, the population of this metropolis is not only sustained by its natural increase, but also by a yearly immigration of from 30,000 to 40,000 persons. The question, therefore, is what is to be done with respect to these great displacements? The answer generally given to any inquiry on this point, is that the supply will be equal to the demand. But those who give this answer seem to have very little notion of what the demand the supply are. The demand is for something immediate—for dwellings for persons who are turned out of their homes; but the supply can only be provided in a long course of time. Again, the demand is for something near, for dwelling houses near the places of employment; but the supply is of dwellings very remote from the places of employment. It is not my desire to stop the progress what is called improvement and civilization; but I do wish to lay before your Lordships and the country a view of misery you are inflicting on the working classes by the demolition of dwellings and the want of any provision for those who are thus displaced; because it cannot be denied that the House of Parliament, having determined that these improvements shall be made, have decreed, I might almost say, the destruction of the intermediate generation. I do not say that ultimate good will not follow from these changes; but some measures should be taken to mitigate the immediate consequences, because the intermediate generation—that which suffers from the laws which you have passed and are about to pass, will perish, if not bodily, yet at all events socially. According to the returns laid on the table the number of persons to be displaced in London and the suburbs is not less than 20,000, and the number of houses to be pulled down is about 3,500. Very well. But the question that arises is, has any provision been made for the reception of these displaced persons? If your Lordships turn, in most instances you will find things stated—one of which is the other untrue. That will be that no provision is made for those displaced, and that while the people will find no provision where. But where will the people come from? The suburbs. It is a model lodging-house, full, and the first vacant premises that day labourer. This state of things acts very seriously indeed upon the financial condition of the poor. It is said that all the model lodging-houses are not full; but anybody who is conversant with the habits of the working classes knows that in many of the houses there are sudden vacancies which cannot be immediately filled up. Notices are accordingly placed upon the doors of the lodging-houses stating that lodgings may be had, and persons who might happen to see a few of these notices suppose that there is plenty of space. The other day I went into a district for the purpose of seeing how far those statements were true. No doubt there were a few to be let; but those that were vacant would not accommodate one five-hundredth part of those who require accommodation. The last quarterly report of the Society's houses—the Society for improving the Condition of the Working Classes—states with regard to the amount of accommodation—

“Streatham Street.—The 54 dwellings for families are all occupied. Portpool Lane.—The family dwellings are fully tenanted; and of the 64 rooms for single women there are 8 at present empty. Wild Court.—Every room in this court is at present occupied. Tyndall's Buildings.—Of the 87 rooms in this court 10 only are untenanted; the Men's Lodging-house, which makes up 38 beds, has had an average number of 34 nightly inmates. Clark's Buildings.—There are at present 2 rooms only untenanted. George Street Lodging-house, for 104 single men.—The average number of weekly inmates has been 101. Hatton Garden House, for 54 single men, has had an average number of 50 weekly lodgers. Charles Street, Drury Lane, Lodging-house, for 82 single men.—The average number of weekly lodgers has been 74. During the greater part of the last quarter many of the tenants left for the 'hop-picking season,' but they have again returned; and in the last week of the quarter there was only one empty. The sanitary report of all the Society's houses is good. The above report gives a fair average of the occupancy of our houses.”

The superintendent of the Streatham Street house states that he has always many applications for the first vacancy, and should have no difficulty in finding tenants for another building of equal accommodation—and so for all the other societies. Now, I want to show how very seriously this state of things operates on the condition of the labouring classes. It is difficult to draw a minute distinction and to define how they are affected financially, socially, and physically as all these influences act and react on each other. Let your Lordships first look at the financial effects. There is a large proportion of workmen, such as shoemakers, tailors, printers, and dockyard labours, who cannot remove to a distance from their places of employment without finding their occupation wholly destroyed. See how this displacement acts on many poor families—on widows who have to obtain their livelihood by their mangle. When these persons are turned out of their houses and removed to a distance they lose their connection, and as these departments of labour are generally well filled in the new locality they go away to certain destitution—they go to localities already pre-occupied—and the only effect is to swell the amount of pauperism and reduce the wages of labour. A certain number of skilled artisans must live near their work. They are for two or three days, perhaps, without any work, and then they receive an order at a minute's notice which must be immediately executed. The notes that I made during a visitation over one of the most populous districts of this metropolis will show exactly the real condition of things. I went over many parts, and found many of the very bad districts already destroyed. I came to one place which I knew very well, it is now a great mass of large buildings, the site of which was formerly covered by a large number of houses exceedingly crowded. Those houses are removed, and a magnificent model lodging-house has been erected upon the site; but none of those who lived in the houses that were taken down were allowed to enter it—they could not pay the rent and the proprietor will have none but those of the highest condition. A great number of working men were thus driven across the river to seek for lodgings, and upon many the displacement came so suddenly and with so much severity that a large proportion, having nowhere to hide their heads, sought shelter in common lodging-houses, where they were called on to pay for a single night's lodging of their family, as much as before would have rented a room, and, from want of the requisite space, were forced at great loss to sell their furniture, which afterwards they could not replace for thrice the sum they obtained for it, and they thus not only lost their homes, but were prevented, in all human probability, from ever getting others. The proprietors of the meanest houses, seeing the great demand for accommodation, instantly raised their prices; so that poor people, who before lived in in order that your Lordships may have some idea of the inconveniences to which the working men are subjected by the pulling down of houses without due notice, or without others being provided, perhaps your Lordships will allow me to read to you a letter which I received from a working man. He says —

“ I hope you will pardon the liberty I take in addressing you this note. I am by occupation a labourer, and have been a resident in Old Pye Street, Perkin’s Rents, and Fisher’s Court for the last twenty years. I was compelled to leave, about four years ago, Fisher’s Court, which was pulled down to erect Rochester Buildings, and repair to Orchard Street, where I rented a room for ten months, when I was compelled to leave this, in consequence of the place being required for pulling down by a Westminster Improvement Company. I was then compelled to take a small attic in Perkin’s Rents, which had been used for keeping rabbits (the rabbits being actually there at the time), there being neither chimney nor fire-place in the room. I had to put up with this inconvenience, with my wife and two children, for a week, there being no rooms in the district to be had within my means of paying. From there I removed to Cooper’s Arch, Dacre Street, and remained about three months, when we had notice to quit again, through the houses being required for pulling down. I forgot to mention that in Orchard Street they began pulling the roof off the house before I had sufficient time to get another room, as we only had one week’s notice. I write your Lordship this statement to show the inconvenience the poor of Westminster are subject to by the pulling down of houses without making any remedy for them. The houses that are situated in Old Pye Street, called Rochester Buildings, are so high in their rents that it is impossible for a poor man to occupy them, and a man who is compelled to earn an honest living by selling his wares in the street is refused entrance.”

Many of those poor people live in such entire ignorance of what is going on that they do not think of stirring until their homes are actually on the point of being pulled down about them. But then it is often said that they are, as a general rule, only weekly tenants, and that they are accustomed to receive a week’s notice. There are, however, hundreds of weekly tenants who, as I have ascertained by inquiry, have regularly paid their rent fifty-two times in every year, and who have lived in the same houses for ten, fifteen, and twenty years. Indeed, the last woman to whom I spoke on the subject had been paying her weekly rent for the same place for upwards of thirty years. And are such persons, I would ask, to be treated as mere weekly tenants, and to be thrown on the world all of a sudden without any regard to their convenience or their associations which they may have formed? Surely they are entitled to reasonable notice:—and I would also require that there should be placards placed in the streets about houses to be destroyed, stating that they were to be pulled down at a certain time. And what possible objection, I would ask, can there be to this proposal? Is it not a matter, if not of general right, at all events of clear mercy? It appears, perhaps, to be a small matter, but I can assure your Lordships it is not so in the eyes of those poor people, who would be grateful for any expression of sympathy and kindness at your hands. I trust, therefore, you will not refuse to give your assent to my proposal; and if you do not deem it right to do so, then I hope you will at all events excuse me for having trespassed upon your attention with these observations. The noble Earl concluded by moving the following Amendment of the Standing Order, No. 191:—

“ Ordered, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, that in the case of any Bill for making any work, in the construction of which compulsory power is sought to take fifteen houses or more inhabited by the labouring classes, the promoters be required to deposit in the office of the Clerk of the Parliaments on or before the 31st day of December a statement of the number, description, and situation of the said houses, the number (so far as they can be ascertained) of persons to be displaced, and whether any and what provision is made in the Bill for remedying the inconvenience likely to arise from such displacement, and that such statement be referred to the Committee on the Bill, and that the said Committee do inquire into and report thereon; and that in every such Bill a clause be inserted to enact that the company shall, not less than eight weeks before taking any such houses, make known their intention to take the same either by personal notice to heads of families inhabiting the same at the time of giving such notice, or by placards, handbills, or other general notice placed in public view, upon or within a reasonable distance from such houses, and that the company shall not take any such houses until they have obtained the certificate of a justice that it has been proved to his satisfaction that the company have made known their intention to take the same in the manner required by this provision.”

LORD REDESDALE said, he had no objection to the general principle of the proposed alteration, nor to the reduction of the number of houses specified to fifteen; but then he thought it desirable that after the words “fifteen houses,” the words “in any parish or place,” should be added. The noble Earl had given a very interesting account of the hardships to which those poor people who were ejected from their homes were subjected; but his statement, he could not help thinking, was somewhat with exaggeration. Taking, for instance, which had been mentioned, of a couple who had been obliged to sit up all night to prevent a child from being devoured by rats—was it not quite evident that such a house as they inhabited must be in so dilapidated a condition that it could not stand very long? In all that part of the town also to which the noble Earl particularly referred, the land on which such houses stood was worth £100,000 an acre; so that it would be utterly impossible to rebuild on land of that value houses for the working classes, and they would therefore be as completely turned out of them by the process of decay as by the operation of railway companies. The noble Earl had not suggested any method by which the wants of these people could be supplied, nor did he think that they could be met in the localities from which they were removed. There was so little space, and land was so valuable, that no new houses could be erected; and, therefore, if improvements were to take place, there must be a change of residence. It was very desirable that security should be taken for the giving of notice to the occupants of these houses before they were turned out. He had no doubt that some hard cases occurred; but he had been informed by persons who had great experience in these matters that in many instances poor tenants had received ample notice. In some cases the houses had become the property of the railway company long before the tenants were displaced, and families had been allowed to remain in them without paying rent on condition that they should leave as soon as it was necessary to pull down the houses; but, even under these circumstances, they often made no provision for the time when their removal would become absolutely necessary. The noble Earl had said that it appeared that 20,000 persons would be displaced under the Bills now before Parliament; but it must be borne in mind that the Order applied to all houses within the limits of deviation, but that in practice no more were pulled down than was absolutely necessary. He hoped that the noble Earl would not object to the trifling Amendment which he had suggested, and with that alteration he should be happy to support his Motion.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, that if their Lordships could not devise a remedy for this grievance, they ought to be careful not to increase it without necessity, and therefore, as in close connection with the subject, he desired to call their attention to what would be the result of the proposed concentration of the Courts of Justice on the Carey Street site. The space to be occupied was  $7\frac{1}{2}$  acres, and the number of houses to be pulled down would be between 300 and 400, all of them being filled by inhabitants of the lower class. It was proposed to remove the six equity courts from Lincoln's Inn.

EARL GRANVILLE rose to order. The noble and learned Lord was speaking about a Bill which had not yet come up to that House.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, that he would then suppose that such a proposition had been made somewhere. The Lord Chancellor, the Lords Justices, the principal Vice Chancellor, and the Master of the Rolls, all had good courts at present, and the last-named Judge was very anxious not to be removed from the neighbourhood of the Record Office. There only remained two Vice Chancellors to be accommodated, for whom Lincoln's Inn was quite ready to provide suitable courts. It was, therefore, he maintained, quite unnecessary to remove these courts to the proposed site, while to make room for them there it would be necessary to pull down a large number of houses. There could be no doubt that a greater number of houses would have to be pulled down than was at present anticipated; because not a few must be displaced in order to provide suitable approaches to the new building. The late Sir Charles Barry told a Committee of the House of Commons some years ago that the provision of such approaches by removing Clare Market and opening up the Turnstiles must cost a million of money.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he saw no reason why the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act should not be extended so as to give to lodgers in houses taken under compulsory powers compensation for the loss which they suffered from their removal. It was most unfair that a man who might have occupied the same rooms for twenty years should be turned out without receiving as much money as would pay the expense of his change of residence. He hoped that some measure would be sanctioned by Parliament which should secure to these poor persons the same notice as was given to leaseholders, and insure to them reasonable compensation. He did not desire that they should have anything unreasonable for the loss and damage which they might suffer from being compelled to remove. 3,082 persons were to be turned out of their homes by the operation of the Courts of Justice Site Bill, and, therefore, Government by introducing it had taken upon itself the responsibility of relieving these people from incurring hardships through their forced removal.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD suggested the omission of the words "inhabited by the labouring classes," in order that the Returns might include the whole number of persons of whatever class whom it was proposed to eject from their houses. Besides the labouring classes the houses in question were occupied by superior mechanics, earning 30s. or 40s. a week, who were desirous to find a better place of residence if possible than those out of which they were about to be turned. In point of fact the Irish labourer in his turf hut by the roadside was actually living under superior sanitary arrangements to those surrounding the skilled mechanic in London.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he had no objection to the Amendment suggested by the noble Earl. He was only anxious to get a full Return. He had been charged with exaggerating the evils caused by these forced removals, but when he sat down he felt that he had not said half enough on the subject.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he did not think it desirable to strike out the words relating to the labouring classes.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he was convinced of the necessity for omitting those words, as otherwise the promoters, whose interest it was to reduce the apparent number of persons ejected as much as possible, would only return the numbers of the very lowest class of labourers removed; and thus the Return would be practically valueless.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, the number of gentlemen's houses pulled down was not required, and therefore it would, perhaps, be better to insert the words "labourers and shopkeepers" in the Order.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH thought the largest possible term should be adopted in order to include every person ejected.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, if the words were omitted as proposed the Order would be reduced to a nonentity, as its object was to insure notice being served on labourers who might be living or lodging in the houses about to be removed. He thought some amendment of the Order was absolutely necessary, and if the noble Earl would consent to postpone his Motion he would be most happy to offer his services in drawing up a new Order in more inclusive terms.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

THE CARTOONS AT HAMPTON COURT PALACE.—PETITION.

LORD ST. LEONARDS, in presenting a petition from the Inhabitants of Kingston-upon-Thames, and of other parishes in the neighbourhood, praying that the Cartoons might be allowed to remain in Hampton Court Palace, said, he wished to draw the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the state of the Palace and its grounds, and the inexpediency of removing the Cartoons from the Palace. Some very beautiful iron gates had been thought worthy to be removed from Hampton Court Palace grounds to South Kensington Museum. They were made in 1695, and he understood it would be impossible to get a duplicate made of them in 1865—yet an inscription on them stated that they were the work of a "blacksmith." He thought that it would have been very much better if they had been allowed to remain at Hampton with a similar inscription, adding only the word "country" to blacksmith. What might have been the benefit to the working classes who went to Hampton Court Palace by thousands, from looking at those beautiful gates and learning that they were the work of a common blacksmith? These gates had been at Hampton Court for upwards of a century and a half, and he regarded it as almost sacrilege to remove them to South Kensington. He found that they had, since their removal, been repaired by certain processes which would preserve them whilst under cover, but would rather hasten their destruction if exposed in the open air. Under these circumstances he could not, of course, urge their restoration to the place from whence they had been taken; and he must say that he regarded them as a great ornament in the place in which they now were. Now, as to the Cartoons. It had been said that the ground for their removal was the danger of injury by fire; but in his opinion there never was a place in which so much pains had been taken to guard against fire as in the abode—if he might so call it—

of the Cartoons. He trusted they would not be removed. They were originally brought to this country from Flanders by Charles I. ; and after the execution of that monarch were preserved to the nation by Cromwell ; and thus after many adventures found a final resting place in the Palace of Hampton Court. The gallery had been built by Sir Christopher Wren expressly for them, and it was admirably calculated for its purpose. The room was long and narrow, with ample room for them, and not more than enough. There was water laid on ready at a moment's notice, and most elaborate machinery had lately been erected by means of which, in the event of danger, the Cartoons could be lowered in their frames and could easily be taken out, folded up, and removed from the room. Nothing could be more perfect or better adapted to its purpose than this machinery. There would be much more danger from fire in a building like that at South Kensington. As their Lordships knew, the drawings were made upon paper, and this paper had been afterwards placed upon canvas. They also knew that they were drawn as designs for tapestry, and that they had been cut into pieces for the tapestry to be worked from them—he believed the tapestry was now at Berlin. He had looked at them closely, and could see in places very thin paper coming from the canvas, which seemed to show that they were in a very delicate state, and he thought that to move them without actual necessity would be one of the most dangerous things that he could conceive. Kensington Museum also abounded with beautiful things, and the danger was that there would be so many beautiful things brought together that the attention would be distracted, and the visitors would not fix their attention upon any one object so as to get a knowledge of art from its inspection. Nothing diverted attention so much as variety. Everybody who went to Hampton Court Palace went to see the Cartoons ; and they were the first things that foreign visitors asked for. They had injured those interested in Hampton Court Palace by taking away the gates, and he asked Her Majesty's Government not to add insult to injury by taking away the Cartoons.

He would take this opportunity of drawing attention to the state of the gardens at Hampton Court Palace, and to express a hope that the Lord President (Earl Granville) would go down and look at them ; and also that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper), who had done so much for the Parks by planting beautiful flowers, would go also. They could in those gardens obtain at a moderate expense everything that would delight the eye ; and yet these advantages were thrown away, and no effect at all was produced. Their Lordships knew that in the Palace Gardens there were many pedestals for statuary, but nearly all of them were unoccupied by statues, those ornaments having been removed. He should be the last man to wish to interfere with Her Majesty's pleasure, if it were in accordance with Her pleasure that the statues had been taken away ; but he called upon the Government to supply their places with other statues ; for he believed that there was no other place in the country equal to Hampton Court Palace grounds for the display of works of art. If it was their desire to teach the humbler classes a knowledge of art, in order to the improvement of our manufactures, and place them on a level with those of France, they must do as they did in France, give the working classes the opportunity of seeing works of art.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that as his noble and learned Friend resided in the neighbourhood of Hampton Court it was natural that he should desire to draw attention to any deficiencies in respect to that Palace. With regard to the iron gates which had been removed from Hampton Court, their Lordships were hardly in a position to form a just opinion of the merits of the case until they had before them the papers which had been moved for by the Marquess of Salisbury, who certainly had done a most important service when he ordered these gates to be brought from the place where they had been poked into a park fence, without being in any way properly displayed, and to be restored as they had been. He had taken the opinion of several persons thoroughly qualified to judge of these matters, and, among others, Mr. Hart, of Cockspur Street, who said that it would be destructive to the gates, which were most valuable as works of reference, to place them again in the open air. With regard to the naked pedestals, the matter should be mentioned to Mr. Cowper ; but the noble Lord was mistaken in supposing that Her Majesty had anything to do with the removal of the statues. [Lord ST. LEONARDS said, that he had not said so.] It was some forty or fifty years ago, before her reign began, that they were removed to Windsor, and, of course, it was quite impossible to disfigure the terraces at Windsor by moving them back again to Hampton Court. He came now to the case of the Cartoons. His noble and learned Friend was of opinion that there were already too many works of art at South Kensington. The greater portion of the paintings and other objects of art had been lent by persons of various classes for the purpose of adding to the enjoyment and promoting the instruction of those who visited there. Her Majesty had sent pictures, objects of art, pieces of china, and, in fact, everything which could be of use or interest to the people, and particularly to the labouring classes. The noble and learned Lord thought it a pity to take away the Cartoons from Hampton Court, because they were visited there by persons of every description, and because the first thing that foreigners did upon arriving in London was to go down to see them. But of this he (Earl Granville) was quite certain, that more than double the number of persons, and above all of the labouring classes, visited South Kensington. And that brought him to another point—the danger to the pictures from lighting the galleries with gas. Upon that subject he would put in his noble and learned Friend's hands a report drawn up by Captain Fowke and some other scientific gentlemen, which showed the great advantages of the system of lighting adopted at South Kensington, and that no harm whatever was done to the pictures by the gas. And as for the lighting of the galleries in the day-time, he did not think it possible that a better system could be adopted. The noble and learned Lord himself could not think of comparing the lighting of the Hampton Court galleries with those of South Kensington. Application had been made to Her Majesty to allow the Cartoons to be exhibited in South Kensington, and she had been graciously pleased to give permission. When the public had had the advantage of viewing these great works in the superior light of the South Kensington galleries, and comparing them with their recollection of them in the inferior light at Hampton Court, it would then become a very proper subject of inquiry where they were permanently to be placed. The real question to be considered was, whether the course now proposed to be taken would not add very much to the interest felt by the public in works of art.

House adjourned at a quarter past Seven o'clock, till Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

AGRICULTURAL STATISTICS.

QUESTION.

MR. CAIRD said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is the intention of Government to give effect to the Resolution of the House in favour of the collection of the Agricultural Statistics of Great Britain?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, in reply, that the question of Agricultural Statistics had been under consideration, but it had not appeared to the Government necessary or expedient to introduce any Bill on the subject. A plan, however, had been suggested which appeared to afford a fair chance of success, by which the acreage under cultivation of different crops might be ascertained by voluntary Returns and other means; and if the preliminary arrangements should be concluded in sufficient time, the Government would be prepared to propose a Vote in the present Session to defray the necessary expenditure.

POST OFFICE OFFICIALS.

QUESTION.

MR. SCULLY said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Is the "Circular Memorandum" of the 22nd of March, 1865, sanctioning certain rates of wages besides other benefits, privileges, and gratuities, "for the minor Establishments of the Post Office," confined to London only; and is it intended that the Letter Carriers, Sorters, and Stampers of the General Post Offices in Dublin and Edinburgh respectively shall also have increased wages, with other advantages, like those of similar officers in London?

MR. PEELE, in reply, said, the arrangement to which the hon. Gentleman referred was in operation since 1861 with regard to Sorters, Letter Carriers, and Stampers, who were in the service at the time; and what had been done recently was to make that arrangement permanent, and applicable to all Stampers and Letter Carriers, whether in the service then or now. This arrangement, however, applied only to London. With regard to Dublin and Edinburgh, the corresponding establishments there were revised so recently as last year. Those rates of payment were, however, not the same as the rates in London, but they were sufficient to secure the services of good men.

UNION CHARGEABILITY BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether he is prepared to introduce Clauses in the Union Chargeability Bill to give powers to guardians to reconstruct Unions; and whether he will fix a later day after Easter for going into Committee?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, in reply, that it was not his intention to introduce any clauses into the Bill giving power to the guardians to reconstruct Unions. It would not be fair to confer this power upon guardians alone. Whenever a question arose as to severing parishes from different unions, it excited generally great differences of opinion amongst the guardians. There was a power given by the 6 & 7 Vict. to the Poor Law Board to separate parishes from, and add parishes, to a union. The Board had exercised that power, and meant to exercise it in future, when the interests of the parishes required. With regard to the day fixed for the Committee on the Bill, he had not heard that the day named would be generally inconvenient, and he should hope to be able to bring it on at that time; but perhaps he would be able to give a final answer on that subject on Monday.

INFANT MORTALITY AT EMNETH IN NORFOLK.—QUESTION.

MR. BRADY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department a question respecting the reported mortality of children at Emneth, but before doing so he would read the following article from the Lynn Advertiser of the 25th of March, 1865:—

"After the inquest was over the coroner directed the attention of the jury to the extraordinary mortality amongst children at Emneth. He was informed by the parish surgeon that it was something like 80 per cent of the population, which the surgeon attributed to gross and culpable neglect, the children dying from starvation. Fine, healthy children were seen daily to shrink, wither, and die without any disease, and simply because their inhuman mothers would not give them any nourishment. One woman, the coroner was informed, had had three illegitimate children, all of whom were strong and healthy, but died within six months of their birth. Unfortunately it was a matter of which he (the coroner) could not take any other notice than communicate with the Home Secretary, for unless he (the coroner) was set in motion by a magistrate, minister, or guardian of the parish, he held no inquest; but he wished it to be expressly understood that if, after this notice, a similar case came to his knowledge, he should order the body to be exhumed, and if the medical evidence was clear that the child died from starvation, he (the coroner) should know how to act. It should be known that the law was strong and powerful enough to punish the offender, whether her victim died by poison, violence, or starvation; and, depend upon it, if a conviction followed, the Judges of the land would make a severe example. The crime to which he alluded was on the increase, and must be put down by the strong arm of the law, and he should feel it to be his duty to lay the matter before Sir George Grey, who would probably send down a Commissioner to inquire into the matter. In the meantime he hoped the public press would take up the matter and that the police would be on the alert."

He would, therefore, beg to ask the right hon. Baronet, If his attention has been directed to a statement made by the coroner at an inquest held at Emneth, in the county of Norfolk, last week, and reported in the Lynn Advertiser of the 25th instant, directing attention to the extraordinary mortality amongst children in Emneth, amounting to 80 per cent of the population, which the parish surgeon attributed to gross and culpable neglect, the children dying from starvation?

SIR GEORGE GREY replied that he had not seen the report in question; but he had received, the day before yesterday, a letter from the coroner, stating his belief that there had been great mortality amongst children in the parish of Emneth, which mortality he attributed to the neglect of their mothers. He (Sir George Grey) had forwarded that statement to the Chief Constable of the county, requesting that he would inquire into the subject and report upon it.

EXPEDITION TO THE NORTH POLE.

QUESTION.

MR. W. O. STANLEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, If the Board of Admiralty have any intention to sanction or support any fresh attempt to reach the North Pole by Spitzbergen or any other route, or recommend any grant of Public Money for that purpose?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, in reply, that the Admiralty, and, as far as he was aware, the Government, had had no proposal made to them of the nature to which his hon. Friend had alluded, and he could not, therefore, state what course the Government would pursue if so grave a proposal were made.

MR. H. J. STONOR'S APPOINTMENT.

QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General, Whether the Mr. H. J. Stonor who has lately been appointed by the Lord Chancellor as Judge of a County Court is the person whose appointment as Judge in Australia was cancelled, in accordance with the Report of the Committee moved for by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, and on the ground that Mr. Stonor had been found guilty of corruption?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, since the noble Lord has thought that this was a case on which to found a question, I am glad for the sake of the gentleman concerned that the question has been put; and, in replying to it, I hope the House will excuse me if I make a statement somewhat longer than is usually made in answer to questions. The noble Lord's question misstates more facts than one, but it conveys a most serious imputation on the gentleman named, and of course, by implication, upon those who made the appointment. I say in the outset that the Government are responsible for the appointment, the Lord Chancellor having made it after consultation with, and with the approval of his Colleagues. With respect to the facts of the case, I may say that I believe this gentleman is one who has been as hardly used as anyone whose case was ever brought before this House. In the winter of 1853 the Chief Justice of Victoria, in Australia, was temporarily absent from his duties in consequence of illness, and it was difficult to find a gentleman qualified and willing to accept a temporary appointment without any certainty of its being made permanent. Arrangements were, however, being made with a view to render the appointment permanent, but there was no certainty that it would be so. Mr. Stonor applied at that time to the Duke of Newcastle, who was then Secretary for the Colonies, for this appointment, and sent in testimonials as to general and professional qualifications from Lord Denman, Lord Campbell, Vice Chancellor Stuart, and other persons of eminent authority. He likewise, in a manner highly honourable to himself, sent in printed papers, giving a full account of the circumstances which had caused his name to be introduced into the inquiry before an Election Committee in the summer of the same year. Through an accident, which was explained at the time, and which was the subject of inquiry before the Committee to which the noble Lord referred, those papers were not examined at the Colonial Office, because the permanent Under Secretary for the Colonies, Mr. Herman Merivale, who was personally acquainted with this gentleman for many years, gave him so strong a recommendation on professional and general grounds, that it was not thought necessary, there being no other competitor for the office, to go minutely into the papers which he sent in, and under those circumstances the Duke of Newcastle, when he made that appointment, was totally unaware that Mr. Stonor's name had been introduced before any Election Committee whatever. Mr. Stonor received the appointment, and sailed with his family for Australia, imagining that his character had been cleared and the matter conclusively settled. But in the month of March, when he was on the high seas, the subject of his appointment was brought before this House, and attention was directed to the fact that a Report involving a serious imputation of bribery against him at the election for Sligo had been made in the preceding June. That fact, coming for the first time to their knowledge, the Government felt themselves unwillingly compelled to take the course which they would have taken if they had known it at the time, and cancelled the appointment, notwithstanding the extreme hardship of sending a gentleman across the world, to be met on his reaching the Antipodes with the statement that he was not to receive the appointment, for the sake of which he had gone out. Still, so much deference was deemed to be due to the Report of an Election Committee, and to the feeling naturally entertained in this House, that the Government thought that, under the peculiar circumstances, and especially so soon after that Report, an appointment of that description ought not to be made. The noble Lord is quite in error in supposing that that appointment was cancelled in accordance with the Report of a Committee, seconded by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The fact was not so; it was cancelled in March, almost as soon as it was mentioned in this House. The Committee was afterwards appointed to inquire into the conduct of the Government, and ascertain whether there had been any corrupt electioneering or political motive on their part in making the appointment. I need not say it turned out that there was no ground whatever for any such imputation against them. Mr. Stonor was met at the Antipodes with a communication that his appointment was withdrawn, and he returned with his family. In the meantime he had lost his practice and his position in this country, to which he came back with the stigma attached to him arising from these circumstances. Now, is it true that he had been found guilty of corruption? It is true that the Election Committee, in the discharge of their duty, made a Report in which they pointed out that an Alderman of Sligo, named O'Donovan, was bribed by Mr. Stonor by the promise of a payment of £203, being a portion of an outstanding election account, to forbear giving his vote which he had promised to Mr. Somers, and in consequence absented himself during the election. But so unsatisfactory was the evidence on which that finding was arrived at by the Committee, that it was carried in the Committee only by a majority of one, two to three opposing it, those two being Members belonging to opposite sides of this House, who rose in their places to protest emphatically against the decision as not being warranted by the evidence. Having myself read that evidence, I must say I am decidedly of opinion that the decision was not warranted. These very just observations were made by two distinguished Members of this House at the time when the Committee reported—namely, by Mr. Stuart Wortley and the

hon. and learned Member for Sheffield. Mr. Stuart Wortley said—

“He did not accept the decision of the Committee as decisive of Mr. Stonor's guilt. After looking at the evidence laid before the Committee, and considering the divisions in the Committee, he must say that it was extremely doubtful whether or not Mr. Stonor was guilty of bribery.”

Mr. Roebuck also said—

“The decision of the Committee was to be held as conclusive with regard to the objects for which they were appointed; but not with regard to personal character.”

Well, Mr. Stonor did all that a man could do to vindicate himself. He had suffered in his prospects, he had gone across the world, and was met there in the cruel manner I have described. It was naturally felt when he came back that his case required to be considered, and that if this gentleman had not really been proved on sufficient grounds to be guilty of corruption he had some claim upon the Government. In the meantime the Government had changed, and I am happy to say, for the honour of this House, that, in 1857, Mr. Stonor received in this House as ample amends for what he had suffered as he could reasonably expect. Lord John Russell on the 5th of June in that year put a question to Mr. Labouchere, then Secretary of State for the Colonies, and after referring to the circumstances, that noble Lord said—

“Without entering into particulars, I think I may fairly say that there was some misconception with regard to the imputations which were made against Mr. Stonor; at least, I was convinced when I was Secretary for the Colonies that if a vacancy should occur in any office which Mr. Stonor was competent to fill, no imputation rested upon his character, and I should be prepared to recommend him to the Crown for public employment. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies is aware of the circumstances, to which I have alluded; and I wish to ask him whether, in his opinion, there is any circumstance affecting the character of Mr. Stonor which would disqualify him for appointment to a public office.”—[3 Hansard, cxlv. 1214.]

Mr. Labouchere said that, having regard to the circumstances, he did not think it expedient at that time to offer Mr. Stonor a colonial appointment, because he had been sent out to one colony, and if he were then appointed to another, the colonists might not properly understand the circumstances, but, he added—

“I said that I had looked into the circumstances of the case; that the impression upon my mind was that they formed no permanent disqualification to his employment in the colonial service, and that I should have no difficulty in recommending him to the Crown for any office in this country for which he might be competent.”—[3 Hansard, cxlv. 1215.]

Mr. Horsman and Mr. Malins also addressed the House on that occasion, both stating that they thought Mr. Stonor had been hardly dealt with, and that his case was one which was well entitled to the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. In the next year, 1858, Mr. Labouchere did appoint Mr. Stonor to a judicial office of great responsibility and importance—namely, that of sole Judge of the West India Incumbered Estates Court. From that day to this year Mr. Stonor, with great ability and assiduity, and without reproach or question of any kind, discharged the duties of that office, and he has now been permitted—I believe the House will think rightly permitted—to exchange it for the position of a County Court Judge. Sir, for Mr. Stonor's sake I am not sorry that this question has been asked, and I trust that this explanation will be deemed satisfactory by the House.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: Sir, I am desirous of appealing to you upon the fact that the Attorney General, in rising to reply to my inquiry, said that my Question contained more misstatements than one. Now, I appeal to you, Sir, whether one Member is to be allowed to make a statement of that character without another Member personally referred to being allowed the opportunity of a reply?

MR. SPEAKER intimated that the noble Lord was not in order.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that if necessary he would move the adjournment of the House.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: I, of course, Sir, meant that the errors made by the noble Lord were accidental errors. He said that the appointment was cancelled in consequence of the Report of a Committee. That is a mistake. The other statement made by the noble Lord was that Mr. Stonor had been found guilty of corruption. That is also, I think, a mistake, because the Election Committee had no authority to try Mr. Stonor.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: I would ask one more question with reference to this appointment—namely, whether, in the opinion of the hon. and learned Attorney General, it is quite impossible to have found a single honest lawyer to fill it?

RANK OF MASTER IN THE NAVY.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Ad-

miralty, Whether the question of retaining in the Royal Navy the rank of Master was not referred by the Board of Admiralty to a Committee; and, if so, whether he will lay upon the table a Copy of the Report of that Committee and the evidence they received?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, in reply, that a Committee had been appointed to consider the question, and they reported the evidence which came before them. The volumes, however, were too bulky to be produced in the ordinary way. He, however, proposed to lay a few copies on the table of the Library. If the right hon. Baronet should move that the evidence be printed and laid upon the table of the House he should have no objection.

PAROCHIAL MEDICAL RELIEF.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he would beg to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether the Poor Law Board intend in this Session to take any, and, if any, what steps to carry out the recommendation of the Select Committee on Poor Relief, that in future, cod liver oil, quinine and other expensive medicines shall be provided at the expense of the guardians, and not, as heretofore, by the parochial medical officers?

MR. FERRAND said, he also wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman when he proposed to go into Committee on the Union Chargeability Bill?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, in reply, that a great deal of correspondence had taken place between the Poor Law Board and the guardians of the poor throughout the country on the subject referred to by the hon. Baronet (Sir John Shelley), and he did not despair of inducing the guardians generally to adopt the recommendation of the Select Committee. Difficulties existed through the contracts entered into with the medical officers, some of those contracts being made with the medical officers for life, and there had therefore been an unwillingness to disturb them. In other instances the contracts were annual, and in those latter cases the Poor Law Board would insist on the adoption of the Committee's recommendations.

RUMOURED RESIDENCE OF THE POPE IN ENGLAND.—QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE, in rising to put the question of which he had given notice, was met by loud and derisive cheers from Members below the gangway. Sir, this is not the first occasion upon which I have been met in the same manner. I beg, by way of explanation of the question I am about to ask, to refer hon. Members to the 162nd volume of Hansard, page 1183, April 28, 1861. I now beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the attention of the Government has been directed to a Speech recently made in the Senate of France by the Cardinal de Bonnechose, and to the articles in the public press, especially the Journal des Débats, thereon, which appear to contemplate that, under certain circumstances, the Pope may intend to reside within the United Kingdom; and whether, considering the tenor of the Diplomatic Relations Act, and the fact that the Pope cannot divest himself of the attributes, he claims for his office; and the relation, in which certain Roman Catholic ecclesiastics and others, claiming the privileges of British subjects, appear to believe that they stand towards the Pope, it is the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, that it is expedient, with a view to the internal harmony and to the external peace of this Country, that the Pope should be invited or permitted to reside within the United Kingdom?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, with regard to the first part of the question of the hon. Gentleman, I may say that I have every day so many things to read, and so much to write, and so many persons to see, that I am unable to follow up, as other persons may do, what passes in foreign assemblies, or what appears in foreign papers, and therefore my attention was not called to the speech to which the hon. Gentleman refers till this afternoon, when, driving down to the House, I had the opportunity of reading an extract of what was alleged to have been said by the Cardinal de Bonnechose. I may say, in passing, that I am sorry to see that that rev. prelate described England as the natural enemy of France. One may be excused for thinking that he is not a proper judge in these matters. I have not seen the article in the Journal des Débats. All I can say is that the question of the hon. Gentleman anticipates the future, and implies a decision on future events, which are at present involved in great doubt. The hon. Gentleman assumes that at the end of two years, fixed by the Convention of September, the Pope will be obliged to quit Rome. That may be or may not be. But with regard to the latter part of the question, entertaining as Her Majesty's Government do, and as I am sure everybody does, the greatest respect for the Pope personally, and as the head of that great community of Christians, the Catholic Church, we should be glad to show in any proper manner that respect which we feel; but with regard to the Pope's coming and taking up his residence in England, there are so many objections to it which must strike everybody's mind that one may fairly say it would be a political solecism, or rather, I should say, a political anachronism. It is well known, however, from papers that have been laid on the table, that about a year and a half ago, when the question did arise as to the possibility of the Pope having to quit Rome, Mr. Russell, representing the British Government at Rome, stated that if circumstances induced the Pope to seek to establish his residence out of Italy, and if it were convenient and agreeable to him to reside at Malta, every attention would be paid to his comfort, and a suitable residence would be provided for him. That is my answer to the question of the hon. Gentleman.

LAW OF LANDLORD AND TENANT IN IRELAND.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. MAGUIRE craved the indulgence of the House while he brought before it a question of very great and grave importance, not only to the people of Ireland, who were immediately interested in the solution of the question, but also to the people of England, who were directly as well as indirectly interested in the prosperity of Ireland. The question was not one of sentiment or feeling. To those whom he represented it was, without exaggeration, a matter of life or death. The demand he had to make was one to which Parliament ought to accede. There was no Member who represented a popular constituency in Ireland, no representative of any of the three southern provinces, who would not say that the state of things in that country was most unsatisfactory, and that it was the duty of Parliament to inquire into the cause of that condition of things. He asked no immediate and direct change in any law affecting the rights of the property and industry; he simply asked for inquiry. The question was not only important, but full of difficulty and delicacy, and he therefore asked that it should be referred to a Select Committee, consisting of the best, the wisest, and the most experienced Members; that evidence should, if necessary, be taken to ascertain distinctly what was the real state of Ireland, and how far it was influenced by the condition of the laws affecting the tenure of land; that the Committee should weigh that evidence, and make a Report to the House; and, although there should be no legislation this year, as it was almost impossible there could, they might, at least, during the present Session lay the foundation, through that Report, for future legislation. Inquiry did not pledge the House to legislation; but the natural result of inquiry, he maintained, would be legislation; for he believed that inquiry must lead to the irresistible conclusion, that the people of Ireland had no chance of prosperity without a wholesome change in the law of landlord and tenant. But if the majority of the Committee should decide that there was no necessity for legislation, he should, to a certain extent, having proposed that mode of inquiry, be bound by their decision. At the same time, he felt the fullest conviction that the more they inquired, the more were they likely to arrive at the real cause of the misery and the mischief existing in Ireland, and that it would be the duty of Parliament to apply a substantial remedy for the grievances of the people. But why legislate for Ireland, and not legislate for England? In order to understand why legislation was imperatively called for in one country and not in the other, it would be necessary to glance for a moment at the different circumstances of the two countries, and the vast difference between their relative resources. There was a great and broad distinction between England and Ireland. It was humanly impossible to find two countries linked together so different the one from the other. England was one of the most powerful, the greatest, and the most progressive countries upon the face of the earth; but he confessed that he felt great pain when he contrasted her glorious condition with the miserable condition of Ireland, which they were to be part and parcel of the same Empire.

Every day new sources of enterprize, industry, and progress were being opened in England, and he had only to take a single fact to show the wonderful difference between the two countries. In 1862 they might say that the hum of the loom was no longer heard in Lancashire, and there were 500,000 persons dependent upon the charity of the affluent or the rates of that impoverished and embarrassed district. At that time, and the year before, there were indifferent harvests in England; but what practical effect had the cotton famine and indifferent harvests upon the finances of the country? Why, instead of diminishing her wealth, the trade and commerce of the country so far expanded that we had an increased revenue, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer was able to produce and carry a popular Budget. Ireland at that time had three bad harvests, but instead of participating in the prosperity of England, she was steeped in poverty, and there was a rush of her despairing people from her shores. What caused England to be so prosperous in the midst of her temporary adversity, or rather local calamity, was that she did not depend entirely, or in any great degree, upon her agriculture; whilst in Ireland it was directly opposite. In the north of Ireland there was one great branch of industry, and he would gladly see it extended to other parts of the country, because it would help to render the country independent, or nearly so, of agriculture. There had been three bad harvests in Ireland—in 1860, 1861, and 1862; and the consequence was that every class was deeply embarrassed, except those who were interested in some branch of manufactures which did not depend upon local consumption. No one was more fully alive than he was to the value of manufactures, and the absolute necessity of endeavouring to promote them in Ireland. Every class in Ireland, whether resident in town or country, was greatly affected by the state of agriculture—its success or its failure; and he contended it was the bounden duty of every Irishman, apart from all political and religious feeling, to endeavour by every means to establish in various parts branches of industry, in order to make the country less dependent on the result of the harvest. He had himself some steps in that direction, with a view to promote his own interests of the community. At present sent an indifferent harvest in Ireland was felt by all classes, including those engaged in trade, commerce, and those branches of manufacture which supplied the necessaries or the comforts of life. But a failure of the harvest was a fearful blow; it not only depressed the entire population, but it paralyzed almost every branch of native industry. This was because the circumstances of the two countries were so entirely opposed—the one being independent of her agriculture, the other being almost wholly dependent upon it. And this was the difference which he would have Englishmen bear in mind, for it was the justification of the demand for exceptional legislation. But look at the difference between those engaged in farming operations in the two countries. An English farmer was not so dependent on the land for his means of livelihood as the Irish farmer was. If a farmer in England was compelled to adopt another mode of gaining a livelihood, or was driven from his farm by an unjust landlord (and he was glad to say there were few unjust landlords in this country), was he thereby reduced to beggary or emigration? Nothing of the kind; he went into the neighbouring town, distant perhaps two or five miles from his farm, and there found employment, if not for himself, certainly for the members of his family; and if he had a little capital in his possession he found many ways of turning it to account. But how different was the case of the Irish farmer! The evicted Irishman had no resource open to him, no alternative save emigration or beggary. If he remained in the country, not having means or energy to emigrate, he crept with his wretched family into the next town, and soon sank into a state of abject misery, and it too often happened that his wretched children swelled the ranks of its criminal population. It being then the fact that the people of Ireland were almost wholly dependent upon the land, the question was, how was that land circumstanced; what was the state of its agriculture; what was the position of those who tilled the soil, and what was the general feeling of the community with reference to those laws which regulated the relations between landlord and tenant? What was the condition of Irish agriculture? He would simply appeal to an eminent authority—one who ought to be an authority with the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin and his friends—to Judge Longfield.

That eminent authority lately described it as being “in a very backward state.” He would likewise appeal to the testimony, not only of the Irish Members, but of any English Gentleman who visited Ireland, as to the state of Irish agriculture, and the striking contrast which it presented to the appearance and condition of the land in England. All must agree with Judge Longfield that agriculture in Ireland was in a very backward condition, and he could assure the House on good authority that the soil was not half cultivated, leaving out of consideration altogether the large tracts of waste lands. The farms and estates in the country were practically not half cultivated. Supposing that they could get, not to say one-half, but even one-third more out of the soil than at present, was it not worth the consideration of Parliament whether they could not devise some means by which the people would be induced to make an effort to obtain from the soil the largest possible amount of produce? The importance of increasing the produce of the land would be admitted on all hands, because it would not only add to the prosperity of the Irish people, but increase the wealth of the Empire. The dwellings of those in the agricultural districts were miserable, their food was of the meanest description, and, according to the farmers’ own account, their prospects were most dismal. That there were many good and generous landlords in Ireland was what no one would venture to deny; but, on the other hand, there were hundreds, he was almost afraid to say thousands, who were not actuated solely by a spirit of justice, but who regarded the people upon the soil merely as a means of raising a good interest upon the money they had expended. It might be said that Ireland had been materially benefited by the new race of landlords, but he denied that. [Mr. WHITESIDE: Hear, hear!] If, then, there were bad landlords of the old class and bad of the new, and that those who were the real wealth of the country were at the mercy of these men, it became the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin and that House, not only for the sake of Ireland, but for the sake of England’s honour, to interfere, and compel bad men to do by law what good men did by the inspirations of conscience. Unfortunately, many of the new landlords, as well as of the old, had adopted the practice of clearing their properties for the purpose of increasing the size of their farms. The unsatisfactory condition of Ireland was attributed by some to the existence of a surplus population, by others to the smallness of the farms, and by a third class to the want of capital. He was firmly convinced that Ireland was perfectly able to support, in decency and happiness, a population fully equal to its present number. He could quote many authorities of high rank to prove that Ireland, with its mild and temperate climate and fertile soil, was well able to support five and a half millions of people. Even supposing, however, that the population was superabundant, the evil was one which was adjusting itself day by day, and he would venture to assert that five years hence the present population would be diminished by fully one-fifth. He felt convinced that if the American war were to terminate during the present year, the emigration from the shores of Ireland would be unparalleled. In that belief those who were best acquainted with the country, and with the feelings, desires, and aspirations of its people concurred. Therefore, assuming for the sake of argument, that the population was too great for the resources of the country, which he emphatically denied, and that the surplus population was the barrier to the country's improvement, that evil, imaginary as it was, would soon cease to exist. Then as to the prevalence of small farms, it would be found that the majority of the small farms were situated in the north of Ireland. Fully one-half of the small farms of Ireland were to be found in the province of Ulster, and in that province there was comparative prosperity. No doubt that fact was in some measure attributable to the linen trade in that province—a condition which placed its inhabitants comparatively above the disastrous influences of a bad harvest. But hon. Members connected with that part of the country knew perfectly well that there was a custom existing in that province, not, perhaps, recognized by law, but which was regarded as binding upon the landlords, and practically acknowledged by them, and that the state of things in the county of Antrim, as far as the protection extended to the tenant was concerned, was very different from the practice which prevailed in Tipperary. Besides, the number of small farms had enormously decreased, while the number of large farms had correspondingly increased. So that evil, if it ever was one, was being steadily diminished. Then it was said that nothing could be done for the Irish farmer so long as he lacked capital—that want of capital was the great evil of the country. He maintained that the unfortunate condition of Ireland was not in any way attributable to a deficiency of capital. This had been abundantly demonstrated. As a proof that there was no deficiency in this respect, it had been shown that Irishmen had purchased £25,000,000 of Irish property during the last dozen years. At the present moment the joint-stock banks of Ireland contained deposits to the amount of £14,000,000, and it was well known that these deposits had been made not by the mercantile classes, but mostly by those engaged in agriculture, who were thus compelled to hide in the banks what they dared not invest in the land. But was there not a more valuable capital still—was there not the labour of the people? It was the capital of the greatest value, without which all other capital would be useless. It was the capital that enriched other countries, and would enrich Ireland if it were expended on its soil. Not only did the capital in the banks lie dormant and unproductive to the farming class, but the intelligence, energy, and labour of the people were paralyzed by the operation of an injurious law. The present condition of Ireland was, in reality, owing to the absence of any security in the tenure of the land, and to the absence of security in the enjoyment of the fruits of labour. The real cause of the state of things was a want of security of tenure to give enjoyment of the fruits of industry, and to induce tenants to expend money or labour upon the soil or in the soil—a want of inducement to do more than merely drag from the soil what could be easily taken from it, or to place upon it those miserable habitations which were, in too many instances, a disgrace to a civilized country. Then it was said that there was no use in Irishmen struggling against the designs of Providence, for that the climate of Ireland was unsuited to tillage. The late Viceroy of Ireland had laid down the dogma that Ireland was intended by nature to be the mother of flocks and herds. He regarded that doctrine, however, as the most pernicious which had for a long time been promulgated by any one high in authority. It was preached to those who were only too ready to receive it, and to act upon its fatal promptings. He altogether denied the truth of that dogma. It was a daring misinterpretation of the designs of that benevolent Providence who fitted the soil for the people and the people for the soil. It was not because they had one or two, or three bad seasons in Ireland that there was no hope for the country, but to banish the people, and for a brave peasantry to substitute fat oxen. It would not be uninstrusive to those who were inclined to take a despairing view of the climate of Ireland and contrast it with another country in which the peasantry were prosperous and contented, notwithstanding that its climate could bear no comparison to that of Ireland. That country was Switzerland. Take a valuable authority—Sismondi says—

“It is Switzerland that must be seen, to judge of the happiness of peasant proprietors. Switzerland has only to be known, to convince us that agriculture, practised by those who enjoy the fruits of it, suffices to procure great comfort to a very numerous population, great independence of character, the fruit of an independent situation, and great exchange of what is consumed; the consequence of the well-being of all the inhabitants, even in a country where the climate is rude, the soil but moderately fertile, and where late frosts and uncertain seasons often destroy the hopes of the labourer.”

And he goes on to describe the interior of the cottages of the peasantry, who have to gather their harvests amidst the ravines and on the mountain sides of Switzerland, as being full of comfort and abundance, such as to excite the envy, not of the poor Irish farmers, but of the sturdy English yeoman. Kay, in his Social Condition of Europe, speaks in the same way (pages 13 and 14)—

“It would astonish the English people to see how intensely the peasants of France, Germany, Switzerland, and Holland labour in their fields. The whole of the farmer's family assists. It is not unwilling drudgery, but a toil in which they feel pleasure; for they know the harder they labour the greater will be their profits, and the better means of subsistence. There is always something to be done. When they can work in the fields they are opening drains, breaking up lumps of earth, spreading manure, digging, cleaning, weeding, sowing, or gathering. When they cannot work in the fields they are putting the farm-yards and farm-buildings into order, white-washing, repairing walls, mixing or preparing manures, or doing something in preparation for their out-door occupations. They do all this, be it remembered, for themselves, and they take real pleasure in the work, and do it ten times better and more expeditiously than the poor, hired, ignorant peasants who have nothing to look forward to but to remain peasants for ever.”

He (Mr. Maguire) was not going to ask Parliament to accomplish a revolution, and convert the tenantry of Ireland into a peasant proprietary, as had been done in many countries with great advantage to the happiness of its people and to its real strength. That such a change would be beneficial he thoroughly believed; but he knew that the slightest approach to such a proposition would be repugnant to the feudal notions of that eminently landlord Assembly, and that he should be cried down as a revolutionist if he asked for its consideration. Why, then, did he refer to this state of things? Simply to show what security of tenure, by whatever name it may be called, or by whatever management it may be secured can effect. Arthur Young said that the magic of property had the power of converting sand into gold. He said—

“Give a man the secure possession of a bleak rock, and he will convert it into a garden, give him a nine year's lease, and he will convert a garden into a desert.”

The farming classes of Ireland, however, did not ask to be peasant proprietors, nor would any Irishman prefer such a demand on their behalf. What they asked for was security for their industry and their capital, and the opportunity of expending both without risk. About two months since he had attended a meeting in Dublin at which several Roman Catholic bishops were present, and, though the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for Ireland might object to a Roman Catholic bishop, or, indeed, any bishop taking part in such mundane matters, he thought that bishops and clergymen alike were only performing their duty as citizens in identifying themselves with any movement having for its object the amelioration of laws injuriously affecting the prosperity of their country. They were intimately identified with the people, and none knew better the evil that was mainly at the root of the misery and discontent that existed. One of the Prelates then present was the Right Rev. Dr. Keane, with whom he had the honour of an intimate acquaintance. Dr. Keane was a bishop as remarkable for his saintly life and noble charities as for his deep devotion to the interests of his country and its people. On the occasion he made a most powerful appeal in favour of justice to the industrious tenant, and proclaimed it as his opinion—an opinion held by every Catholic bishop and priest in Ireland—that the land question was the great question of Ireland. A passage from his speech would afford an admirable illustration of the evil operation of the existing system, and the necessity for a change. He said—

“In this want of security is to be found the secret of the tenant's unwillingness to improve, and of the imperfect cultivation and consequent impoverishment of the country. As an illustration I will cite one case, with which, from personal knowledge, I am thoroughly acquainted. A farmer holds about one hundred and twenty acres of land on which there are thirty acres of reclaimable waste. I said to him, ‘Why, with your large family of children and servants, do you not try to make that ground more productive?’ His reply was immediate and clear, ‘I would this day begin the work if I were sure that the fruits of my labour and of the sweat of my children were to be my own. At present I am paying for that waste about five shillings an acre; it is worth to me about seven and sixpence; thus I have by it two and sixpence a year. If I improve that land, as I may do, so as to raise its producing value to twenty-two shillings and sixpence an acre, what can I expect to gain by it more than I do now, when the landlord will be sure to step in and raise the rent to a pound, thus leaving me only the present profit of two and sixpence. I have no notion of making property for the landlord by the sweat of my children.’”

To the present day that district is a waste. Need you be told that similar cases are to be found in every part of Ireland. The Archbishop of Cashel also delivered an address of the most earnest and forcible character, in which he said that no one in his senses would expend his capital in improvements without security if he had freedom of choice in the matter; but the Irish peasant had no freedom of choice, no option—land was to him a necessary of life—as necessary to him, said the Archbishop, as the air he breathed, as the food he eat, and he could no more do without the land than without them. There were tenants who, notwithstanding the precarious nature of their tenure—at will—could not resist the desire to improve, and who did improve; but there were others who were discouraged from improving, to the injury of the estate and of the community at large. It was clear that protection was necessary for the protection of the confiding tenant who did improve, and that it was equally necessary to induce the more cautious tenant to improve his land and his house and farm buildings. This protection could be given by leases and full compensation for all permanent and suitable improvements. One of the greatest evils of the present land system was that there were so few leases. He asked for a Committee with a view to consider what means could be adopted to encourage the granting of leases, or to secure the rights of the improving tenant. It was true that in the north of Ireland there was a greater security, and if all Ireland were in the same condition as the northern portion he would not have to call the attention of the Imperial Parliament to this subject. A Committee was required to ascertain the best mode of encouraging the granting of leases. Leases would give a certain amount of security, and would help to defend the honest man against the rapacity of a dishonest landlord. Let it not be said that there were no evictions now in Ireland and no cruelties practised against improving tenants. Let one case, and that a recent one, serve as an illustration. Within the last month an action was tried at Tullamore, having been removed by the defendant from Meath on the ground that he could not obtain a fair trial in that county. In that action it appeared that the plaintiff was one of thirteen improving tenants, holding at will under the defendant, Mr. Knox. In 1861 notice to quit was served upon them, but they were told that they need not trouble themselves, as they would not be interfered with. In 1863 notice was again served upon them, which was followed up by a demand for possession in September, but they were still told not to fear anything, and an action of ejectment was brought, which they were advised not to defend, as they were perfectly secure. In January, however, the whole of these thirteen improving tenants, with their families, numbering altogether nearly 100 souls, were turned out of their homes by the sheriff, assisted by 200 armed police and soldiers. In the action against the landlord the law was powerful, and a jury of Protestant magistrates mulcted Mr. Knox in £300, damages and costs. But that result was only brought about by the folly of the landlord, who had gone stupidly to work, and exposed himself to a conviction of fraud. If he had simply served notices and followed them up by ejectments in the usual manner, the tenants would have had no ground to appeal to the intervention of the law. And he might thus have got rid of 13,00 as easily as of thirteen. Clarke, the plaintiff, was an improving tenant, who had raised the value of the eighty acres he held fully £2 per acre. But Mr. Knox could not sell his interest to a Mr. Dias until he had got rid of the tenants—cleared off the human incumbrances. This was the terrible policy of the hour, the result of panic or of greed. In his own county he (Mr. Maguire) knew of a case in which fifty-five families were turned off the estate of one of these improving and consolidating landlords. He had heard of a case in Tipperary where the gentleman who had purchased a property would not keep one of the tenants upon it, as he said he wanted cattle, and not men. He warned the Irish landlords that nothing could be more fatal than such a policy. Whenever the war in America ceased, and that great country turned the ensanguined sword into the plough-share, and directed the energies of her people to the pursuits of peace, the consolidating landlords of Ireland who now rely on continued high prices for provisions, would find to their cost that American beef, and pork, and butter, would meet them and undersell them not only in the markets of England, but in the markets of their own country. Their conduct would bring its own punishment, but not before another million of the Irish people had been exterminated. In 1845 Lord Derby showed that the strongest difference existed between the two countries. It was the rule in England for the landlords to do everything but cultivate the soil; it was the rule in Ireland for the landlords to do nothing but receive the rents. No doubt there were exceptions; but they did not legislate for exceptions, but for the rule. In 1860 the House attempted to legislate on this subject. Every statesman who had dealt with this question during the last twenty years had laid it down that the customs of Ireland were different from those in England. The Devon Commission, twenty-one years ago, reported that it was the custom in England for the landlord to do everything for his tenant, while in Ireland the tenant had everything to do for himself; and the law did not secure him any reward for his industry. He believed that the Government acted in good faith when they attempted to legislate in 1860. They brought in several Bills, and passed three of them into law. He gave them credit for good intentions, but they were too timid to grapple with the real state of Ireland. They regarded rather what would be said by England than what was required in Ireland. Judge Longfield, in a recent remarkable address which he made in Dublin, said the Government had been too timid in dealing with the question; and the existing laws were inadequate to the exigencies of the times; and that the Legislature had done too little from fear of doing too much. But the Irish Members were obliged to accept the Tenants' Compensation Act, as it was proposed by the Government. The principle for which they contended was admitted; but the Government were warned that it would not work. And the fact was that only three instances were known in which that Act had been adopted. At the time the Act was passed he (Mr. Maguire) stated that it was too cumbrous, that its machinery was too clumsy, that the provisions made did not include a single adequate inducement to the tenant to make improvements. Besides, the veto of the landlord would prevent any improvement being made by a tenant. At the time that he suggested that useful and necessary improvements ought to be undertaken, even without the consent of the landlord, he was thought to hold some very revolutionary notions. But Judge Longfield, who was neither an agitator, a demagogue, nor an advocate of rash and crude doctrines, expressed the same opinion. He (Mr. Maguire) proposed that a case, in which the landlord objected to an improvement suggested by the tenant, should be referred to the assistant barrister, who, if he found the improvement really of a substantial nature, useful to the tenants, and beneficial to the estate, should allow it to be made, notwithstanding the opposition of the landlord. That Amendment was largely supported; but it was defeated. Yet Lord Derby held a like opinion. In 1845, he spoke in the following words in the House of Lords:—

“In England the right was secured not only by law, but by the custom of the country, which was equivalent to law, and compensation was awarded for improvements, made not only without the consent of the landlord, but if made, without asking his leave for a single one of them.

“That custom, which had the force of law in England, applied to various improvements and outlay of a very limited duration. . . .

“In a great part of the south of England, where there were large quantities of copse-wood and faggot-wood, nothing was more common than to drain with that faggot-wood. The tenant, even the tenant at will, never asked the opinion of his landlord whether he should drain a particular field—he drained it. The work might last twelve, fifteen, or twenty years, and it may not be permanent though durable. And yet without asking leave of the landlord, being a tenant at will, on being ejected by his landlord, would summon him for compensation, and the custom of the country would compel him to pay the tenant. But that was neither the law nor the custom in Ireland, and he asked their lordships to apply that by law in Ireland which by custom had the force of law in England.”

Judge Longfield said it might happen that, from caprice or mistaken judgment, the landlord might refuse to enter into any contract with regard to improvements. In that case Judge Longfield was of opinion that the tenant ought to have the right to summon the landlord before the Court of Quarter Sessions, and secure the carrying out of these improvements, unless good cause was shown to the contrary; adding that to prevent abuse it might be necessary to affix a limit to the amount which at one time might be chargeable upon the land as compensation for improvements, and that a provision might also be introduced exonerating the landlord's successor from liability on the termination of the lease, provided he granted a new lease for the term of thirty-one years without any increase of rent. What was required for Ireland was a law to make the bad or indifferent landlords do by compulsion of law what others did as a matter of wisdom and humanity. One of the best landlords in Ireland was the Earl of Devon, who gave leases wherever they were demanded, recognized the right of the tenant to sell his improvements, and gave all kinds of encouragement to his tenantry. He (Mr. Maguire) had heard tenants of Lord Devon, with tears of gratitude on their cheeks, pour down blessings on his head, and hold him up as a model of what a landlord should be. Again, the Earl of Carysfort, speaking to the Rev. Mr. Redmond, said—

“I wish to impose not an extraordinary, but a medium rent, in order that the good years may answer for the bad; and I wish my tenants to have leases, that they may be encouraged to improve their holdings and to enjoy their improvements, because I do not wish to deprive them of them or to benefit by them.”

As the priest said, these words ought to be carved in letters of gold on a pillar raised in honour of this nobleman. It was surely not too much to ask that the bad or indifferent landlord should be made to act in the same spirit as the good landlord. He wished the Committee to inquire into the whole subject, and to see whether any improvement could be made to stem the tide of emigration which was weakening the strength of Ireland and of the Empire. If the population of Ireland were diminished by two millions of people more, the power of recruiting there would be lost; and what then would become of the military strength of the kingdom? Some gentlemen from Ireland secretly rejoiced in their hearts, he believed, that the population of their country was becoming less; but he knew they were wrong. A friend of his, carrying on a large trade in the city in which he resided, and supplying many towns in the south of Ireland to a distance of 100 miles from Cork, told him that the diminution of the population was more and more affecting trade. The young, strong, and vigorous, who formed the strength of all other nations, were leaving Ireland. There were, it was true, two sides to this emigration question. He freely admitted that emigration was a benefit to an individual if he could improve his condition by quitting his country; but how many suffered moral shipwreck—were ruined on reaching America! How many young girls, once the light and ornament of their humble homes, were now walking as painted prostitutes in the streets of the great cities in America and the colonies. They fell victims to their helpless position. Without money or friends in a strange place, bewildered and helpless, they yielded to the tempter, and were lost for ever. There was a curse on those who, directly or indirectly, had brought ruin not only on the bodies but on the souls of thousands of girls belonging to his country. He wanted to keep these young people of the country at home; and he did believe that that could not be done until the farmers had a security that if they improved their land the rent would not be raised to an impossible standard, or that the houses they built, and the improvements they made, would not become the property of their landlords. If the present condition of things were to continue, the country towns would be brought to a state of collapse, become an assembly of ruined habitations, and the trade would be destroyed, because of the departure of vast numbers of the people from the country, and of the inability of those who remained to spend money on the ordinary comforts of life. He did not wish to deprive the landlords of a single right, or to make peasant proprietors of Irish tenants, but he wanted Parliament to inquire how security and confidence might be given to the Irish farmer. He did not desire to call before the Committee theorists and revolutionists, for it was not his intention to touch the rights of the landlords, though he wished the rights of the poor man to be protected, for they ought to be as sacred, and they were not protected at the present moment. Let not the question be bandied about from Government to Government, or from party to party. It was a thing to be grappled with, and the Ministers who could not grapple with it were unworthy to occupy the place of power. Let them rise up to the dignity and responsibility of their position. They were ready at any time to sacrifice their hold of power on some wretched, trumpery foreign question ; but here was an evil at their very door, and would they not have the courage to deal with it ? With regard to the law of distress, he would suggest that it should be abolished, unless in cases where a landlord gave a thirty-one years' lease. That would constitute one inducement to grant a lease, and the Committee would consider what other inducements could be offered. He had now concluded the explanation of his case. He had made use of no glittering rhetorical language, but, speaking as a plain man to an intelligent Assembly, he had endeavoured to state his views clearly and distinctly. He took issue with the noble Lord at the head of the Government, who had said that tenant's-right was landlord's wrong ; for, tested by the north of Ireland, tenant-right was not landlord wrong. If, carried away by momentary warmth, in the course of his observations he had said anything which might be thought as meant to offend any class, party, or person, he assured the House that such was not his intention. The deepest interests of his country were involved in the question ; and, if it were fairly settled, the people of Ireland, instead of leaving the soil of their forefathers and being scattered as exiles over the earth, would remain at home, and having acquired a stake and interest in the country, would become its protectors against invasion, and the defenders of peace and order. But if the settlement of the question should be neglected then the life blood of the country would drain away, and the Parliament and Government that declined to interfere in the matter would stand as judged and condemned before God and man.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in seconding the Motion, said, he was well aware the House might feel that the subject was one upon which he had no right to address them. In the first place his hon. Friend, who, from his intense sympathy for his countrymen, his knowledge, position, and experience, was so well qualified to bring it before them, had almost exhausted it. But besides that the question was an Irish and a legal one, and he (Mr. W. E.

Forster) was an Englishman and no lawyer. He should, therefore, have contented himself with one or two words of emphatic agreement with his hon. Friend if he had not heard—though he scarcely believed it possible—that the Government did not intend to grant this most moderate request. Under these circumstances, therefore, he trusted that they would allow him to make a few remarks, especially as the House, the vast majority of whose Members were neither Irishmen nor lawyers, had to govern Ireland and to deal with questions of law. He approached the subject, then, from an English and from an Imperial point of view, and he declared that, in his opinion, the case of his hon. Friend was irresistibly strong. In 1860, the Government of the noble Viscount, sensible of the long acknowledged evils arising from the unsatisfactory condition of land tenure in Ireland, and that they would be left no longer without a remedy, brought in a Bill ; and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) in his speech—which he (Mr. W. E. Forster) had lately had the pleasure of reading—gave the reasons why they took that step. The Bill passed ; but it was universally admitted to have proved a dead letter. There were Members in the House who had prophesied that it would fail, and their prophesies, though disregarded at the time, had turned out to be true. That being the case, his hon. Friend now came forward and said that men of eminence and knowledge on the subject had made practical suggestions which would render the Act of 1860 operative ; and he simply asked the House to grant him a Committee to test those practical suggestions with a view, in the event of their being ascertained to be well founded, to enable the Government to frame a Bill which might carry with it every assurance of success. But it was said, why did not the hon. Gentleman bring in a Bill himself ? No doubt, he might have done so, but surely the course which he had taken was a more reasonable one. In a word, the case for the Motion appeared to him so plain that he could not understand why the Government should hesitate to give it their sanction. Was it because the evil was less pressing now than it was in 1860 ? In reality it was worse. There was greater distress and greater discontent ; and the small farmers were flying from the country faster than they were four years ago. There might be differences of opinion as to how far emigration from Ireland was desirable, though he must say it seemed a heartless reply, when the country was becoming under-peopled on account of the misery and starvation of its inhabitants, to quote statistics showing that the result might be better for those that remained at home. At any rate they ought not to be driven to wholesale expatriation from any faults of legislation. Besides, the class that was going away was precisely that which a wise Government would wish to keep at home; for were they not the hardworking, saving men, who took out not only their strong arms, but their capital? The fact was that farming at present did not and could not pay in Ireland. It could not compete in the world's market with those to whom we had opened that market by reason of the restrictions under which it lay. It might be said that this was the result of free trade. His hon. Friend, however, had not said so, for he knew too well that whatever embarrassment free trade might have caused the farmer, it had saved the labourer, who would have starved without it. But there was after all, in farming, no free trade in Ireland. Free trade in farming meant freedom in the whole operations of farming. It did not mean merely the right of the consumer to buy where he pleased, but it meant also the right of the producer to plant, and sow, and reap, without restraint. But there were legal conditions attached to the occupation of land in Ireland which prevented the application of the tenant's capital to the soil without a reasonable fear that it would be taken from him. Therefore he (Mr. W. E. Forster) contended that there was not free trade in Ireland. Let it not be said that the restrictions to which he alluded had no existence but in imagination. They had been admitted by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) who had brought in the Act of 1860. In introducing the Act of 1860, the present Secretary of State for the Colonies said—

"This is the foundation of all legislation on this subject—that the law and practice as they exist in England and Scotland have differed from the law and practice as they have existed in Ireland."

In Ireland the landlord did not effect improvements himself but left them to the tenant. Judge Longfield stated that that Act would have succeeded if Parliament had been a little bolder. The right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) would perhaps say that if the House agreed to this Motion, it would only excite false expectations in Ireland. But those expectations already existed. Did any one imagine that a man in the position and speaking with the authority of Judge Longfield, could come forward and say, "This Act does not work, but I will show you how, by introducing a few improvements, it might be made to work." Did any one imagine that Judge Longfield could say that without creating expectations? The House was often delighted with good jokes from the right hon. Baronet—for he sat on a Bench from which good jokes oftener proceeded than good measures—but if the right hon. Gentleman would come forward and assert that Judge Longfield's speech had created no expectation, the mere assertion would be about the most desperate attempt at a joke the House had ever heard. His hon. Friend (Mr. Maguire) had alluded to a remark which had been made from the Treasury Bench, by way, he supposed, of reply by anticipation to any Motion of the kind now before the House—the remark of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston), that "tenant's right was landlord's wrong." His hon. Friend had rightly said that antitheses were dangerous, especially just before an election, when they could be made of more use as "cries" against you than in your favour. But forgetting for the moment the noble Viscount's magnificent disregard for electioneering considerations, let them just think what was the meaning of this remark. What was tenant right? So far as he (Mr. Forster) understood the statements of Judge Longfield—who had long presided over a Court which brought him into the most intimate contact with the relations subsisting between landlord and tenant—he did not ask for fixity of tenure, or compulsory settlement of rent, which were the two things it was often supposed to signify. He understood Judge Longfield to mean simply and solely the right of the farmer to carry on his business in the only way in which he had a chance of doing it with success—the right of the farmer to be allowed to invest his capital in the soil in building and draining, without fear of his landlord fining him for so doing, by raising his rent, or punishing him by ejecting him—the right of the tenant, in short, to be delivered from his fear of being robbed of his capital by his landlord. The very Act which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) had passed was really an acknowledgment that such robbery might take place. But he supposed that the right hon. Gentleman would say that that Act went as far as the rights of property would allow. The present state of the law gave the landlord, who would make no improvements himself, the power of acting like the dog in the manger and forbidding the tenant to make them. Well, it was not now asked that the landlord should be deprived of the power of preventing the tenant from effecting improvements. How far, then, would Judge Longfield go? What they asked was that, to quote a very good phrase of the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil), the presumption should always be in favour of compensation; that the tenant should have a right to make improvements without being obliged to serve his landlord with three months' notice; and that his landlord should not be able to fine him by raising his rent, or to punish him by ejectment, without compensation, until at least reference had been made to some impartial tribunal. Such was their request. It only needed the refusal of such reasonable demands for a few years to raise far more awkward questions—questions which, because they had not been answered, had led to important social changes in France and Germany; questions which, because they had been practically answered in England, had enabled the relations of landlord and tenant to remain in this country as they were. Those, however, who wished for the continuance of those relations in England had good grounds most earnestly to hope that such questions on the matter should not be even mooted in Ireland. Besides, had not property its duties as well as its rights? And could there be a clearer duty resting on the owner of the soil than that if he did not or could not himself improve it, so as to make it more productive of human food, he should not prevent its improvement by others? Well, that was all that was asked; and he (Mr. Forster) could not for a moment suppose that the House, composed though it was of a majority of landowners, would say that it was determined to assent to any state of the law that would enable landlords not only to neglect but to transgress their duties. But it might be asked, was there any need for a special law of landlord and tenant at all? ["Hear!"] He perfectly agreed with those who cheered that question. He thought it would be well if there had been fewer laws respecting landlord and tenant, and if their relations had been left to the principle of supply and demand, as in England. But the position of the parties was not the same in the two countries, as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) had admitted, when he brought in his Bill of 1860. He had occasion to visit Ireland during the crisis of the famine, and the poverty, and suffering, the hunger, and the scenes of woe wide-spread over the country, which he then witnessed, would haunt him till his dying day. He felt then, and he felt now, that every one who had any power, however humble, in that House or the country, was bound to use it in order, if possible, to find out how far that misery was caused by the state of the law, and how far its continuance depended on it. He was very far from saying anything against the conduct of the landlords, in which he was glad to say there was much to admire. He had seen what they did on that occasion, and the sacrifices they made for their tenantry. But he could not forget that they were the inheritors of an unjust settlement; and however much he might wish to sweep the past into utter oblivion, he could not help asking himself whether causes were still at work that had in any degree contributed to the catastrophe of 1848? Even admitting that the state of Ireland was the same as that of England, the question of landlord and tenant in the former country could not be left to the natural law of supply and demand. Before that could be done they must not only free the demand, but they must unfetter the supply. When they were enabled to say that there were no restrictions upon the sale or use of land, and when they had swept away all remains of the feudal system, then, but not till then, they might with safety leave the soil to the rule of supply and demand. Make the land as free as consols or any other article, and then they might leave it to the operation of economic laws. But they had special legislation already. Twenty years ago Chief Justice Pennefather declared from the bench that the whole law was framed in the interest of the landlord, and that that of the tenant had never entered into its consideration. This, be it remembered, was the language of no demagogue, but the solemn statement of the Chief Justice of Ireland. No doubt attempts had since been made at legislation somewhat more in the interest of the tenant; but no one would deny that the balance was still greatly in favour of the landlord. His hon. Friend had referred to the law of provements, or so-called improvements, which had not previously received the sanction of the landlord. It would be manifestly unjust that the landlord should be called upon to pay for changes which he might not think improvements, and which had been made without his sanction, or even against his will. In the second place, in any future legislation the principle ought to be recognized that for what was called unexhausted improvements made by the tenant compensation was equitably due to that tenant, and should be given either in money or by an adequate term of occupation being extended to the tenant, so that he might be enabled to enjoy the land he had improved, or the house he had erected, for such time as might be supposed sufficient to compensate him for his outlay. The difficulty, of course, would be to determine what was an adequate number of years. But this and other difficulties might properly be considered by a Select Committee. This principle had already been fully and frequently discussed, and various Bills on the subject had at different times been introduced. A Bill was introduced two or three years ago by the right hon Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cardwell), in which the principle of compensation was introduced. He was informed, however, that that Bill was practically inoperative in consequence of its not making sufficient distinctions between early improvements cheaply and quickly effected and those which required more outlay of money, labour, and time. It would also appear that the time fixed in the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman was too short, in cases of reclamations in mountain lands, to make the proposed compensation an equitable one for capital laid out. This appeared to him to be a most important subject, and, for the reason which he had ventured to offer to the House, he trusted that the Motion of the hon. Member for Dungarvan would be agreed to. Not long ago it was decided by a majority in that House that there was no reason to view with regret the diminution of the population of Ireland. How far that was satisfactory or consolatory to the people of Ireland it was not for him to say; but if the present Motion were not agreed to it was to be feared they might complain of the manner in which their grievances were treated in that House. They had come here for no boon, with none of that mendicant whine of which they had heard; they had come

for some recognition of that distress under which they were labouring from circumstances over which they had no control; they asked for sympathy, and Parliament had given them a discussion on the temporalities of the Irish Church. He had heard it said that the Motion of the hon. Gentleman was brought forward only with a view to the general election, which was imminent; but he did not believe this. At all events, such a motive could not influence his vote. The constituency (Exeter) which he had the honour of representing had no connection with Ireland, and as far as he knew had no special interest in her politics. He hoped he might be allowed to offer his thanks to the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) for the allusion in his speech to the efforts which his (Lord Courtenay's) father had successfully made for the welfare of the people of Ireland. As the son of an Irish landlord, whose family had been long connected with Ireland, he had ventured as his first utterance in that House to express his earnest conviction that the relations of landlord and tenant were not altogether satisfactory in that country, and that an inquiry into the subject could not fail to be of advantage to both parties. With this view he should support the Motion. He took this course, not as an advocate of what was commonly called tenant-right, but because he thought that the appointment of a Select Committee, even if it led to nothing, would yet do good as an earnest to the people of Ireland that the House of Commons was not disposed to turn a deaf ear to their appeals.

MR. E. F. LEVESON GOWER said, he was induced to offer one or two observations because of the strong opinion which he had always entertained upon this question. The hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) and those hon. Members who had advocated this inquiry had laid great stress upon its harmless character, and no argument could possibly be more plausible. It was said that the truth was all they desired to elicit, and that by granting the inquiry no pledge of any kind was given; but he maintained that such an inquiry would raise expectations which could not but have an injurious effect. There could be no doubt that this inquiry pointed to tenant-right; and, inasmuch as he strongly believed that the agitation of the question would not only not be beneficial but would be positively injurious to the best wards this country. He believed those reports were much exaggerated—but still he believed that feeling existed to some extent. It might be unreasonable, but it was not altogether without reason, for after all it arose from principles which ought to have produced feelings quite the reverse. It arose from a perverted patriotism—because the Irishman thought they had ill-treated Ireland, and when he hated England, let it be our endeavour to bring back that patriotic feeling, and to convince him that he can best display it by loving our common country. Surely, then, the Government would not now, when they had an opportunity given them of expressing their sympathy for the sufferings of Ireland, and their desire to do what they could towards finding a remedy by a cold cynical refusal of this Motion, shut the door of hope to the poor and uneducated peasantry of that unhappy country.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the Laws regulating the relations between Landlord and Tenant in Ireland, with a view to their more equitable adjustment,"—(Mr. Maguire,) —instead thereof.

LORD COURTENAY said, it was not his intention to detain the House for more than a few minutes. He felt that it might appear like presumption in one who had had the honour of a seat in the House for so short a time to rise to address the House on a subject of such importance and such difficulty. It had, moreover, on many occasions been discussed in that House and out of doors by gentlemen to whose expressed opinions it would be difficult for any one, and impossible for him, to add anything new in the way of argument. Nevertheless, he would ask permission very briefly to express the reasons which induced him to support the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, if it were pressed to a division. The hon. Gentleman had brought this subject forward with much ability, and, on the whole, with moderation of tone. He did not agree with the hon. Gentleman on very many of his political views, nor probably should he be able to concur with him in all his opinions on this subject; but at the same time it appeared impossible to affirm that the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland were altogether satisfactory. The difficulty of the subject had repeatedly been admitted, and as long ago as 1845, in the Report of the Devon Commission, something in the same sense as the views indicated by the hon. Gentleman's Motion was recommended. It appeared clear that from some cause the Irish tenant practically did not stand in as good a position as regarded his landlord as the tenant in England; that much was expected of and had to be done by the tenant in Ireland which in England was expected of and done by the landlord; and that practically the tenant in Ireland was more at the mercy of his landlord, be he good or bad, than in this country. Until a very recent period—and to a certain extent even now—such improvements as draining, building, enclosing and reclaiming waste lands, &c., which in England were made by the landlord, in Ireland must be made by the tenant. It was true that the House would be told that at the present day, in the great majority of instances—probably in nine cases out of ten—there were good landlords, and considerable, or, at all events, some assistance was rendered by them—such as supplying slate or timber, while the tenant contributed to the rest of the outlay. This was true, and as far as it went was satisfactory, and it would be very satisfactory if we had arrived at a state of perfection, and there were nothing but good landlords. But he feared that neither in Ireland nor anywhere else was the perfectibility of the species to be seen or hoped for at present, and it was a grievance amounting almost to a crying evil, that the tenant should be entirely at the mercy of a bad landlord, and that an enterprising farmer, who had laid out money on his farm, should be liable to be ejected from it by a grasping or an avaricious man, and have no redress except through the tedious, uncertain, and expensive process of an action at law. Without presuming to say what direction legislation ought to take, he should like to see some legislation adopted to meet this evil, and he thought it quite possible that a Select Committee might strike out some suggestions for this purpose. It appeared to him that in discussing this subject there were two principles to be borne in mind. The first of these was that the tenant should have no right to demand compensation for any improvements, or so-called improvements, which had not previously received the sanction of the landlord. It would be manifestly unjust that the landlord should be called upon to pay for changes which he might not think improvements, and which had been made without his sanction, or even against his will. In the second place, in any future legislation the principle ought to be recognized that for what was called unexhausted improvements made by the tenant compensation was equitably due to that tenant, and should be given either in money or by an adequate term of occupation being extended to the tenant, so that he might be enabled to enjoy the land he had improved, or the house he had erected, for such time as might be supposed sufficient to compensate him for his outlay. The difficulty, of course, would be to determine what was an adequate number of years. But this and other difficulties might properly be considered by a Select Committee. This principle had already been fully and frequently discussed, and various Bills on the subject had at different times been introduced. A Bill was introduced two or three years ago by the right hon Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cardwell), in which the principle of compensation was introduced. He was informed, however, that that Bill was practically inoperative in consequence of its not making sufficient distinctions between early improvements cheaply and quickly effected and those which required more outlay of money, labour, and time. It would also appear that the time fixed in the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman was too short, in cases of reclamations in mountain lands, to make the proposed compensation an equitable one for capital laid out. This appeared to him to be a most important subject, and, for the reason which he had ventured to offer to the House, he trusted that the Motion of the hon. Member for Dungarvan would be agreed to. Not long ago it was decided by a majority in that House that there was no reason to view with regret the diminution of the population of Ireland. How far that was satisfactory or consolatory to the people of Ireland it was not for him to say; but if the present Motion were not agreed to it was to be feared they might complain of the manner in which their grievances were treated in that House. They had come here for no boon, with none of that mendicant whine of which they had heard; they had come

for some recognition of that distress under which they were labouring from circumstances over which they had no control; they asked for sympathy, and Parliament had given them a discussion on the temporalities of the Irish Church. He had heard it said that the Motion of the hon. Gentleman was brought forward only with a view to the general election, which was imminent; but he did not believe this. At all events, such a motive could not influence his vote. The constituency (Exeter) which he had the honour of representing had no connection with Ireland, and as far as he knew had no special interest in her politics. He hoped he might be allowed to offer his thanks to the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) for the allusion in his speech to the efforts which his (Lord Courtenay's) father had successfully made for the welfare of the people of Ireland. As the son of an Irish landlord, whose family had been long connected with Ireland, he had ventured as his first utterance in that House to express his earnest conviction that the relations of landlord and tenant were not altogether satisfactory in that country, and that an inquiry into the subject could not fail to be of advantage to both parties. With this view he should support the Motion. He took this course, not as an advocate of what was commonly called tenant-right, but because he thought that the appointment of a Select Committee, even if it led to nothing, would yet do good as an earnest to the people of Ireland that the House of Commons was not disposed to turn a deaf ear to their appeals.

MR. E. F. LEVESON GOWER said, he was induced to offer one or two observations because of the strong opinion which he had always entertained upon this question. The hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) and those hon. Members who had advocated this inquiry had laid great stress upon its harmless character, and no argument could possibly be more plausible. It was said that the truth was all they desired to elicit, and that by granting the inquiry no pledge of any kind was given; but he maintained that such an inquiry would raise expectations which could not but have an injurious effect. There could be no doubt that this inquiry pointed to tenant-right; and, inasmuch as he strongly believed that the agitation of the question would not only not be beneficial but would be positively injurious to the best interests of Ireland, he did hope that the Government would oppose this Motion. He was ready to admit that in an electioneering point of view it might be better for the Government to grant the inquiry, but he would suggest to his hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) that the motive which dictated their refusal might be the desire not to arouse ruinous expectations in favour of such an impracticable measure as tenant-right. The hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) had drawn a very eloquent picture of the difference in the prosperity of England and Ireland, and no Englishman could regret more than he himself did the existence of that difference. He should be extremely glad to see Ireland in as flourishing a condition as England. He did not think, however, that this Motion was one which, if carried, would contribute to its prosperity. It appeared to him that that country was in reality suffering from want of capital. It was a most remarkable fact that at the present time the capital of England was to be found invested in railways, mines, and every conceivable kind of enterprize in every corner of the globe; but what was still more remarkable was that little, if any found its way to Ireland. The absence of capital in Ireland was, he believed, in a great measure attributable to the insecurity of property in that country, and partly also to the agrarian outrages which had occurred there. The alarm which these outrages had occasioned was, he thought, greatly exaggerated. They were, he believed, confined to particular limited portions of the country, but it should be remembered that capital was timid, and that these outrages naturally prevented capital from flowing into the country. No one could feel more than he did that it was the duty of the Irish landlord to deal liberally with his tenants. The whole question was one, as it appeared to him, more involving a discussion of principles than of facts. Believing, as he did, that the granting of the Motion would not in any way conduce to the prosperity of Ireland, and would increase rather than diminish that apprehension of the insecurity of property which kept capital out of the country, he hoped the Government would refuse to accede to the Motion of the hon. Member for Dungarvan.

MR. C. MOORE said, that he desired to see greater security given to the tenant for his outlay. The hon. Member who had just sat down said that the insecurity of property in Ireland prevented the flow of capital to that country. He thought, however, that no measure would tend to the security of property unless it also tended to satisfy the people. The measure they had been discussing would not, he believed, prove in any way injurious to the landlord, and the rents would be better paid, in consequence of the increased industry and ability which the tenant would be encouraged to bring to bear on cultivation. At the same time it would conduce to quietness and a kindly feeling between the landlord and tenant. It was said that a measure of this kind meant confiscation of the landlord's property. The tenant received the land without buildings, and if the tenant erected buildings at his own cost and by his own labour, to give compensation for those buildings could not be confiscation. On the contrary, to take those buildings from the tenant without compensation was the most cruel confiscation. As a landlord, nothing would gratify him more than some provision for the protection of the tenant. He believed such a measure would do more than any measure he ever heard of for the benefit of the country. It would introduce peace, and he hoped prosperity, into the country, and be of great advantage to the Empire at large.

COLONEL GREVILLE said, that he looked upon this as a landlord's quite as much as a tenant's question. He believed that security for property would be very much increased if tenant-right were settled upon an equitable basis. The noble Lord at the head of the Government told the House a few nights ago that "tenant's-right meant landlord's wrong." It was very easy to make an off-hand assertion of that kind, but a great question could not be disposed of in that manner. Land in Ireland would become infinitely more productive if this question were settled on an equitable and satisfactory basis. What was tenant-right? Judge Longfield, in a pamphlet which he had published, said that some thought tenant's right meant fixity of tenure, others thought it meant compulsory valuation of land, while others held that tenant-right simply meant compensation for improvements made with the tacit assent of the landowner, and constituting a permanent addition to the value of the land. It was quite clear that if by fixity of tenure it was understood that the tenant was to hold his land against the will of the landlord such a measure could never be proposed. It would drive the landlords from the country. Nor would any one propose a compulsory valuation. But the advocates of tenant-right said, with reason, that a difference existed between the practice in the two countries. In England the landlord did everything. He provided a dwellinghouse and farmbuildings, and the tenant obtained with these the beneficial occupation of the land; but in Ireland the landlord often let his farm without any of the conveniences that constituted a beneficial occupation, so that the law which was applicable to one country was not equally so to the other. That compensation for improvements made by the tenant with the assent of the landlord was a just principle was admitted by the Government of Lord Derby when Mr. Napier introduced his Tenant Compensation Bill. It was admitted by the Government of Lord Aberdeen, and afterwards by the Government of the noble Viscount, when the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) introduced a Bill on the subject. That measure, though brought in with the best intentions, had been, unfortunately, inoperative, and had not realized the expectations entertained by the right hon. Gentleman. Nothing was, therefore, more natural than the request now made by the Irish Members, that this Bill should be referred to a Select Committee in order that they might inquire why the Bill had not worked. There could be no more competent authority on this subject than the learned Judge at the head of the Landed Estates Court in Ireland, who had been a Judge of that Court since the year 1848. That learned Judge was of opinion that something might be done. He (Colonel Greville) had taken great interest in the subject, and he agreed with Judge Longfield. No claim could, in his opinion, be more equitable than the tenant's claims to compensation for permanent improvements which in England would be made by the landlord. Let the House remember that it was only when a tenant was evicted that the question of compensation could arise. If the landlord should proceed to put out the tenant, do not let him appropriate to himself those substantial and unexhausted improvements which give an increased value to his property. All the Bills that had been brought in and sanctioned by different Governments contained clauses giving compensation for unexhausted improvements, and some of those measures had passed through that House. In 1855 the 14th clause of the Tenants' Improvements

Compensation (Ireland) Bill was supported by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir Hugh Cairns). It gave tenants compensation for improvements made before the passing of the Act, and the hon. and learned Gentleman said it was his intention to support the clause. He (Sir Hugh Cairns) reminded the House that the other House had passed a Bill in 1853 containing a retrospective fixture clause, providing that any house built or other improvement made twenty-one years before the passing of the Bill might at the expiration of the lease be wholly removed by the tenant, unless the landlord paid him for it according to the valuation. Judge Longfield was of opinion that something should be done, and said he had little hope of seeing improved agriculture and a contented tenantry in Ireland so long as an artificial system of legislation existed which enabled the landlords to take possession of improvements without giving compensation for them. It was urged that such a retrospective clause would be unjust to those who had bought property in the Landed Estates Court; but those who had purchased land in Ireland of late years had done so with the knowledge that this question was still pending. The present Lord Chancellor, then Solicitor General, maintained in the debate on the measure of 1855 that the principles of that measure, both in the prospective and retrospective clauses, were consistent with equity and justice, not as a sword of offence, but as a shield of defence, to the tenant. His conclusions, the Solicitor General said, were supported by the opinion of—

Another opinion very appropriate to the present discussion, and deservedly carrying great weight, had been expressed in the course of a debate in the year 1855 by the noble Lord now at the head of the Government with regard to the propriety of a retrospective clause. The noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) asserted that although as a principle it was wrong to alter existing bargains by retrospective enactments, yet there were circumstances peculiar to the holding of land in Ireland which justified such retrospective action. That was a clear and well-argued statement, and he (Colonel Greville) appealed from the off-hand assertion of the noble Lord in 1865, that “tenant's-right was landlord's-wrong" to his sound and well matured argument of ten years ago. Bearing in mind the course taken by the Governments of Lord Derby and Lord Aberdeen, and the recommendations of the Select Committee of a few years back, it was impossible, he believed, for the noble Lord to resist the application now made to him. The property of the tenant ought to be as sacred as the property of the landlord, and in securing the property of the tenant and making him prosperous and contented the interests of the landlord were in reality preserved. Everybody knew that there was plenty of capital in Ireland stored up in the banks; but this would never be laid out upon land, so as to become reproductive, until proper safeguards were devised for the investment. In that event parties would make their own contracts, and landlords and tenants being in perfect accord, a totally different state of things would arise. In England there was a jealous watchfulness over the interests of the tenant, and according to local customs, having the force of law, the tenant enjoyed protection practically in many respects. The Irish tenant had not the advantage of these. It was the practice in England for the landlord to erect the necessary farm buildings, but that was not the rule in Ireland. In England and Wales there was a customary tenant-right by which growing crops, hay, &c., were secured to the outgoing tenant. These were secured by customary right in several counties in England and Wales, although they were not to be compared in value to the permanent unsecured improvements made by the tenants in Ireland. It was said in many quarters that exceptional laws for Ireland were bad in principle, and ought to be discouraged; but Judge Hargreave clearly showed that in Ireland there had been little else but exceptional legislation. The exceptional circumstances of the country, therefore, and an honest desire to render these better, ought to prevail over fancied advantages of uniformity, and should bear down mere unsupported allegations that measures of improvement were impracticable. He hoped that the justice which was meted out to England would not be denied to Ireland. It was said that what was asked for it would not be practicable to grant. The Government had not said so from their own mouth, but it had been said for them. He hoped the House would admit that a case had been made out for assenting to the Motion of the hon.

Member for Dungarvan, and that it would not be resisted.

Mr. BRADY said, he believed that the people of England were sensitively alive to everything affecting the welfare of Ireland. Indeed statesmen of all parties had been obliged to admit its suffering condition. There had been no material change in the regulations between landlord and tenant from the time of Burke to the time of the noble Lord. Yet the rental of the land had risen from £6,000,000 in 1780, to £13,000,000 a year at present. In the year 1780 the acreage of Ireland was estimated at £12,000,000 by Mr. Arthur Young, and its value at 6s. 4d. an acre, while in the year 1850 the value set upon it by a Government authority was 16s. 4d.; and by whom, he should like to know, had the value of the land, in that period of time, been so enhanced? By the poor tenants who laboured on it without receiving any encouragement from the landlords; yet still, as in years past, the relations between the two classes continued in a condition so unsatisfactory as to call loudly for redress, not only in the interests of Ireland, but of the Empire at large. It had been stated, in the course of the discussion, that there was a considerable amount of money in the hands of the tenant farmers in Ireland, and it might from that circumstance be supposed that prosperity reigned in the country, but the manner in which those poor people had lived, and the privations they had endured in order to store up a small reserve beyond their rent, were such as the people of England could scarcely comprehend. He knew an estate in which there were 300 or 400 tenants, and his belief was that they did not consume as much animal food in one day as was ordinarily consumed by ten or twelve persons in this country. The pig which they fed and the corn which they grew were sold to meet their rent, which they paid with a punctuality equal to that displayed by any tenantry in the world. They pinched themselves of nourishing food and of clothes, and yet they paid their rent. The wonder was how they could pay any rent seeing that the land was so bare. And it was bare because the tenants having no confidence in their landlords dare not lay out money on the land. When he was last in Ireland he met a man on the road, and got into conversation with him. He asked him whose land it was by the side of the road. "That is mine," said the man, "Then why do you not drain it, and put it in a better condition?" "Well," said the man, "I have very little interest in it. I have had this land for thirty years. That piece which you see was a lake. I reclaimed it, and have got two crops off it, and now my landlord says I must pay the same rent as for the high land, and I do not think it right to pay for that which I made myself; so I am off for America." That was the result in many cases of landlord injustice. Every Government that had been in power from 1845, when the Devon Commission was issued, to the present time, had acknowledged the necessity of doing something. The Devon Commission drew a vivid picture of the misery and wretchedness of the people, and recommended the case of the tenants to the anxious consideration of the Government. But from that time to this nothing had been done. The people had deteriorated, and the land which supported 8,000,000 when he was a boy, would now scarcely support 5,500,000. The people were naturally irritated at the treatment they had received. It was a fact that the Irish emigrants to America carried with them feelings of enmity towards England. That fact, however natural, was much to be regretted, and he urged upon all Englishmen the duty of taking steps to promote the welfare of Ireland and to secure the friendship of her people. There was an ulcer preying upon the vitals of Ireland, and the cause of it was the unsatisfactory state of the relations between landlord and tenant. He urged upon the noble Lord and his Government to take this subject into their hands, and to provide the only possible remedy for the existing evils by giving such a fixity of tenure as would induce the people of Ireland to remain in the country and enable them to attain to a degree of prosperity which would be equally beneficial to this country.

MR. M'MAHON said, he thought the hon. Member for Dungarvan had rendered an essential service to the tenantry of Ireland; because, whether his Motion for a Committee was adopted or not, he had shown what was the effect of asking for the smallest possible modicum of redress from a moribund Parliament, which had twice refused to express its regret for the decline in the population of Ireland, which had passed the Act of 1860, and from a Committee of which, however composed, but little good for Ireland could be expected. The Motion would also show how little good had been done by lowering the demand for justice to the tenantry of Ireland. The tenant-right agitation began in 1852, and its originators contended that either there should be no legislation at all between landlord and tenant or that the tenants of Ireland should have what had been granted in all other countries, fixity of tenure upon payment of rent. Those demands were thought to be excessive, and they were departed from. It was agreed to accept the simple tenant-right of Ulster as shown in Sharman Crawford's Bill. When the advocates of tenant-right demanded a strong measure it was believed that they were in earnest, and the Government thought it necessary to consider the question. Lord Derby's Government introduced a measure which, had it been passed, would have done much good to Ireland. It did not pass, and now such a measure would be stigmatized as revolutionary. Lord Aberdeen's Government, which followed, also produced a measure which would now be condemned in the same manner. The demands of the advocates of the Irish tenantry were again lowered, and Mr. Serjeant Shee proposed Crawford's Bill without the clauses which were considered to be objectionable. That proposition was not adopted, and the result was that of which the thin attendance that evening was an illustration. After the election of 1859 Crawford's Bill in its entirety was again proposed, and, as a sort of counterpoise, the Act of 1860 was proposed and carried by the Government. That Act, instead of improving the condition of the tenantry of Ireland, had made it worse. All the clauses in the Act were in favour of the landlord and none for the tenant. They were such as no man living would propose for England. Before 1860 the power of eviction by the sessions was restricted to rentals not exceeding £50, but by the Act the limit was raised to £100. Another unusual provision in the Act was, that if a tenant attempted to do anything which the landlord or his agent might choose to regard as waste, he could be summoned before a Justice of the Peace, and if he did not conform to the views of the Justice, he was subjected to fine or imprisonment. After that, the hon. Member for Tralee attempted to carry Crawford's Bill without the retrospective clause, but he failed, and nothing had been done since. All kinds of theories were started to account for the misfortunes, but he was sure that if the Committee asked for by his hon. Friend were granted, it would not in any way tend to improve the position of the tenant. The House would not dot an "i" or cross a "t" to improve the evils of landlord and tenant. The lesson which the people of Ireland should learn from the past was, that they should adhere to the principles of political economy, and should demand some measure to abolish altogether legislation between landlord and tenant, and to place dealers in land upon the same footing as dealers in other commodities. [The Bill of 1860, by sweeping away all the feudal relations of landlord and tenant, had prepared the way for this.] The proper course for the Irish people to adopt would be to insist that all special laws for the regulation of the relations between landlords and tenants should be repealed, and that both parties should be left to their remedies under the common law. If that was done, there would be an end to evictions and distresses for non-payment of rent, landlords and tenants would stand in equitable relations to each other, and there would never be another debate upon this subject in the interests of the tenantry.

MR. ALDERMAN ROSE said, having the honour of holding the position of Governor of the Irish Society, he ventured to offer a few remarks upon the subject before the House. In a recent debate they had heard an appalling description of the present state of Ireland from the hon. Member for the King's County. While differing from that hon. Gentleman as to the causes of those evils, he nevertheless thought it furnished a matter for the grave consideration of this country and the Government. It appeared to him that no Government could see the gradual diminution of the people, and the falling off in the agricultural produce of Ireland, without the most serious apprehensions of the ultimate results. The good Government of Ireland was, in his opinion, one of the most serious problems that could be solved; and he, for one, was therefore prepared to support the Motion for inquiry upon this subject. The society with which he was connected was in the habit of granting long leases and premiums for substantial improvements. Now, what was called tenant-right appeared to him to be something so indefinite, so shadowy, unreal, and unsubstantial that he found it almost impossible to deal with it. He could not conceive a more inconvenient state of things than that a man holding, perhaps, as a tenant-at-will should erect a building which his landlord did not want, to which, indeed, he might positively object, and then at the end of the quarter or of the year should demand to be repaid the money which he had expended upon it. Now, that was a state of circumstances which ought to be defined and provided for. The small farm system in Ireland was a failure. It was idle to expect any success in farming unless the holdings were considerable and the tenant in possession of capital. Farming, like commercial or manufacturing operations, must be carried on upon a certain scale in order to be profitable. No man could conduct a manufacture in his drawing-room or his bedroom with success, and the same principle applied to farming. If the system which prevailed in the north of Ireland of granting long leases and giving large premiums for improvements was extended throughout Ireland, it would be a complete answer to the demand for tenant-right. Ireland was being steadily depopulated, and its produce was failing, and it was the duty of that House to take into earnest and immediate consideration the means of remedying a state of things which must produce serious disadvantage and embarrassment to this country.

THE O'CONOR DON said, the difficulty which he felt in addressing the House was, that up to the present time the debate was almost entirely one-sided. There was hardly a speaker that did not seem to coincide in the views expressed by his hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan, and to consider the demand now made by his Motion as just, reasonable, and moderate. He (the O'Conor Don) confessed he felt himself almost unable to afford any further information to the House. Before, however, the Government expressed their views upon the subject, he felt himself bound, as an Irish landlord, to declare that he concurred in the views expressed by his hon. Friend, and thought it was most desirable that Parliament should come to some arrangement of this important question. Now, he had listened attentively to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Wexford (Mr. M'Mahon), without being able to understand what course that hon. and learned Gentleman desired should be adopted. The hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to find fault with all those who had taken an active part in the discussions upon this subject, because in his opinion they had not gone far enough. Now, so far as he had considered the question, he (the O'Conor Don) believed that it would have been settled long ago if those advocates of tenant-right had not gone so far. Had, for example, the Bill of Mr. Serjeant Shee been adopted by the popular party in Ireland, he was of opinion that they would not have had any occasion for the discussion that evening. So far from the advocates of this question not going far enough, he considered that the demands went entirely too far which they had pressed upon the attention of Parliament. He could not understand what the hon. and learned Gentleman meant by his proposal to remit the landlords and tenants of Ireland to their common-law rights—nor had the hon. and learned Gentleman pointed out in what manner the existing evil could be met otherwise than by such legislation as might arise out of the full and searching inquiry that was now moved for. The importance of this question could not be denied. It had been recognized by statesmen of every party, and various measures had from time to time been proposed by different Ministers. The fact that the leading statesmen on both sides of the House had attempted legislation on the subject was a sufficient proof that the state of things existing in Ireland then was not satisfactory, and if not satisfactory then, he asked in what respect was it satisfactory now? In 1860 the present Secretary for the Colonies introduced a measure to remedy the great grievance of Ireland, but it was wholly inoperative. He (the O'Connor Don) maintained that the question was now in as unsatisfactory a state as it was at the time when his right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Colonies felt it his duty, on the part of the Government, to attempt legislation in regard to it. The question introduced by his hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan might be considered in two lights—first, was the condition of things regarding the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland satisfactory? If it were admitted that that condition was unsatisfactory, then he asked whether Parliament could by legislation improve the condition of that country? With regard to the first point, the past history of the country showed that nothing could be more unsatisfactory than the state of Ireland. Then, arose the next question—whether Parliament could do anything by legislation to improve its condition. Upon the answer to that question, he admitted, rested the main force of all the arguments used against the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan. He knew it might be said that, however unsatisfactory were the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland, they ought to be left to adjust themselves, as the interference of the Legislature could not accomplish any good result. The proposal before them was, that having legislated upon the subject in 1860, and legislated inoperatively, and it being stated by practical men that the measure of 1860 could be made to some extent operative and accomplish some results, they should inquire if those statements were true before they permanently decided that Parliament could do nothing further upon the subject. He could hardly believe that Her Majesty's Government would refuse to accede to so fair and moderate a proposal. He admitted there was the greatest possible difficulty in dealing with the question, as shown by its past history; but he did not consider that on that account they were finally to decide that it was a question entirely beyond the control of Parliament, and that it was impossible to better the present state of things. He thought a great improvement might be effected in the existing law. Judge Longfield and other eminent men had expressed their belief that an improvement could be made. There was a greater evil arising from the present relation of landlord and tenant than the non-improvement of the soil, and that was the feeling of dissatisfaction that pervaded men's minds, that they were not justly and fairly treated; and whilst that feeling of discontent existed they would have no peace nor tranquillity in Ireland, nor the application of that honest industry which was necessary for the improvement and benefit of the country. It was a matter of pain rather than gratification for Irish Members to have constantly to bring their grievances before the House; and therefore it was that he was desirous of seeing the law settled, both for the sake of Parliament and the people of Ireland. He expressed his entire concurrence in the Motion, and his sincere trust that Her Majesty's Government would accede to so moderate a request as the granting of a Committee of Inquiry.

COLONEL VANDELEUR said, he thought that the Government ought to grant the Inquiry asked for by the hon. Member for Dungarvan, though he did not concur in all that had been said by previous speakers as to the causes of the present condition of Ireland. A great deal had been said about tenant-right, but he had known times in Ireland after the famine of 1847 when tenant-right was worth nothing, when thousands of acres had been left waste, and much land had been thrown on the hands of the landlords. The climate of Ireland had something to do with the condition of that country. Since the times to which he had just referred there had been a change in the value put upon land, which had caused much talk about tenant-right. Landlords were sometimes right in keeping the farms in their own hands, for in many cases too high a value was now set upon it by tenants who paid for the possession of a farm, money raised on loans which afterwards they were unable to meet, and had to sell out at a loss to enable them to return the borrowed capital. Great uncertainty had been created in the minds of tenants by the action of the Incumbered Estates Court, for land changed hands so frequently now that tenants, not knowing who their landlord might be, were unwilling to spend money on improvements. Twenty-five millions worth of property had been sold under it to a vast number of persons, many of whom were reselling the land, and those persons had been mainly instrumental in raising the agitation of tenant-right. The continual selling of land unsettled men's minds. He had heard of a case in which a tenant said to an agent, "Is it true that we (the tenants) are going to be sold?" "I am afraid it is," replied the agent. "Then I hope it won't be one of ourselves that will buy us," observed the tenant. The tenants on the estate to which he alluded were made happy when an agent told them that each man would be assisted to buy his own holding. Emigration was not caused altogether by the circumstances to which so many attributed it. The persons who now emigrated were members of families who had emigrated and sent home money to carry other relatives across the Atlantic. Much had been said about the improvidence of the higher classes in Ireland, and about family charges on land which they were so fond of creating; but the farming classes were not less improvident in making charges on their stock. It frequently occurred that a man left a charge of £200 or £300 for his son to pay, the latter having no money, but only the stock on his land. They gave bills, and then when they fell due they had to be sold up to pay them. He knew of a case in which a tenant of his own married a young woman with a tolerable fortune—£200; the father gave bills for the amount and broke, and so the unfortunate young man was left with the wife and no fortune, and not only broke himself but broke others. These bill transactions had very often more to do with the difficulties of the Irish peasant class than the landlords' rents. The landlords' rents were often two, three, and four years in arrear. Everything had been going to the bad in Ireland for the last three or four years, until the last season. The oats had perished in the ground, and the sheep had died; but this last year there had been a reaction. The farmers were improving, but no doubt the small towns were suffering very much from decreased trade. The population of his own county (Clare) had fallen off 100,000 since 1841 owing to emigration, and, of course, the small towns had suffered from the loss of so many customers. He cordially supported the Motion of the hon. Gentleman because he thought inquiry would do good.

MR. DUNNE said, he should support the Motion, and that he could not agree with those who declared that "tenant's-right was landlord's wrong," as the interests of both ought to be identical. He appeared in the double capacity of landlord and tenant and could declare that the state of both classes was unsatisfactory. What injured the one must injure the other. He believed that much mischief was caused in Ireland by land jobbers, and mentioned an instance in which one of that class had agreed to give an additional sum upon the purchase of an estate, on condition of the owner evicting the tenants. The owner took his measures in a very insidious manner, and obtained the services of the sheriff with a posse of police, who turned out the tenants and pulled down their houses. Fortunately the tenants obtained legal assistance, and one of them asserted his rights in a court of law, where the jury found that the landlord had acted fraudulently and unjustly. He had to pay heavy damages, and to compromise all the other actions by the payment of large sums. There was an inherent love of justice in Irishmen, and if they had confidence in the law, they would be content to appeal to it. All they wanted was fair play. He would conclude by paraphrasing a sentence from the writings of a late Roman Catholic prelate, by expressing a hope that the love of justice in Irish breasts would be as lasting as their hatred of tithes and the temporalities of the Church of England as established in Ireland.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he was surprised that no one on the Treasury Bench had had the courage to answer the speech of the hon. Member for Dungarvan. He would not advocate any outrageous system of tenant-right, but the question was one which deserved careful consideration, being the most important at present affecting the interests of Ireland. He was delighted to hear the mild and temperate tone of the hon. Member who introduced this question, but the hon. Members for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) and Bodmin (Mr. Leveson Gower) had introduced a political aspect to the question, and had taunted the Government or thrown out insinuations against the Opposition side of the House. Now, he protested against both these modes of discussing the question. He only understood the remark of the noble Lord that tenant-right was landlord's wrong to refer to those wild and visionary schemes which had been occasionally put forward by those who from corrupt motives had encouraged a mischievous and indefensible agitation. He hoped that the Government would not be actuated in any course they might pursue this evening by the thought of a future election. The question was one to be considered fairly and impartially. This House would not for a moment entertain any proposal to abrogate the just rights of the landlord; and, on the other hand, the tenant farmers required no more than simple justice. As he understood tenant-right, it was the free and full enjoyment by the tenant of the fruits of the industry and the capital which he had invested in the land. It was said that tenant-right was unnecessary, because it did not exist in England. But exceptional cases required exceptional remedies, and Ireland was an exceptional case. The tenant custom of England and Scotland and the north of Ireland was really tenant-right, and what objection could there be to making an inquiry whether some means could not be taken to assimilate the custom and the right in the three kingdoms? In England the improvement of the land was effected at the expense of the landlord, while in Ireland it was effected at the expense of the tenant. Some persons contended that the Irish landlords ought to follow the example of the English landlords in that respect, but they had not at their disposal the vast means which such a work would require, and which would, in many cases, be equal to the value of the fee-simple of their estates; and, moreover, they could not devote the whole of their resources to an improvement of their property, which would all descend to their eldest son, while they failed to make any provision for their younger children. His idea of tenant-right was, that it should be a fair transaction between landlords and tenants, and he felt convinced that a measure which would give effect to that principle would promote their mutual interests. Then, again, the system of settlements stood in the way of the landlords expending their money. There was plenty of capital in Ireland, but it was all locked up in the banks, and those who had it would not invest it in land. It was difficult to legislate for Ireland, because only a few understood the subject. He would not support exaggerated notions of tenant-right, but every proposal for a just reform was liable to disparagement from the exaggerated views put forward by ill-conditioned or designing men. What was wanted was a moderate measure, which would satisfy moderate men. At present, Irish landlords, for want of means, were often unable to carry out the necessary improvements on their estates; but, if so, why not allow the tenants to do them? It was a mistake to suppose that there was a want of capital in Ireland. All that was wanted was that the tenant should be able to lay out his money on such conditions as competent authority might consider sufficient to secure to the tenant the full enjoyment of the fruits of his industry and of his capital. They ought not to deal with this question in a political point of view, but for the benefit of the country. He hoped an inquiry would be granted, so that at least they might take the most competent advice on this subject. The Irish people were sick of these constant agitations, and desired to get rid of them to enable a generous people to enjoy the advantages which a munificent Providence had provided for them.

MR. COX said, it might be considered out of place for a metropolitan Member to offer any suggestions upon this subject, but his apology must be that he was a member of the Irish Society. What was tenant-right, and whence sprang that right? It appeared to him to have originated in the insecurity of a tenant holding land, the possession of which he was obliged to find the means of defending. It originated nearly 250 years ago, in the charter of James I., which he granted to the citizens of London, when he founded the new plantation in Ulster. The citizens of London guaranteed to their tenants, the old soldiers and others who settled on the land, the right to hold the land so long as they had sufficient force to defend the possession of it, and they stated that they should not be put out of possession. That was about 250 years ago, and ever since the property of the citizens had descended from father to son, and had been dealt with in a peculiar manner by those who claimed the right to defend the possessions in Ulster. There was no reason why, in his opinion, this Committee should not be granted, for it was absolutely necessary that some decision should be come to upon the subject, having regard to both sides of the question. In proof of this he would shortly state what was tenant-right in Ulster. Within a few miles of Derry the Irish Society, some sixty-four years ago, agreed to demise to a person 500 acres of land, upon condition that he should build a house and improve the land. To that end a lease was granted, and the tenant entered into possession, and paid a rent of £250 a year. The tenant built the house and improved the land, and he then let it to another person at an improved rent of between £800 and £900 a year, and the original lessee received that increased rent for about sixty-one years. He (Mr. Cox) was at Derry just at the time when the lease expired, and notwithstanding what had happened, the lessee's representative on the expiration of the lease claimed some five or six years' tenant-right. It much astonished him, and he wondered what the Duke of Bedford would say if his tenants in Russell Square, when their leases had fallen in, claimed tenant-right. Such claims might be carried to such an extent as to almost confiscate the land. The hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Dickson) spoke of the Irish Society as absentee landlords. He (Mr. Cox) could tell him that the Irish Society, although absentee landlords, expended out of their rental of £14,000 a year the sum of £13,400 in supporting an agent's establishment, churches, chapels, schools, and other charities. That was what the Irish Society did, and if other absentee landlords did the same they would not hear of these complaints. He should vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Dungarvan.

MR. ROEBUCK: I think that the silence of the Government is somewhat pusillanimous. They are placed in the position they occupy to govern the country, and a very important part of the country is Ireland. One of the most serious considerations with respect to the Government of Ireland is connected with the present relations between landlord and tenant. We have had a discussion in this House about another grievance of Ireland—the Irish Church; but now we have to come to the bottom of all the discontent in Ireland—namely, tenant-right, and on this occasion the debate has gone on for about five hours, and yet not one single Gentleman on the Treasury Bench has vouchsafed to give to the House the slightest hint of what the Government intend to do. Am I not right, then, in saying that this silence is pusillanimous? I am quite sure that the Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench, with the noble Lord at their head, have an opinion on the subject; and, if so, why do they not express it? They ought to lead and not to follow the House; but they wait to hear declarations from all sides of the House in order that they may get safely out of an embarrassment. That is not my habit at all, and I will state what I think is the right course for the Government to pursue. If they follow my suggestion, I shall feel flattered at having given them a clue to escape from their difficulty. Ireland constitutes one of the greatest difficulties in the Government of the kingdom, and one of the failings of Ireland is the national error that the great cause of the misery of that country is the present state of the relations between landlord and tenant. The question then arises, how shall we deal with what I believe to be an error, though others may have a contrary belief. Is not a fair, honest, and impartial discussion the best thing for the purpose; and could there be a better tribunal than a rightly constituted Committee of this House? I do not mean a Committee like that appointed two Sessions ago in reference to Ireland, in which enthusiastic Gentlemen got all sorts of witnesses to give evidence in the sense of their own views; but I mean a Committee composed of men really entitled to the consideration and confidence of this House—men of judgment and character, and, more than all, of cross-examining power. I would ask the noble Lord, if he should consent to any Committee on this subject, to appoint a Committee of that sort, because with such a Committee composed of men of cross-examining power, or, as I once heard a learned Friend of mine call it, eviscerating power, a man with his notions about tenant-right and belief that he possesses some talismanic have taken part in this debate that the Irish love justice. I agree with them, and I am sure that upon reflection the Irish nation would not wish that to be done which would be pregnant with injustice. Now, if there be one thing more than another which a nation in my opinion is bound to respect and regard, it is the rights of property, because upon those rights every man, however rich or however poor, must find it his interest to rest and to depend. And if laws are passed which infringe the rights of property, depend upon it that in the main those laws would be injurious to the nation in which they are passed, however tempting and apparent may be the advantage which for a time may be expected to arise from their operation. Now, Sir, I cannot bring my mind to the conviction that there can be any justice, and therefore that there can be any permanent advantage in doing that which the hon. Member for Dungarvan pointed at in the latter part of his speech—namely, giving to one man the right of determining what should be done with respect to another man's property. The hon. Member said—as I understood him—that in his opinion the veto of the landlord ought not to be sufficient to prevent the tenant from making unauthorized improvements upon the property of the landlord, but that some tribunal should be created—quarter sessions, or some other, I forget what was passing in his mind—which should determine as between landlord and tenant what changes—for I will not adopt the word improvements, for they may not be improvements—but what changes the tenant should make upon the landlord's property, and what should be the conditions of rent and of period of occupation which the tenant should be liable to and have a right to with regard to the landlord. Now it seems to me that an arrangement of that kind would violate the fundamental principles of justice.

MR. MAGUIRE said: I rise to order. [Cries of "Order" and "Chair!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The noble Lord is in possession of the House, and if the hon. Member has been misunderstood he will have the power of explanation after the noble Lord.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: No one would regret more than I should having misunderstood or unintentionally misrepresented what the hon. Gentleman has said, and I accept with pleasure his disclaimer of the opinions which I conceived he had meant to express. But I have been quoted by him and other hon. Members as having made the assertions which many have taken objection to, that the right of the tenant was the wrong of the landlord. Now, that is not what I said. What I stated upon the occasion to which I refer was this—that tenant-right, as I apprehend it to be understood in many parts of Ireland, was the landlord's wrong, and the tenant-right to which I then alluded was the right—I have just been discussing—proposed to be conferred upon him to deal with the property of the landlord without his consent and against his consent. That I consider to be the wrong of the landlord, especially when it is coupled with a reserved permission that, after a certain period, the tenant is to have the power to compel the landlord to pay for the changes which the landlord would not have made, and which he objected to being made at the time when they were made. Now, Sir, great complaints have been made, and in many respects justly, about the tide of emigration which has set from Ireland towards the shores of America. But how any change in the relations of landlord and tenant is to check that emigration has not to my mind been satisfactorily explained by anybody who has taken part in this debate, and least of all by the hon. Member who said that the great effect of the change contemplated would be to enable the small tenants to make improvements upon their holdings. Now, it has been well observed that no great agricultural improvements can be made except upon large holdings and with large capital. Everybody knows that the great majority of the tenants of Ireland have but small holdings of some five, ten, or fifteen acres, nor have they capital to improve any larger quantity of land which they might hold. But what does that condition of Ireland arise from? It is not from the mis-government of England. England has nothing to do with the subdivision of holdings, by which an immense and—as many people have thought—a redundant population has been created in Ireland. It arose from the very cause which is now held out as the remedy of the evils complained of—it arose from comparative fixity of tenure. It was fixity of tenure which led to the multiplication of holdings, to the immense population, and to the comparative backwardness of agriculture in Ireland. It is the long leases granted in the last century for sixty-one years and three lives—lives which had the peculiar property of enduring for an immoderately long period—lives which frequently outlasted the sixty-one years—that created the evil. The occupying tenants who held under those leases were the least improving people in the world—they never improved—and I can say from my experience that when leases of that sort fell out, and those who held them became tenants at will, it was then they began to improve, assisted, no doubt, in some degree by their landlords, but they had a spirit of improvement inspired into them which they never had at any period of the long holding, which might be compared to fixity of tenure, and which was greater than the thirty-one years lease that the hon. Member for Dungarvan said was sufficient time for any improvement the tenant might make. Now, Sir, I hold that to establish that which is commonly called tenant-right—namely, to give the tenant the power of making alterations without the consent of the landlord, and even against his consent, and then of charging the landlord arbitrarily with the cost of those alterations which he never wished to be made, would be a great injustice, and, in many cases, would really amount almost to a confiscation of the landlord's property. But, upon the other hand, it is no doubt to the advantage, not only of Ireland, but of the United Kingdom, that encouragement should be held out to the tenant to make those real improvements which, according to the practice in Ireland, the landlord is not in the habit of making, as the landlord here is. No doubt for that purpose the tenant should have security that upon a change of occupation he should be reimbursed for improvements of a certain kind which he might have made upon the land which he holds. But then I say that the fundamental basis of that right ought to be mutual agreement and consent, and when hon. Gentlemen say that these agreements are not made I really cannot imagine why. It seems to me to be the natural course of affairs between landlord and tenant, that if the latter should wish to make material improvements either in buildings, drains, or fences, or any other agricultural improvements, he should go to his landlord and say, "The holding which I have wants these alterations, which you do not like or cannot afford to make. They will improve the estate. Well, then, I will make them, provided you, in the event of your turning me out within a certain period before I have been reimbursed by the length of my tenancy, will repay me a certain portion of my expenses before I quit your farm." What reasonable landlord would object to that? And what reasonable tenant would ask for more? Such an arrangement would be sufficient to provide for the improvement of the land, and adequately to guard the rights of property on the one hand, and the just expectations of the tenant on the other. Well, Sir, that was the principle of the Act of 1860. It was the result of long discussions in this House—of several Bills that were brought in, which were modified and altered, but did not succeed. We did bring in that Bill in 1860 which passed into a law, and which provided for mutual and spontaneous agreements between landlord and tenant, calculated, we thought, to secure the rights of property on the one hand, and on the other to encourage the agricultural improvements of which every one were necessary to the prosperity of Ireland. We are told that Act has not produced the results we were entitled to expect from it. That is a fair and legitimate subject of inquiry. We can have no objection to an inquiry relative to that Act. Such an inquiry has a distinct object, and might, I think, be concluded within a reasonable period. The larger inquiry proposed by the hon. Member for Dungarvan, which embraces the whole arrangements of landlord and tenant, and all the laws of Ireland belonging to these relations, would be an inquiry of almost interminable length, and could not be expected to conclude in any reasonable time. The point of difficulty—the point that requires investigation—is why that Act, with every appearance of being calculated to promote the tenant farmers' advantage, should have failed to do so. What are the circumstances which have prevented landlords and tenants from entering into the engagements contemplated by that law? Is it because the tenants, discouraged, have not made the application, or because the landlords have failed to enter into such engagements when applied for? What are the difficulties of detail or arrangement which tend to embarrass the operations of the Act? If there be such difficulties, let them be stated. We should be most happy to adopt any change consistent with the principles I have mentioned calculated to give to that Act an effective and real operation. Well, Sir, if the hon. Member for Dungarvan would consent to allow us, instead of the Motion which stands in his name, to move the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the operation of the Act of 1860, we should be perfectly ready to do so; and if the Committee contained good cross-examiners, so much the better. No doubt it would bring out results that would tend to the advantage of the country, and if so it would be satisfactory to the Government and every person interested in the welfare of Ireland. I object to the extended Motion of the hon. Member for Dungarvan, which would embrace so wide a range that we could not expect it could be completed within any reasonable period of time, and which, with his understood objects, would tend to establish principles to which I could not agree; but if he will consent to our substituting a Committee such as I have chalked out, to inquire into the operation of the Act—[“Acts”]—well, the Acts of 1860, I should hope that would be satisfactory as showing a desire on the part of the House to investigate the causes which have prevented the development of agricultural prosperity in Ireland. And if the Committee can suggest any arrangement that may tend to mitigate existing evils and promote improvement we should be most happy that such a result had attended their labours, and be thankful to the hon. Member for bringing the subject before the House and giving us the opportunity of doing that which conduced to the public advantage.

MR. MAGUIRE said, that he wished, before saying how he received the proposal of the noble Lord, first of all to offer an explanation as to two statements made by the noble Lord. The noble Viscount had misconceived his meaning when he said that he would refer the question of rent to any tribunal. He had never said or supposed anything of the kind. Nor did he insist on leases of thirty-one years as satisfying every requirement of the tenant. He had expressed no opinion whatever on the point; all he asked was for some system that would encourage landlords to give leases, of whatever duration. As to the proposal made by the noble Lord, he in all frankness accepted it—that the Acts of 1860 should be referred to a Select Committee, with the intention to see why they had failed to work, and how they could be improved for the advantage of both landlord and tenant.

MR. SCULLY said, he was very glad that the noble Lord had made so reasonable a proposition. He had himself suggested the very same proposal to his hon. and learned Friend, and he had thought of proposing it as an Amendment at an earlier period of the evening. The Amendment he should have moved was in these words—

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Act of 1860, and whether that Act could be amended in any and what respect.”

Such a Committee would enable them to get into the whole question. What he wanted was to ascertain how they should provide compensation to tenants for unexhausted improvements. He hoped this Committee would have men placed on it who, as his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) expressed it, would really eviscerate the matter.

MR. WHITESIDE: It is of great consequence that the House should know exactly what is proposed. I have my own opinion on the subject, and I have only to say this—those who think the very awful facts which the hon. Member for Dungarvan truly described as existing in the South and West of Ireland are to be obviated by an Act of Parliament are labouring under a delusion. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Scully) who understands the question, spoke of the Act of 1860 in the singular number, and now let the House exactly understand what is to be done. The Act, which might be regarded as a consolidation of the law of landlord and tenant, was prepared by the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Mr. Napier), aided by one or two other Gentlemen who understood the subject. They failed in carrying that measure, but it was afterwards carried by the practical good sense of the then Attorney General, Mr. Deasy. That Act was the result of years of inquiry in the time of Sir Robert Peel—the Devon Commission; in which 120,000 questions were asked. Every Act of Parliament passed on the law of landlord and tenant from the time when the Saxons first landed in Ireland down to the date of that Act was repealed, and the whole law was put into one Act. There was substantially no difference between the law of landlord and tenant in England and Ireland. The hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster) would not establish a set of laws for one part of the country and another for another, and he was equally confident that so enlightened a politician would not wish to contradict the principles of free trade in Ireland. I never could understand the policy of the statesmen who would seek to restore harmony between all parts of the United Kingdom by establishing differences between each part. I hope we shall have a law upon the principle of the Act which has been passed, giving every liberty of contract and removing every disability, which I think has been done already. But I trust we shall not, under any mistaken notions of relieving disability, give power to one to decide what another must do. I would entreat the House if it consents to this Committee to appoint one which understands the subject. If a Committee should sit down to overrule the present law, they will not only do no good, but inflict injury. It is a specific question to consider whether an Act of Parliament lately passed has been useful, and the inquiry may be brought to a safe if not to a satisfactory conclusion within a limited space of time. I think the Committee will speedily ascertain whether the last Act was useful, because it appears that no one cared anything about it. That which did not work could do no harm. I cannot help congratulating the hon. Member for Bradford on his manly and sincere speech, in which he informed the noble Viscount at the head of the Government that unless he consented to the appointment of this Committee, he (the hon. Member) and the important section of the House influenced by his ability and eloquence, would transfer their allegiance to the rising star of the Whig party, and were prepared to make the first Minister of the Crown the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who began the other night by making a statement of the principles which would recommend him to the party to which the hon. Gentleman belongs. He wished to call attention to the fact that the word "Acts" had been used in the Amendment, whereas he (Mr. Whiteside) believed, from what had fallen from the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Scully), that the proposed inquiry was only intended to refer to one Act, the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 153, which had reference to the tenure and improvement of land in Ireland.

MR. SCULLY said, it was not for him to settle the form of the Motion. That duty lay between the noble Viscount and the hon. Member for Dungarvan.

MR. WALPOLE said, he understood that the noble Viscount and the hon. Gentlemen near him had settled the exact terms in which they thought the inquiry should be pursued. The question raised by the Motion about to be put from the Chair was whether the House intended to go into the whole question of the law of landlord and tenant, or whether they would confine the inquiry to one Act, relating to the tenure and improvement of land. If it were intended that the working of more than one Act should be inquired into, then he as well as the noble Viscount would be much mistaken if any termination would be brought to the inquiry by the end of the summer. If the inquiry were limited to the question they had been discussing it would be a useful inquiry.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, if the inquiry were to be made into the Act of 1860 that would fully meet the original Motion of the hon. Member for Dungarvan, because the Act of 1860 was the code which constituted the law relating to landlord and tenant in Ireland. It would be idle to take objection to the original Motion in order to substitute that which would be exactly the same thing expressed in other words. He did not think there was any doubt as to what the noble Lord meant, as he was most clear, as he invariably was, in his expressions. The noble Viscount said if the Act which passed in 1860, regulating the mode by which agricultural lands might be let, had proved a failure, that would be a fair subject of inquiry. He (the noble Viscount) said the hon. Member (Mr. Maguire) might have an inquiry into the causes which led to the failure of the working of that Act, and that was what the House distinctly understood should be the form of the inquiry. If the inquiry were to be in any other form than that, let them have the original form proposed by the hon. Member for Dungarvan.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, there could be no doubt that the Act passed by Mr. Cardwell was the Act under discussion; but on reference to the debates of 1860 it would be found that two Acts were brought forward together, and considered together, and it would be exceedingly difficult for the Committee fairly to consider the first Act without having the second also under their consideration.

LORD NAAS said, the opinion of the hon. Gentleman who had just down was not the opinion of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, who had pressed his unwillingness to disturb the present law relating to landlord and tenant; and he (Lord Naas) thought the arguments of the noble Lord perfectly conclusive. The noble Lord said that a certain Act had passed in 1860, and that the failure of that Act would be a legitimate subject of inquiry.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Another Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Acts of 1860 upon the relations of Landlord and Tenant in Ireland,"—

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Another Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Act 23 and 24 Vic. c. 153, on the Tenure and Improvement of Land in Ireland,"—

—instead thereof.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Words added: — Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Act 23 and 24 Vic. c. 153, on the Tenure and Improvement of Land in Ireland.

And on Thursday, April 27, Committee nominated as follows:—

Mr. MAGUIRE, Mr. Secretary CARDWELL, Lord NAAS, Sir ROBERT PEEL, Mr. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD, Mr. LOWE, Mr. HUNT, Mr. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER, Lord CLAUD HAMILTON, Colonel GREVILLE, Sir EDWARD GROGAN, Sir COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, The O'DONOGHUE, Lord DUNKELLIN, Mr. CAIRD, Mr. GEORGE, and Mr. BAGWELL:—
Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

INCLOSURE BILL—[BILL 89.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. PEACOCKE said, he had to explain that the lands proposed to be closed were not clearly stated in the schedule. No one reading this Bill could what inclosures were intended by the description of "Epsom Common" and "Epsom Common fields." Such information might easily be given, and he should like to obtain an assurance that it would be afforded in future schedules. He suggested that the distance of these inclosures from the metropolis, or from any large town, should be stated.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that a special Report by the Commissioners used to be necessary with respect to inclosures within fifteen miles of the metropolis; but by a more recent Act no inclosure could take place within that distance without the assent of Parliament. A special Report was also made in such cases.

MR. BRISCOE said, that the inclosure referred to by the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Peacocke) had been the subject of full and careful inquiry by the Inclosure Commissioners, and no injury would be sustained by the public in the inclosure.

MR. PEACOCKE said, he should feel himself compelled to divide the House upon the schedule, unless the right hon. Gentleman gave him some assurance that the engagement which had been made with him should be kept. He wished to know if the necessary information should be given to the House for the future.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that a note should be added to the schedule in the case of property within a reasonable distance of London. In this instance the understanding made with the hon. Gentleman had been carried out by the omission from the schedule of the inclosure of a part of Epsom Common.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Monday next.

EDUCATIONAL AND CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS BILL—[BILL 97.]

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. LYGON, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to provide for the Episcopal Superintendence of certain Educational and Charitable Institutions, said, that within the last few years many of these educational and charitable institutions had been founded in various parishes in England with the consent of the incumbents of the parishes. It was possible, we hear, that in the future the appointment of the right be some difficulty experienced in conducting these institutions. The institutions to which the Bill specially referred had chapels attached, and in these chapels divine service was performed with the consent of the incumbents. He proposed, however, that they should be placed more immediately under the control of the Bishop of the diocese, who would be intrusted with the power of granting licences for these places of worship under certain regulations which would at the same time guarantee the fulfilment of the intentions of the founders.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to provide for the Episcopal Superintendence of certain Educational and Charitable Institutions, ordered to be brought in by Mr. LYGON and Mr. WALTER.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 97.]

THAMES RIVER.

Select Committee on the Thames River appointed; and, on Thursday, April 6, Committee nominated as follows:—

Mr. MILNER GIBSON, Mr. MALINS, Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, Mr. BATHURST, Sir FREDERIC SMITH, Mr. GREGORY, Mr. HANKEY, Sir FRANCIS GOLDSMID, Mr. NEATE, Mr. BARING, Mr. JOHN REGINALD YORKE, Mr. DAWSON DAMER, and Mr. HENRY FENWICK:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

House adjourned at half after Eleven o'clock, till Monday next.

JURIES (IRELAND) BILL.

PRESENTED. FIRST READING. (NO. 55.)

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH in presenting a Bill to amend the law relating to Juries in Criminal Cases in Ireland, said, the matter was one which ought to be taken up by the Law Officers of the Crown, and not left in the hands of a private Member of their Lordships' House; but there had been lately some glaring instances of failure of justice in Ireland which were quite sufficient to justify him in laying the present Bill upon the table. In Donegal an accused person had been three times put upon his trial for the murder of a steward, named Grierson; the jury could not agree, and after the third trial the prisoner was discharged. A merrymaking was the consequence, at which the Roman Catholic clergyman appeared, tar barrels were burnt, and great mobs assembled to rejoice at the escape of the accused. In Monaghan a man was tried for the second time for the murder of his wife, and there again a most lamentable failure of justice took place. A man was tried in Mullingar for having attempted to seduce a soldier from his allegiance to Her Majesty, and to induce him to enlist in the American army. In that case one of the jurymen said he considered it no crime at all, and he would never consent to a verdict which would tend to the support of British laws. Unfortunately, in Ireland, the Crown had abandoned the right of challenging the jury, and the consequences were such as he had mentioned in the north-east and west of Ireland. Now what he proposed to do was to enable juries to return a verdict where three-fourths were agreed, and also to enable the Law Officers of the Crown to change the venue where such a course might appear to be required.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS BILL—(No. 32.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Petitions against the Bill of Masters, Fellows, and Scholars of St. Mary Magdalene College, Cambridge; of Edward Allesbey Boughton Ward Boughton Leigh; of Persons educated at Eton; of Warden and Scholars of New College, Oxford; of Governors and Trustees of Shrewsbury School; of Trustees of Rugby School; of inhabitants of Harrow, and Pinner—presented.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he had two Petitions of considerable importance to present against the measure. The first was signed by twelve Professors and eighty-one Tutors and Lecturers of the University of Oxford, and constituting, he was told, fully three-fourths of the whole educational staff of the University. It was not signed by a single Head of a House, or by any member of the University, except those actually engaged in the business of teaching. The Petitioners stated that they had witnessed with concern the introduction of the Public Schools Bill, by which it was proposed to vest in certain "governing bodies" large powers for the present reform and management of the Schools in question, that no permanent governing bodies, and particularly not such governing bodies as were contemplated in the Bill, could be advantageously intrusted with the making of new statutes for the public schools, nor with their future regulation; and thus, since they were composed for the most part of former masters, who, however distinguished for literary or scientific acquirements, had no practical knowledge of education; the Petitioners expressed an opinion, in regard to which he entertained some doubt, that the duty of making laws and regulations for the government of these Schools should be intrusted to an Executive Commission appointed for a limited time, and not connected with the Schools, and similar to those enjoyed by the Oxford and Cambridge Commissions; they thought that schools were most advantageously dealt with on the responsibility of the Head Master, and they added that those schools had flourished most which were least interfered with by the governing body; the Petitioners apprehended that the residence of one or more of the governing body in or near the School would weaken the authority of the Head Master; and they prayed their Lordships to withhold their sanction from the Bill, especially those clauses relating to the powers and constitution of the governing bodies of schools. The other Petition against the Bill was from parties whose rights of property were seriously interfered with by the measure. It was from the Wardens and Commonalty of the Mercers' Company. The Petitioners set forth that St. Paul's School was founded in 1512 by Dean Colet, a member of that body, and son of a mercer, who gave the Company certain estates absolutely for the payment of a sum of £79 8s. 4d. for the education of 153 boys—a very moderate sum, as it seemed, for that purpose; they stated that Dean Colet gave the surplus property to the Company; that since his decease the value of these estates had much increased; that the Company had, however, never applied the surplus to their own use; that there had, on the contrary, been a deficiency, and that, for many years past, they had applied a sum of £7,000 a year towards the purposes of education in connection with the School; that the School House having been burnt down in the Great Fire of 1666, it was rebuilt by the Mercers' Company out of their private resources; that in 1861 a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the management of Public Schools and made a Report, in which they recommended that the claims of the Company to the surplus income arising from the estates left by Dean Colet should be settled by a judicial decision, and they represented that until that was done it would be premature to bring any scheme relative to the school before Parliament; the Petitioners complained that, notwithstanding this Report, the present Bill contained clauses which would injuriously interfere with their rights, and which would prevent them from disposing of property with which they had a right to deal; that this was a scheme affecting the private property of the Mercers' Company, the right to deal with which it was proposed to vest in another body; the Petitioners represented that it was unjust to deprive them of the power of managing St. Paul's School; and they prayed that the measure might not pass into a law, or that if it should obtain their Lordships' assent the clauses affecting their rights and interests might be expunged therefrom. This was a petition from persons who were well entitled to express their opinions, and whose interests ought not to be jeopardized without the fullest consideration.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: My Lords, in moving the second reading of a Bill, founded upon the recommendations of a Commission issued under Her Majesty's letters patent in 1861, for the purpose of inquiring into the endowments, emoluments, studies, management, and teaching of certain Colleges and Schools, I think it will not be useless or out of place if I briefly recall to your Lordships' recollection the circumstances under which that Commission was issued, and the spirit in which it conducted its inquiry. It is most erroneous to suppose that that spirit was hostile in general to the schools and colleges which were the subject of inquiry. This Commission was due to my lamented relative, Sir George Cornewall Lewis, of whom

Eton was justly proud—a man who had attracted the marked admiration of his contemporaries—and whose loss was deeply mourned by all. In common with other thoughtful men he came to the conclusion that our old public schools were not keeping pace with the age, and that, relying on their ancient renown, their well established reputation and undoubted usefulness, they had become to a certain extent stagnant and unmindful of the requirements of a time characterized by remarkable mental activity and by general improvement in the systems of education. He therefore thought the moment had arrived for inquiry into the causes and remedies of defects which were unquestionable, and to which public attention was aroused. The inquiry, however, was undertaken and conducted not with a desire to condemn, but in that spirit which prompts men to improve and to render as far as possible perfect, that which they hold in the highest respect. My Lords, the Commissioners were named by my lamented Friend; and putting myself out of the question—which I do unaffectedly—I say they were well entitled to the confidence of the country. Eton, Westminster, Rugby and Harrow could not have named more efficient, able, and friendly representatives; and we had the advantage of associating with us as our Secretary the distinguished Professor of International Law at Oxford. We began by issuing printed questions in a tabular form to the authorities of the schools, and subsequently to professors and tutors of colleges, all of which were answered with a readiness and a completeness which deserve our hearty acknowledgment. We personally visited the schools, we examined 130 witnesses, we held 127 meetings, and produced four blue-books. [A laugh.] Noble Lords may laugh, but I will undertake to say that those books did not meet with the usual fate of such literature, but were read and commented on throughout the whole country, and the interest they excited was unquestionable. Our Report and the recommendations it contained were the result of long and careful inquiry and of much anxious discussion; and I was, therefore, sorry to find that my noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Derby) gave these recommendations a very qualified approval and that he applied to them the well known lines—

Quæ legis.”

I confess that I heard my noble Friend with regret, the more so because on such a subject the well earned fame of my noble Friend as a scholar gave, if possible, additional weight to his opinion. I also heard with regret that my noble Friend thought we ought not to have brought in a Bill this year, and ought to have remained another year without doing anything, in order to give the authorities of the different schools time to consider whether any of our recommendations could be introduced with advantage into the institutions over which they presided. My Lords, twelve months have elapsed since that Report was issued, debates have taken place in both Houses; and I announced that we would postpone any legislation on the matter until this year, in order to give full time for consideration, and for spontaneous adoption by the school authorities of such portions of the recommendations as they approved; and, as I said before, the question attracted general attention throughout the country. In introducing a Bill, therefore, this year on the subject, I think there is no undue haste on the part of the Government and no unfair pressure; and I cannot agree with my noble Friend in thinking that the delay of another year is necessary—because it would be an absurdity, or rather an insult to the governing bodies and the learned Head Masters of these Schools, to suppose that in the course of twelve months they would be unable to make up their minds as to the expediency or the usefulness of our recommendations, if they intended to take those recommendations into consideration at all. I say that if they did not do so in the first year, still less would they do so in the second, when they might fairly assume that the Government was negligent, that Parliament was indifferent, that the question had become stale, and that no legislation whatever was likely to be attempted. But facts are better than arguments in such a case as this, and I can give a practical proof that no such delay would be necessary, because within three months after our Report was issued, the enlightened and accomplished Head Master of Rugby School, whose time and energies are as sorely taxed as any other Head Master in England, issued, after consulting with the Masters, an elaborate report to the Trustees of the School, pointing out which part of our recommendations he should advise them to accept and to act upon. Dr. Temple said that there would never perhaps be so good an opportunity of introducing reforms into the School, and he therefore proposed to the Trustees to bring into immediate operation that part of the recommendations which he thought would be beneficial. I think, therefore, that if within three or four months Dr. Temple came to this conclusion, there would be no impossibility in other Head Masters making up their minds as to the expediency of pursuing the same course. I will go further and say that from the many and anxious inquiries addressed to us as to the intentions of the Government, I feel certain that the feeling would have been one of bitter disappointment if legislation had been postponed for another year. When, therefore, my noble Friend complains of the recommendations of the Commissioners and the undue haste of the Government, I hope I am not wrong in attributing this criticism to the exigencies of the first night of the Session, when my noble Friend is under the necessity of finding fault with each paragraph of the Speech. At all events, I am sure I should be wrong in attributing to my noble Friend any desire to give a party character to a subject which of all others should be kept out of the political arena and clear of political strife, because the question at issue—namely, the method which should be adopted in our public schools for the formation of character, and the fitting of 3,000 English youths for the high positions which they will be called on to fill—is a question of national interest.

My Lords, it is not my intention on the present occasion to advert to the defects and shortcomings of these Schools. They must be familiar to those of your Lordships who have read the Report; they have been largely commented upon by the press; and I think I shall best consult the wishes and feelings of the House if I confine myself to an endeavour to explain the Bill which is immediately under your consideration. The Bill, I trust and believe, will in no respect interfere with the great feature of our public school system—the system of government and of discipline, resulting in that manliness, that self-reliance and independence of character, that love of freedom combined with respect for authority, which give to our public Schools in England so large a share in moulding the character of our national life. We do not forget that the object of a public school education is no less to form the character than to develop the mind—indeed, I may perhaps say it is still more so, because between the ages of ten and twenty the character is formed for good or for evil, and receives an impulse and direction which undergoes no essential variation; whereas, after the age of twenty, a man may and often must learn, and the promptings of ambition or the pressure of self-interest will compel him to correct the deficiencies of his education. But, I will ask your Lordships, is it necessary that when a boy of nineteen leaves school—I know there are great and brilliant exceptions, but I am taking the average boy—is it necessary that when a boy of nineteen has learnt to be manly and self-reliant, and has been imbued with the character of an English gentleman, he should at the same time be unable to construe an easy sentence from the Latin or the Greek, should be unacquainted with the history and literature of his own country, should know no modern language besides his own, and be scarcely able to write even that correctly—that he know nothing of physical laws, and, in fact, after having passed the best years of his life in learning, should have learnt so little? I do not think this is right, and I think your Lordships will all be of opinion, not alone from the results of our inquiry, that a defect must exist somewhere. I may say that the aim of the Commission was to place in the hands of the teaching and governing bodies of the Schools, and of parents and of the public generally, the information of which we were possessed. Before this, one School knew little of the system pursued at others. We, therefore, thought it essential that the information given should be ample and unreserved, and we trusted to the pressure of public opinion to carry into effect the necessary reforms; but we never for one moment entertained the idea of reforming the discipline and government of the Schools by direct legislation. Nor, if we had done so, would the Government have sanctioned such a contrivance. We felt that in order to carry into effect the necessary reforms the task should be intrusted to those who are properly responsible—the governing bodies of the Schools. The governing bodies, who know the practical working of the system, are the most competent judges of when, and how, and to what extent, modifications of the existing system would be judicious. It seemed to us that the province of Parliament was to confer sufficient power on the governing bodies, and to take care that it was accompanied with commensurate responsibility. This, my Lords, is the principle of the Bill, and its scope is limited to the definition of the governing bodies and their relations to the

Head Masters. We consider that improvement of the governing bodies was necessary, because as at present constituted we did not think they are equal to the discharge of the duties imposed upon them. It is hardly necessary to refer to the changes which have taken place in the functions of these governing bodies since the foundations of the Schools. The foundations themselves are of very early date; one was established at the close of the 14th, and another at the beginning of the 17th century; one during the reign of Richard II., and another during that of James I.; and, naturally, the enormous developments which have since taken place in the size of the Schools have produced corresponding changes in the governing bodies. In the alterations which we thought necessary to introduce we did not aim at uniformity; but there are some principles that are common to all governing bodies. They should be permanent—they should not be too numerous; but they should, at the same time, be protected by the number and character and position of their members from domination of whatever kind, whether of local, of personal, or professional influence. We desired that they should comprise men conversant with the world, with the requirements of active life, and with the progress of general science. There are powers of two kinds which we desire to give to the governing bodies; some of them to be used at once, others according to circumstances and to the necessities which may arise. The foundations in course of time have undergone very important changes, and it is highly necessary that these changes should either be confirmed or modified by some competent authority, instead of being left, as now, in a condition which must naturally give rise to a conflict of authority. We think it essential that at old foundations, such as Eton and Westminster, there should exist extensive powers of amendment. But where, old constitutions having been construed according to usage or necessity, there has arisen a lamentable absence of moral obligation, there is necessarily a great absence of security that changes, when advisable to be made, will be undertaken with definite views and under due responsibility. Your Lordships will find in the clauses of this Bill provisions by which all statutes, amended or new, shall be laid before Her Majesty in Council, and that five Privy Councillors, two of them members of the Judicial Committee, shall be appointed to whom such matters shall be specially referred. All such statutes likewise must be published. There are thus abundant safeguards against their hasty adoption or any interference with the rights of individuals. We also propose to give the governing bodies the power of framing regulations with regard to the management of the Schools. These regulations at present vary to a considerable extent. In some schools, again, there is a direct control over the foundation; in others, the control is neither direct nor undisputed. In some cases, therefore, the governing bodies interfere where they are not properly responsible; in others, they refrain from interfering where they ought properly to do so. I know that the section to which I am now alluding, which gives power to governing bodies to make regulations, is one that has excited a great deal of interest, from the fact that there are those who fear it may operate prejudicially. I should be extremely sorry if I thought that it would undermine the authority of the heads of the different schools. We are fully alive to the importance of making the Head Master independent within his proper sphere, and of leaving his management of the School in all the details of education unfettered. But there are some matters upon which the Commissioners thought, and the Government have agreed with them, that some power of interference should be vested in the governing bodies. For instance, we have thought it desirable that the governing bodies should have a voice—

“With respect to the number of boys other than boys on the foundation in the School, their ages, and the conditions of admission to the School. With respect to the mode in which the boys, whether on the foundation or not, are to be boarded and lodged, and the conditions on which leave to keep a boarding-house should be given. With respect to the payments to be made for the maintenance and education of the boys other than boys on the foundation, including fees and charges of all kinds, and to payments by boys on the foundation in respect of anything which they are not entitled to receive gratuitously; and with respect to the application of the moneys to be derived from those sources, and of moneys paid out of the income of the foundation on account of the instruction of boys on the foundation. With respect to attendance at Divine service, and, where the school has a chapel of its own, with respect to the chapel service and services. With respect to the times and length of the holydays. With respect to the subjects of study and the general discipline and management of the school. With respect to the general disposal (otherwise than by way of mortgage or alienation) of any surplus income belonging to the school in such manner as

These are all matters in which we thought the interference of a discreet and well constituted governing body might be beneficial; and I may also add that those recommendations are all founded upon the evidence we have received. But I beg your Lordships to remark that these are not powers necessarily to be used, but discretionary powers. In some schools the governing bodies, feeling satisfied with the conduct and success of the Head Master, wisely abstain from all interference; but there are other cases in which interference, or rather the knowledge that the power of interference exists, may operate most beneficially. Despotism is never safe or prudent, no matter in whose hands it may be placed; it is always liable to abuse, unless some checks be imposed upon it, or unless it is attended with corresponding responsibility. All these matters are left to the governing bodies, and I am bound to say that within the duties of their sphere, and acting according to their instructions, they, as well as the Head Masters, have rendered service. We have also thought it necessary to deal with some of the privileges of the foundations; because, upon careful inquiry, it appeared that sometimes they did not fulfil either the local, personal, or general intentions of the founder. As the details of these proposals have excited a good deal of remark, I will, with your Lordships' permission, read a short extract from the Commissioners' Report with respect to the foundation at Harrow. The Commissioners say—

"There are at both Harrow and Rugby, boys who, as the sons of residents, are educated at charges to the parents much lower than the rest, and much below what may be called the cost price of the teaching they receive. A foundation boy at Harrow receives, like others, instruction in school, but he does not, like others, pay for it; and thus the expense of teaching one class of boys is borne by the parents of another class, directly or indirectly, or by the masters themselves. It is, however, to be observed that the parents of the boys who are thus privileged are chiefly—at Harrow almost exclusively—strangers to the neighbourhood, who have come to reside there temporarily for the mere purpose of obtaining, at little expense to themselves, a good education for their children. The question we have to consider is, whether the maintenance of the local privilege in favour of these persons, and of the few permanent residents who desire a public school education for their sons, is recommended either by respect for the founder's intentions or by any other sufficient reason. We think that it is not. That such a privilege as we have described should be enjoyed by the class which now chiefly enjoys it was certainly not intended or contemplated by the founder; we cannot, from his expressed intentions, infer that he would have deemed it desirable, nor does it appear to be a legitimate adaptation of them to the circumstances of the present day. That persons of small means should be enabled to educate their children well and cheaply is, no doubt, a public advantage, provided this is done without either indirectly throwing an increased charge upon others, or curtailing the just remuneration of the teacher. But this, in our opinion, is already sufficiently met by the admission of home-boarders, who differ from foundationers only in paying a fair price for the instruction they receive. We shall recommend, therefore, the abolition in these cases of the local privilege, due precautions being used to prevent hardship to persons who may have taken up their residence in a particular place with the view of availing themselves of it."

With respect to the introduction of men of literature and science into the governing bodies, much objection has been taken and much difficulty has arisen; but I can safely say, upon the part of the Government and the Commission, that having no intention to cast the slightest slur on the existing bodies, they were of opinion this should be done solely as a matter of principle having regard to those different branches of study, the establishment or more vigorous prosecution of which at our public schools they deemed to be desirable; and this provision of the Bill has been introduced as applicable to this view of the subject. We saw no reason why men who had devoted themselves to science and literature should necessarily be devoid of common sense and judgment; and I am sure if your Lordships had the opportunity which the Commissioners enjoyed—and I say "enjoyed" advisedly in the fullest sense of the word—of hearing the evidence of the Astronomer Royal, Sir Charles Lyell, Professor Faraday, and other eminent witnesses, and learning how powerful were their arguments in favour of endeavouring to ascertain the individual capabilities of the boys, instead of compelling all boys to run invariably in the same groove; how full of hope and promise they were that the process which they advocated would prove successful, and how moderate their demand was that a certain time should be allowed to be abstracted from what may be called the more normal studies—I think you would be of opinion with the Commissioners, that no governing body would be the worse for the change in this respect which we propose. I am myself a member of a governing body, and I most heartily desire the prosperity and welfare of the great school with which I am connected, and I feel it would be of the utmost advantage that my Colleagues and myself should have the assistance of men eminent in letters and science. But, whatever may be your Lordships' decision on this point, I beg it to be distinctly understood that we cast no reflection whatever on any of the members composing the present governing bodies, and that it is simply as a measure of general expediency that we make this proposal, and as a proof that we desire to recognize the honour due to science and literature.

Our aim, I may add, in this Bill has not been to introduce details on which legislation could not be well brought to bear. Our first object was to place the future Government of those schools in able and competent hands; the next to guide, to a certain extent, the bodies so constituted, admitting at the same time that there is no system of education and discipline which will not require much attention. I trust the proposals we make will recommend themselves to the notice of your Lordships and that you will permit this Bill to be read a second time. It was the province, as it is the duty, of the Government to introduce a measure to give effect to the recommendations of the Commission, and we are of opinion that the petitions which have been laid on the table this evening afford some proof that, in proposing a moderate measure, and steering a middle course, we have done justice on the one hand to the existing authorities, and on the other to those who have protested against their shortcomings; although we may have at the same time exposed ourselves to a double fire from those who advocate opposite views upon this question. On the present occasion I will express no opinion on either side, and will only say that when the Bill goes into Committee after the Easter recess, it behoves the Government to take into their consideration whatever Amendments may be proposed in the same spirit in which I am sure they will be brought forward, and with the same anxious desire by which we are all animated, cordially to co-operate in the endeavour to achieve the national object of giving to the rising generation and generations yet unborn all the advantages which a sound public education can confer.

—(The Earl of Clarendon.)

EARL STANHOPE said, he readily acknowledged the moderation, candour, and fairness of the statement which had just been made by his noble Friend. Of the Bill, however, which that statement was intended to explain he could not speak with equal satisfaction. Some of the changes which were proposed in it were not in his opinion changes in the right direction, and others would not, he thought, effect the objects which the Government professed to have in view. The Bill was introduced by his noble Friend in his double capacity of Chairman of the late Commission and one of Her Majesty's Ministers, and recommended by this authority he should very much regret if any person in that House moved its rejection on the second reading. He thought it behoved their Lordships to go into Committee upon it. But in Committee it would certainly require a sifting, a thorough examination—the more so since, as he would beg their Lordships to observe, the Bill was not so much a single measure as a congeries or collection of Bills containing different provisions applicable to different schools. He (Earl Stanhope), in the first place, took exception to the provision relating to the appointment of members of the governing bodies by the nomination of the Crown, which applied to some schools and not to all. If there was one advantage which more than another had hitherto distinguished the public Schools of England it was their complete exemption from the influence of party spirit. He did not ascribe to the present Government that they would be actuated by any party motives in the appointments which they might make; but there had been times in our annals—and that at no very distant period—when party spirit might have formed an element in the making of those appointments; and the introduction of such a spirit even in the smallest degree in the case of those public bodies was, he thought, extremely to be deprecated. As things at present stood no questions were asked as to the politics of those by whom our public schools were governed. Nor was any distinction made between the sons of the most opposite politicians who were educated at the school. But even assuming, for the sake of argument, the principle of Government nomination as one which it would be well to adopt, why, he should like to know, was it to operate in the case of some schools and not in the case of others? That was a point on which he should like to have some explanation, and he trusted it would be furnished by his noble Friend. There had within the last few days been circulated in a printed form a representation from the Provost and Fellows of Eton, in which they said—

And again—

“While the Election of the Warden of Winchester is placed in the hands of the governing body the appointment of the Provost of Eton is transferred from the College to the Crown.”

So much for that part of the Bill; but there was another portion of it also to which, in his opinion, very strong grounds of objection existed. As it stood its operation would be to sever that connection which had so long subsisted between certain Schools and certain Colleges at Oxford or Cambridge. Now, that connection had, he believed, been productive of very great advantage on both sides, as was very clearly pointed out in the case of Shrewsbury School and St. John's College, Cambridge, in a letter which had a few days ago appeared from the Master of that College in The Times newspaper. Under these circumstances it appeared to him to be extremely inexpedient that such a connection should be altogether swept away. Then, again, he could not understand the provision by which it was proposed to deal with the right of visitation. Was it contended that such a right of visitation as at present existed in these cases—in which, for instance, the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London were, he believed, joint visitors at Harrow School—was not likely to be attended with advantage? In what manner, he would ask, was it now proposed to deal with that right of visitation, for the Bill, as he believed, was silent on that point? Then, passing to another branch of the subject, he confessed that, notwithstanding the remarks of his noble Friend, he was inclined to regret the entire abolition of the rights of foundationers at the public Schools. At Harrow, and some other places, it was proposed to preserve existing rights, but that in future the privilege should cease altogether. As far as concerned persons who went to reside at particular places, merely in order that their sons might enjoy these advantages, this provision might be fair; but as to bond fide residents and those locally interested, he thought that it would be productive of hardship. In saying this he wished to guard himself against being supposed to go the length of a Resolution which had been adopted at a Meeting of the Vestry of Harrow held on the 6th of March, to the following effect:—

“The Vestry protest more earnestly against the proposed alteration in the existing rules which prescribe a necessary local connection between the parish and those chosen to be governors—regulations which they are well aware have not been fully carried out at the two last elections.”

It appeared from the concluding words that the object of the Vestry was not the continuance of the present practice, but the renewal of one which was already in great part obsolete. It appeared, above all, that according to their view, or to a legitimate deduction from it, even the most unfit man, if he had property in the parish of Harrow, was better qualified to be a governor than the most fit man who had no such property connection. Was it really possible to put forward such a claim in the present day? It might find currency among those who were locally concerned, but it would be a matter of surprise if it should receive the support of a single Member in either House of Parliament. Looking to the whole subject, and to the difficulties which surrounded it, he was inclined to think that it would be better to leave the decision of these questions to an Executive Commission—he did not mean a Commission with unlimited power, but one similar to those to which the reformation of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge was intrusted, and which had discharged their duties with signal success. Of Oxford he could speak in some degree from personal knowledge, and he would appeal to the most rev. Prelate (the Archbishop of Canterbury) whom he saw opposite, as to the good effects in practice which had resulted from the work of that Commission. The establishment of a Commission of that kind was the more to be desired because the governing bodies of these schools were to be re-constituted. He did not desire to see an uniform system applied to all schools; on the contrary, he should deprecate any levelling measure, or the sweeping away of all special usages or particular distinctions; but still, there were many points to which the supervision of a central body might be applied with advantage. Take the case of the subjects of study. New subjects might have to be added, as in the case of modern languages or natural sciences. Old subjects might have to be omitted—as in the case of that most preposterous practice surviving in no one country but this—the practice of Greek composition. In the case, then, of any changes being made—as they should be, but not till public opinion was fully ripe, and went cordially along with the change proposed—these changes could not, of course, be limited to any one school, but must apply, if at all, to every one of them. The aid of a superintending body or central Commission would then become absolutely necessary. Nay, more, it would be indispensable, in such cases, to take a comprehensive view, not only of all the schools together, but also of the Universities and schools as combined to one common end. This last point had been extremely well put by Dr. Kennedy, than whom no abler or worthier man had ever, perhaps, presided over any any of our public schools. Dr. Kennedy, the Head Master at Shrewsbury, had last year published a letter in reference to the question to which he (Earl Stanhope) had just now referred—the question of Greek composition in verse and prose; and he pointed out that since schools were held as preparatory to the Universities, it would be impossible to discontinue that practice at schools so long as prizes were granted for it, or examinations were held comprising it at Oxford or at Cambridge. He (Earl Stanhope) was also most anxious that the necessary improvements should, if possible, be made by the governing bodies themselves, as was the case under the Oxford and Cambridge Acts, rather than be forced upon them by external legislation; and that object might, he believed, be best attained by means of such a Commission as he had suggested. Their Lordships might rely upon it that of all reforms none was so safe or so lasting as self-reform. It was only when the ruling powers continued to refuse to reform themselves that it was justifiable to enforce their compliance by a power from without. With such views, then, he would go into Committee. He would oppose certain portions of the Bill in Committee, without, however, being in any way influenced by that party spirit which he agreed with his noble Friend (the Earl of Clarendon) ought to be entirely deprecated by their Lordships in examining a question of so much importance.

THE EARL OF DEVON said, that it having been his privilege to be associated with the noble Earl who had introduced this Bill as a Member of the Commission upon Public Schools, he was anxious, in the first place, to avail himself of the opportunity of stating his entire concurrence with nearly all the conclusions at which the noble Earl had arrived. He felt it to be his duty to support the Bill, reserving to himself the right of proposing in Committee—supposing their Lordships to read the Bill a second time—such modifications as he might think the various provisions of the Bill required. Looking at the general scope of the Bill, he thought the Government had exercised a wise discretion in confining its provisions to two objects—one being the modification of the governing bodies, and the other the removal of certain local privileges. The other details of the Bill would more properly form the subject of discussion in Committee, where the various clauses would have to be re-considered. The noble Earl who had just sat down (Earl Stanhope) stated his preference for the appointment of an Executive Commission on the ground that it would lead to greater uniformity.

EARL STANHOPE observed, he had expressly stated that he did not wish for uniformity.

THE EARL OF DEVON said, he was sorry he misunderstood the noble Earl; still, he thought the appointment of an Executive Commission must in the result tend to greater uniformity than the plan proposed in the Bill. It must be observed that it was only proposed by this Bill to modify, and not to overthrow, the existing governing bodies of these Schools. The governing bodies would be, in the main, the same as formerly; certain additions would be made to them, and certain persons would be removed from them, but the main staple would be the same, and the additions would bear but a small proportion to the existing bodies. Then any reforms which might be introduced would be greatly influenced by the traditions of the Schools. Whether such modifications as were suggested should or should not be made appeared to him to depend upon the question whether the public schools were at present in a satisfactory condition. In his opinion a more beneficial application of the funds at the disposal of those bodies might, in many cases, be made. He did not think any noble Lord could read the Report of the Public Schools Commission and the evidence taken before them, without seeing that much was required to be done to adapt our public schools to the requirements of the time. He did not think that the tendency of this Bill was to reduce the influence or fetter the discretion of the Head Master. At any rate such was not the wish or intention of the Commissioners. On the contrary they distinctly recommended that, as well upon certain specified subjects placed under the control of the governing body as upon all subjects affecting the instruction or management of the school, it should be incumbent on the governing body "not only to consider attentively any representation which the Head Master might address to them, but to consult him in such a manner as to give ample opportunity for the expression of his views." He regretted that a provision to give binding force to this recommendation was not introduced into the Bill. The constitution of the existing governing bodies differed according to the origin and constitution of the several schools. In some, as Eton, Westminster, and Winchester, the school forms part of a collegiate or ecclesiastical foundation, and the Government, as well as the property, is vested in certain principal members of the foundation. In the case of Harrow and Charterhouse the governing body were appointed under the charter; at Rugby and Shrewsbury by Act of Parliament. Eton was governed by the Provost, Vice Provost, and a number of Fellows. In speaking of that School, he (the Earl of Devon) wished to express his concurrence in the opinion expressed by the noble Earl with respect to the readiness of the authorities at Eton to give the fullest information on all matters affecting that foundation. In Winchester the governing body consisted of a Warden and six Fellows; and in Westminster of the Dean and Chapter. If improvements were to be introduced into these Schools, they could not satisfactorily be carried out without a change in the governing bodies, and the alterations proposed in the Bill with regard to the governing bodies would go far to enable those Schools to do more efficiently those duties they had so long and so honourably discharged. Among these duties were those of regulating the number of boys, their board and lodging, the school fees and charges, the attendance at Divine service, the length and times of the holydays, the subjects of study, and the general disposal of any surplus income belonging to the Schools. For these purposes, the proposed composition of the respective governing bodies appeared to him, on the whole, well adapted. The second branch of the Bill dealt with certain local rights of gratuitous education, the abolition of which, saving existing rights, appeared likely to be beneficial to the schools. He was not disposed to offer any opposition to this change, which appeared to be justified by the change of times and circumstances. Under these circumstances, he felt bound to express his general concurrence in the Bill.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: My Lords, in common with many of your Lordships, I feel very great difficulty with regard to this measure. It seems to me to be the desire of many noble Lords that the second reading of this Bill should be agreed to; and yet there seems to exist a doubt in the minds of many whether the Bill will really accomplish the objects for which it is intended. I must confess I sympathize very much with the noble Earl (Earl Stanhope), who said it would have been the better course if this subject, as in the case of the Universities, had been referred to an Executive Commission, and I cannot see that modifications in the governing bodies directly made by Parliament will better accomplish the purpose. If I remember rightly, when the Universities were reformed, there was a great change made in the governing bodies of those institutions, and an Executive Commission was appointed to carry out certain fundamental changes which it was supposed would be better in their hands than in those of the governing bodies from year to year. I cannot help thinking that in the case of the changes which may be required in these public Schools it would have been better if the precedent of the reform of the Universities had been followed as closely as possible. Without intending any offence, I think I may say that this Bill is especially framed for the reform of Eton. No doubt it will appear invidious to make this assertion; but I believe that those who most heartily desire that Eton may flourish will be those who evince the greatest anxiety that the institution may arrive as nearly as possible at a state of perfection. The hold which this great School has upon the affections of the country, can never, I think, be diminished. As the education imparted at Eton is, so in a great degree will the education of the country be. The Universities themselves will be affected by the condition of this School. No one can consider its traditions, its noble buildings, the list of great names which it has produced, without honouring the place and understanding the desire of the parents of this country to enrol their sons among its members. It is the fashion in some quarters at the present time rather to disparage Eton. Some of the evidence produced before the Commission speaks strongly of a state of things among the generality of the boys which is by no means creditable. Still no one will, I think, forget how much the country owes to the School, and how much Eton at the present time contributes to the education of the country. My own experience as the tutor of a college at Oxford induces me to say that no young men more distinguished themselves in obtaining open scholarships at the University than the Etonians; and I have no reason to think that the present race of Etonians is inferior. I should be ungrateful were I not to say that there is no School in the country where young boys are better attended to, their characters more watched, and all that is good within them better developed than at Eton. The boys and the masters of Eton are possessed of that sort of feeling which a young man experiences on first becoming a member of Christ Church, and viewing on the walls of that college the list of statesmen, divines, and men of letters who have adorned it; or which induces others to regard the time when they became Fellows of Trinity as the proudest moment of their lives. That sort of feeling fully accounts for the great popularity of the place, and the desire of parents that their sons should be educated at an institution where there is so much in the recollections of the past to incite them to exertion; and for this reason, therefore, Eton will ever be the leading School of the country. But in proportion to the strength of this feeling, the more imperative is it that the School itself should be brought as near perfection as possible, and if we feel that there are some defects, we are anxious to see them remedied. Among the admitted evils of the present state of that and other public schools is the system of double government, and the absence of any direct and adequate responsibility; by which it may happen that a man placed in a very responsible position, and selected to fill that position on account of his merits, is to have a man sitting opposite to him to prevent him from carrying out that which, in his conscience, he regards as desirable. This opposition is not offered from any feeling of obstructiveness, but arises simply from the fact that a man naturally does not believe in the possibility of his successor improving upon the system which he himself has maintained. This is a defect which, I think, Eton, in common with some other of the public schools, labours under—that there is not sufficient responsibility devolved upon one man. Now, besides this great difficulty of the double government, there is also the great difficulty attendant upon the limited sphere from which the Head Master is selected. Whether the statutes of the college require that the Head Master should be selected from so narrow a sphere, I do not know; but as a matter of fact, the competition is very limited. No doubt admirable men are selected in spite of this limitation. No doubt Eton possesses Masters in every respect worthy the position they occupy, and fully deserving the regard which is extended to them; but this is the result of accident, and it can surely never be right that the highest place of education in this country should be so circumstanced as practically to have only one or two men from whom the Head Master can be selected. These are evils which it is very important to have remedied. A man who from his childhood, from the time when he was ten years of age, joined a school and has continued in the same place till he is sixty, never leaving it except during his three years' residence at the University, and even then consorting with those who come from the same school, is naturally exceedingly averse to change, though the change may be imperatively called for. As this is the result which may naturally be expected, it is no shame to this great place of education that it requires some changes. I think we may be convinced that the whole machinery of the place is such that it would be totally impossible that any great change should take place unless some one steps in to alter the constitution of the School. It is a curious question whether this Bill does alter the constitution of the School or not. On the one hand we are told that this is a most revolutionary measure—that you are going to introduce the authority of the Crown to sweep away all the old arrangements of the School. But let us consider what is the real state of the case. You have at present six Fellows, a Vice Provost and a Provost—that is, eight persons—and you are going to add to those eight persons, who are all Etonians, and who have most of them been Masters of the School, another who is Head of the Eton College at Cambridge, three other gentlemen who are to be nominated by the Crown, and two others who are to be elected by the existing body. So that you have eleven persons who are exactly similar to what they are at this moment; and are you to suppose that the three whom you are to introduce will be so powerful as to overrule the others and revolutionize the School? I cannot participate in the great alarm that seems to be felt that this great institution will be shaken by the introduction of those three nominees of the Crown. But then comes another grave question. The eminent Head Master of Eton sees another danger, and to my mind it is a grave one. At present he has to deal with the Provost; but according to this proposal, he will have to deal with the governing body. That is a danger which is greatly apprehended by all the Head Masters with whom I have had an opportunity of communicating. The governing body is, in the first instance, to be resident—one member is to reside for nine months, and most of the others for three months at least, and they are to have much more definite power than before. In fact, they will have nothing else to do but to interfere, and they are called upon by Act of Parliament to interfere as much as possible. I hold in my hand also a statement from the Masters of Harrow, who are all alarmed at the proposed constitution of their governing body. Now, no doubt these rights of interference are probably possessed by the governing bodies at this moment; but then they are not stirred up by Act of Parliament to interfere, and no doubt you wish by this Bill to stir them up to do so. The present governing bodies might be used for that purpose if necessary, but you do not put it into everybody's head to be perpetually using such powers. The eminent Head Master of Rugby, whose authority has been before quoted, has written to me in some alarm about these men of science whom it is proposed to introduce, and he is not a man likely to be easily alarmed. He says that what the School needs is trustees of good sense and knowledge of the world, and he fears that these four men of science would be perpetually tempted to justify the necessity for their appointment by trying to do what the Head Master ought to do if he is fit for his post. But that would be to diminish the Head Master's sense of responsibility, and I am confident in the end the School would lose more than it would gain. These are some of the difficulties with regard to the measure. But there is the further difficulty of dealing with persons whose property is very much interested—the difficulty with respect to the boys on the foundation at Harrow and Rugby. That something ought to be done with regard to these foundationers, I have no doubt; but whether they ought to be swept away may reasonably be questioned. But, at all events, I think all who are interested in this matter are entitled to be heard. It has always struck me that persons of moderate means among the upper classes—clergy, professional men, half-pay officers, and others—are with regard to the education of their sons placed in a great difficulty, to which such persons are not exposed in other countries. In Germany, France, Scotland, and other countries there is a facility of education for persons of moderate means which does not exist in England, and these foundations, whatever be their other advantages or disadvantages, certainly do open a means of education at moderate expense for such persons. Now, I think that the present system might be modified very much and greatly improved, and that if persons who are interested in the matter were heard before an Executive Commission the whole arrangements of the schools might be far better matured than they have been in the plan proposed. At the same time, far be it from me to throw the slightest impediment in the way of the reform of these schools, and if it be thought that to read this Bill the second time and afterwards consider it in Committee is the best mode of securing the great objects which the Commissioners have at heart, and for their careful inquiry with regard to which the country feels grateful, I shall be only too happy to promote their view.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, my noble Friend who moved the second reading of this Bill adverted to an observation which I made at the commencement of the present Session, from which he seemed to think that it would be a part of my quasi-official duty to find fault with this measure. Upon that occasion I certainly did make use of an expression which was perhaps too strong—rather stronger than I was justified in using. On that occasion I said, in speaking of the Report of the Commission, Sunt bona, sunt quædam mediocria, but I beg my noble Friend to observe that I said sunt mala plura—not sunt plura mala. I then spoke under the impression that my noble Friend was about to introduce a measure giving effect by the authority of Parliament to the recommendations of the Commissioners, and I thought if that were the case that it would be much better that time should be given to the various colleges and schools to see how far they could accommodate themselves to those recommendations, how far they were adapted to their own case, and whether they could conscientiously assent to them. The right rev. Prelate who has just sat down (the Bishop of London) has said quite correctly that the main object of the Bill is to attack Eton; and I and every Eton man must feel grateful for the terms in which he spoke of that great college, the justice he has done to it, and the tribute he has paid not only to its general excellence, but to the classical attainments of those who go from it to the University. But my noble Friend seemed to think that something had been done at Rugby. He said that in Rugby they had considered what recommendations could be adopted, that what had been done in one school might be done at others, and he intimated that no steps had been taken at Eton to comply with the recommendations of the Commissioners. Now, I received only a few days ago a letter from the Provost of Eton, some part of which, perhaps, my noble Friend will allow me to read. [The noble Earl then read some passages from the letter, in which the writer stated that it was not true that they had been idle since the Report came out; that several arrangements with regard to leases had been made at a sacrifice of £1,200 or £1,500; that they had opened some exhibitions for oppidans; that they had relieved the scholars from certain payments, were prepared to go further in the same direction, and that, in short, there was no part of the recommendations which was mere questions of money which they were not ready to carry out as soon as possible; that the Head Master had formed a scheme by which French and mathematics would be no longer neglected, but that they could not alter in a few months things which had been going on for 300 years.] I hope this will be my justification for the statement which I have made that it was desirable that some time should be given to the various schools in order to enable them to act upon the recommendations of the Commissioners of their own accord. But my objection as to the precipitancy of the measure does not apply to the present Bill, because, whatever its defects or merits, it does not really carry out any one of the recommendations of the Commissioners. It does not of itself make any alteration in the system of teaching, the course of studies, or the management of the schools. But what it does is this:—It attempts to constitute a new body which shall have power to deal with certain regulations and to make statutes. With regard to the composition of that body I must say that I think the proposal extremely objectionable. I am at a loss to understand why the authorities which we find in possession of the governing power under this Bill should be so different in their composition; why there should be nominees of the Crown in one school and not in another; why there should be representative scientific men in one school and not in another. I confess I do not entertain any apprehension that the three nominees of the Crown at Eton and the scientific men will overbear the eleven others who are members of Eton; but I think that the system and principle of introducing any Crown nominee whatever, or any interference on the part of the Government of the day with these great Schools, whose chief characteristic hitherto has been the entire independence which they have maintained, is clearly objectionable, and equally objectionable whether the number be three or thirteen. Whether it be three or thirteen is, in point of fact, very different, but the principle is just the same—it is the admission of the vicious policy of interference by the Crown with the governing bodies of these Schools. Now, with respect to these scientific gentlemen. How are they to be appointed? I do not know whether it is intended that these scientific gentlemen should pass a competitive examination. Are these governing bodies, who may have three or four vacancies, and who may have half-a-dozen scientific candidates for the stipendiary fellowships, to institute a competitive examination before they appoint; and how are they to decide that a man is distinguished for literary and scientific attainments? At Eton the stipendiary Fellows are to be “distinguished for literary or scientific attainments, or have done long and eminent service to the School as Head Master, Lower Master, or Assistant Master.” At Winchester the qualification is the same. At Shrewsbury the nominees of the Crown qualified are to be “graduates of Oxford or Cambridge, and men eminent in science and literature.” When we come to the Charter House, Harrow, and Rugby, we find that there are to be additional governors, who are to be "persons distinguished for literary or scientific attainments." I have the honour to be one of the governing body of the Charter House, and I may speak with some degree of pride of those who are my Colleagues. We have some among us who are quite as capable of judging of the qualifications of the Master and the management of the School as the most scientific persons who can be introduced under this Bill. There are among the governing body the two most rev. Prelates, the right rev. Prelate who has just addressed your Lordships, and who has some acquaintance with the management and discipline of public schools, two ex-Lord Chancellors, Sir George Turner, we had the late Sir Cresswell Cresswell, and others, who are quite as capable of managing an institution of that kind, and of seeing that it is properly conducted, as any persons distinguished for literary and scientific attainments. I agree with the right rev. Prelate when he said that if you introduce scientific persons into the governing body of these Schools, there is considerable danger that they will attempt to put forward that particular study in which they have obtained eminence. I do not propose to enter at the present moment into any discussion of the governing bodies as proposed to be constituted under this Bill. I will, therefore, only express my conviction that the introduction of nominees of the Crown and of men distinguished for literary or scientific attainments are two very objectionable provisions, with both of which I trust your Lordships will deal when we go into Committee. But what I wish distinctly to understand is, supposing these governing bodies to be constituted, and that we have confidence in them, with what object are the powers intrusted to them only conferred for two years? I can understand why this limit was adopted in the case of the University Commission, because it was required that certain statutes should pass, and if they did not pass before a certain time the Commissioners themselves were to pass the statutes and supply the deficiency. My noble Friend, however, distinctly stated in his opening speech that it was not intended to put any pressure upon these governing bodies, even if they thought fit to make no change whatever.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON said, that the noble Earl had misunderstood him.

The powers of the governing bodies were limited in time, for the same reason that the Oxford and Cambridge University Commissions were limited—in order that, if any statutes required to be altered or amended, it should be done at a future time.

THE EARL OF DERBY : This is a very important question. We know that there are certain things which the governing bodies of these schools may do; but what I want to know is, whether it is expected that these bodies shall do the things that are laid down for them under pressure, and whether, if they do not do these things for themselves, they will be done for them—which is the sort of pressure that was placed on the authorities at Oxford. I lay great stress upon this, because a measure which I should consider perfectly unobjectionable if the governing body are left free to adopt or not to adopt these changes, I should regard as highly objectionable if Parliament is to lay down certain things as desirable to be done, and to say that, if they are not done, it may be necessary to introduce another Act of Parliament to compel them. I will take the case of the Charter House, for example. There are two provisions, one subjecting the election of nominees by competitive examination, and the other the removal of the Charter House from its present site, which, I say, are highly objectionable. I venture to say that no governing body of the Charter House would ever recommend either of these two propositions, and if they are put down in the Bill as things which the Government expect to have done, and which will be done for the governing body if they fail to do them for themselves, I shall object to see them both introduced into this Bill. If, however, these changes are to be purely voluntary, and if it is to be left to the governing body to admit them or not, then it may be an advantage to leave matters as they stand in the Bill; but then the governing bodies must be left absolutely uncontrolled in the exercise of their discretion as to any one of the propositions laid down in the Bill. My Lords, I have no intention of offering any opposition to the second reading, and I will not, therefore, enter upon a discussion of the details of the Bill; but, agreeing with the right rev. Prelate that it is most important that the parties whose rights are affected under this Bill should have a full and fair opportunity of being heard, I should have supposed the Government would not object to refer this Bill to a Select Committee, where these various clauses may be fully and fairly considered, where the parties interested may have an opportunity of stating their case before your Lordships, and where the various clauses may be more freely discussed than before a Committee of the Whole House. I would have made a Motion to that effect, but I am given to understand that the Government had been led to believe that no opposition would be offered to the second reading, and that they did not come down to-night prepared to discuss the question whether the clauses of the Bill should be examined in a Committee of the Whole House or before a Select Committee. I do not wish to take them by surprise, but unless they assent to a Select Committee, it will be desirable when the Motion is made to go into Committee on the Bill that an Amendment should be moved for referring the Bill to a Select Committee.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, having had intrusted to me petitions from Harrow and Eton, I think it right to make a few remarks. The observations which have been made on the constitution of these governing bodies only confirm me in the impression that it is more desirable that an Executive Commission should be appointed than that this Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. I agree with the noble Earl opposite (Earl Stanhope) as to the success which attended the Oxford University Commission. Having been a Member of it, it is not for me to pass a judgment upon it, but I may say that when it was first issued it caused universal dismay; but before that Commission ceased to act that dismay disappeared, and one of the most gratifying circumstances occurred at the conclusion of our work. A large deputation from the University came up to ask for the extension of our powers. The eminent success of the Commission was very much owing to the opportunity it afforded to the members of different bodies to come before us and state their objections, by which means we were able at last to bring them over to our views. The same apprehension and dismay which took possession of the University of Oxford has now taken possession of the Head Masters of public schools, and I think that the best way of dealing with the matter is by the appointment of a Commission similar to those of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. I agree with much that has been said about the members of the new governing bodies. It is quite true that many of the governing bodies of our public schools have powers similar to those proposed to be given to them by this Bill — such, for example, as the power of directing the studies and controlling the management of the schools. But, as has been observed, these powers are in abeyance, and it would be most unwise to exercise them, and if the attempt were made great inconvenience would result. The governing body at Rugby tried at one time to interfere, but the attempt was wisely not persevered in. I may also mention that twenty-five years ago the trustees of some of the newly founded proprietary schools made a similar attempt. They had elected as Head Masters, men of distinguished academical reputation; but the interference of the governing bodies or trustees was so distasteful to the Head Masters that the efficiency of the schools was seriously impaired. That would, I fear, be the case if the governing bodies exercised the powers proposed to be given to them by this Bill, and they will do so if Parliament passes the present measure. Referring to Harrow School, I would remark that it appears to me the privileges of the foundation boys will be destroyed and the main object which John Lyon, the founder, had in view will be defeated. It is true that the present condition of the school is very different from that which the founder contemplated and desired. The sons of tradesmen and farmers are deprived of the privileges which they used to enjoy, and it would be difficult now to satisfy their just demands; but I trust matters will be arranged in a satisfactory way. But I must say I think it very hard on such persons as half-pay officers and poor widows having sons to educate, that they should not have a share of the advantages of our public schools, and the opportunity of educating their children there. It is true that John Lyon did not contemplate this; but it has grown up in process of time, and I believe that the custom is very beneficial to the school itself. According to the testimony of the Head Master, the home boarders are now much more amalgamated with the other boys than they used to be, and are brought much more into contact with their schoolfellows; they are engaged much more in the amusements of the school, and the home influence which is exercised over the rest of the boys is very beneficial. I should, therefore, be extremely sorry to hear of any rule excluding this class of persons from the privileges they now enjoy at Harrow. There is another power of interference with which the governors would be invested—the power of dismissing the master. At present, of course there is a power of dismissal for misbehaviour, but it seems to be intended that the governors should have the power of dismissing at their will and pleasure, and that is a power which should be hardly vested in them. One objection to the existing state of things is that these governors must now be persons who have property in the parish. That is, no doubt, too great a limitation; but I think some of the governors ought to be resident there, and should take part in the regulation not only of the school, but of the charities connected with it. I know no person more fit to perform those duties than the vicar of Harrow; and I believe it would be an injury to Harrow to say that the governors should be persons who had no local influence. It is not my wish, in making these observations, to interfere with the improvement of the public schools of this kingdom. There is no doubt they admit of improvement; but it is a little utopian to suppose that any Act of Parliament, or any Executive Commission, would enable every youth who quits these schools to construe Latin with ease and elegance. As the old proverb says, you may lead a horse to the water, but cannot make him drink. In conclusion I would say that I strongly incline to the Executive Commission rather than to the Committee upstairs; but in any plan that may be adopted I need hardly say that I shall be most anxious to promote the great object which this Bill has in view.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE said, that after the turn the debate had taken he did not feel it necessary to make the remarks which he had intended when he came into the House. He rose at the same time with the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of London), but he had been well rewarded by the eloquent address to which their Lordships had listened, which must have found its way not only to the hearts of all those educated at Eton, but of all who were interested in the education of the higher classes in this country. That Royal institution had through many ages set an example to the whole country; it might at the same time justly claim the praise attributed to it by the Commissioners—the formation in a great degree of the true English character; and it no doubt also exerted a favourable influence upon similar and less distinguished places of education throughout the country. He had heard the right rev. Prelate with the greatest pleasure, and trusted that what he had said to-night would long be remembered to the advantage of that great institution. He acquitted his noble Friend (the Earl of Clarendon) of any intention to enlist feeling against Eton; whatever his earlier impression might have been, the noble Earl must upon a closer inspection have done it proper justice. At the same time there were circumstances which justified the observations that had been made by the right rev. Prelate and the noble Earl opposite, and he trusted they would be attended to when the details of the Bill were considered. Their Lordships would have heard with satisfaction from the noble Earl that the Government were ready to adopt any reasonable Amendment, and that time would be given for the consideration of the Bill. At this moment, therefore, he did not think it desirable to go into the subject at any length, but would state his general impression that, notwithstanding the advantages held out by the Bill in some respects, it contained much which to his mind would in practice be attended with very serious objection. The great principles upon which the educational institutions of this country rested, and under which they had hitherto prospered, were certainly interfered with to a degree which did not seem necessary, and which would be attended with consequences very different from those which he was sure the Commissioners had at heart. It would tend, in particular, to lower the authority of the Head Master in the eyes of the boys to a very unfortunate degree. Unless, therefore, the Bill underwent very considerable alteration in Committee, and assumed a character very different from that which it bore at this moment, he should find it exceedingly difficult to give his vote for the third reading.

LORD HOUGHTON: My Lords, I trust that, whatever Parliamentary arrangement is made with regard to this Bill, the possibility of establishing one Executive Commission will not be excluded from our consideration. It appears to me that that question of one Executive Commission as against the present Bill, resolves itself into this—whether it will not be far more convenient, far more consentaneous to the objects of the Commission, and far more satisfactory to the people of this country, that this great matter should be arranged by one competent Commission than by what would be practically the establishment of seven separate Commissions, of which the competence may be somewhat doubtful. For, in truth, this Bill establishes seven Executive Commissions, one for each separate school, and the basis of each Commission is the present governing body with some small addition from the outer world. Now, if we can judge of this machinery from the experience we have any of us had of committees of institutions, or of governing bodies in general, it seems to me that to set about reforming any establishment by constituting the governing body of the establishment into a Commission, and adding two or three gentlemen from outside, is one of the most cumbrous methods, and one of the least likely to succeed, that can be imagined. It would surely be far better to leave the governing body of each of these schools as it is, and to intrust those bodies with the powers proposed to be conferred by this Bill. This extraneous element cannot, according to any condition of human nature, be received with anything like reverence or amity; and I cannot believe it possible that these three or four gentlemen, imported into any of these governing bodies, can act in any way save as a solvent of the governing body altogether. From the very circumstance of their professional habits and long residence and connection with one school, the heads of such institutions must feel themselves incumbered by the introduction of new Members, and to suppose that they will be ready to receive the advice given to them by these literary and scientific gentlemen in any spirit of good will, is a supposition opposed to all my experience. I fear the position of these gentlemen, distinguished by literary and scientific attainments, will be extremely uncomfortable when they get into any one of these governing bodies. Besides, it is very difficult to determine how in this case literary and scientific attainments are to be estimated. It is altogether a matter of opinion. A great many men whom I think distinguished for literary and scientific attainments, I dare say your Lordships might think distinguished neither for one nor the other. The difficulties, therefore, which encumber this question seem to me to lead to one conclusion, which I trust during the Easter recess will commend itself to your Lordships' mind—namely, the appointment of an Executive Commission. Such a Commission, constituted in a manner agreeable to the opinion of Parliament and the public, could, I believe, perform its delicate and difficult duties as well as the Executive Commission affecting Universities. Generous indeed was the acknowledgment made by the right rev. Prelate at my side when he said that the establishment of that Commission had been an object of great fear, but now that it was a matter of vast satisfaction. The present question is one deeply interesting to the hearts of the people of the country; it is not only a question of the moral and intellectual character of the higher classes in this country, it is a question, I may say, of their political supremacy. The very lowest classes of the community are making advances in education, and with the eagerness shown on this subject, the generation to come may be still more active. It will be impossible, I believe, for the wealth, property, and rank of this country long to keep themselves in the same right government, and to have the same influence which they now exercise, unless great reforms be made in the public school system. It may be the destiny of some men, like the great statesman and politician who passed away yesterday morning amid the lamentations of the people, to win position by intellectual superiority and genius, with little aid from external education. But that power must be given to few—with the majority education must be the means of making them fit to govern their fellow men; and it is only by a judicious reform of these schools, by adapting them to the present circumstances of the time, and making them fit to rear up men, not merely accomplished, honest, refined, and proud of their word, but men capable of grappling with all the intellectual questions that can arise in connection with the political life of the country; it is only in that mode that these schools can become, as they ought to be, nurseries of wise politicians, and founders of the greatness of the Empire.

THE EARL OF POWIS said, he did not think the precedent of the Oxford and Cambridge Executive Commission applied to the present case. It was absolutely necessary that each University in which twenty or thirty colleges went to make up a great corporation, should be visited by a Commission. But the public schools had no such relation one to the other; they all undertook the education of boys about the same age, and no one would dream of sending his son to them all one after the other, to complete his education. The noble Earl (the Earl of Clarendon), in introducing the Bill, said there was no wish on the part of the Government to procure absolute uniformity among the Schools; yet the tendency of a single Executive Commission must be in that direction. The Commissioners would naturally plan for themselves some ideal of a complete education, comprising everything from classics to music, and they would desire to import into the course of every school as many of these various requirements as possible; and in doing this they would not regard the fact that they were destroying the individuality and idiosyncrasy of the school. There was an illustration of this tendency in the Report itself. At Merchant Taylor's School the Commissioners found that mathematics predominated in the educational course, and they recommended that one-third of the time devoted to such studies should be cut off. The reverse course was the one which ought to have been pursued, allowing different educational establishments to acquire a reputation for careful instruction in some particular branch; and then different classes of persons would be able to select the school and the special character of education which they thought likely to be of most service to their children in after life. As regarded the local claims proposed to be extinguished, it must be remembered that these were found at other schools besides those already mentioned—at Shrewsbury for instance. He was at a loss to know why those local advantages should be swept away merely for the sake of the small pecuniary gain which might accrue to any particular school. It should be borne in mind that the founders of those schools had a double object in view. They desired to benefit the immediate neighbourhood, and to make the county town in which the school was established the centre of education for the people of the surrounding country; while they at the same time sought to connect the school, as in the case of Shrewsbury, with a particular college or one of the Universities, in order that the local element might not deteriorate the character of the education afforded; and they desired that while the school should be beneficial to the neighbourhood it should be maintained in such a position as to be able to supply a number of students to the Universities of such persons as were desirous of a University education within a reasonable distance of their own homes. If, then, a balance were to be struck between the high classical school and the demand for what was called commercial education which was now made in most of our towns, the solution of the difficulty would, he thought, be found not in the destruction of the existing character of a school, but in the establishment of a separate department for the lower class of education required; but he thought especial care ought to be taken to preserve the ancient character of the education which the upper and middle classes were desirous to secure for their children. There was also another point to which he wished briefly to advert. The Bill, as it stood, strongly invaded the connection which now subsisted between certain schools and colleges at the Universities, and which was of great advantage to both. Now, he could not understand how, because money had been left in trust to a local body, as at Shrewsbury, to supply scholars to a particular college, it could be regarded as fair that that college should be deprived of the benefit thus conferred, simply because the local body happened to be the trustee, instead of the college. He thought, indeed, it would prove extremely injurious to the future progress of education if it were supposed, by persons desiring to render a service to a particular foundation, that the Legislature would pay no regard to their intentions, but would treat their benefactions in a way very different from that in which ordinary charities were dealt with. In conclusion, he would simply express a hope that, bearing in mind the complexity of the interests which the Bill involved, and the inconvenient form in which some of its provisions were drawn, the Government would assent to its being referred to a Select Committee.

LORD LYTTLETON was anxious, as having been a Member of the Royal Commission, to say a few words on some of the points which had been raised in the course of the discussion. He would in the first place observe that the Bill was not the Bill of the Commissioners, and that they were not responsible for it. He had never seen it until it was printed, and although he approved its general scope, which was the general scope of the Report of the Commission, there were a few points in respect to which he should be glad to see some alteration made in its provisions. One of those points had reference to the Head Masters. One of the most essential parts of the recommendations contained in the Report, was that the powers of the governing body and the Head Master should be strictly limited and defined, and he should like to see the Bill in that respect rendered more in conformity with the recommendations of the Commission. Another point in regard to which also he thought some amendment might be made was one which was not noticed in the Report—he alluded to the election of the first governing bodies. The object which it was desirable to attain being to return a governing body in which there should be no predominant interest or bias, the first election of a preponderating number of the proposed governing bodies would, as the Bill stood, be placed in the hands of the existing governing bodies, and—without seeking to cast any blame upon them—it was impossible not to suppose that the objects sought to be obtained by the Bill might, as a consequence, be defeated, as they would naturally elect those who agreed with them in upholding the actual state of things. Now that, he confessed, appeared to him to be a serious difficulty; but he did not mean to propose that that difficulty should be met by increasing the power of nomination given to the Crown. Might it not be met by a provision to the effect that the first governing body of a school should be named in the Act itself? Thus the best governing body which it was possible to obtain would in all probability be secured, and to it might be safely intrusted the carrying into effect any new regulations. The appointment of those governing bodies was that which was looked upon by the Commission as the backbone of their recommendations. As to some of their members being nominees of the Crown in some cases and not in others, that no doubt was a fair question for argument. He thought that nomination by the Crown, instead of being derogatory or injurious to the public schools, would rather confer upon them a certain distinction and prestige in the eyes of the country, and place them with relation to other schools upon a higher level. Practically, the right of appointment in the case of the Provost of Eton had been almost exclusively exercised by the Crown. In their recommendation that some persons distinguished for literature or science should be added to the governing bodies of these schools, the Commissioners, he believed, meant to lay the main stress upon the selection of men of scientific acquirements. The reason for that was that, as natural science was about to be introduced as a branch of study, it was desirable that there should be in the governing bodies some gentlemen who might be referred to by their colleagues as authorities upon that subject. He regretted that the Bill dealt with St. Paul's School as connected with the Mercers' Company, because there was a legal question as to the rights of that Company, which ought, as the Report had recommended, to have been decided before Parliament was asked to legislate upon the subject. As to the local privileges of the residents of certain places, especially Harrow and Rugby, he was individually disposed to go even further than this measure proposed. These ancient privileges, in principle, were obsolete, and, with the exception of vested interests, were not deserving of the consideration of Parliament. He greatly regretted the introduction of those clauses of the Bill which provided that some of the scanty endowments of Harrow and Rugby Schools should be applied towards the general support of education in those districts. Education in this country had been dealt with in three divisions—those of the upper, middle, and lower classes. For the education of the lower classes ample provision had already been made. A Commission was now sitting to endeavour to improve that of the middle classes; and he thought that these great Schools ought to be reserved for the upper classes, for whose benefit they now existed. In America and other countries there was a mixture of classes in the same schools. That was not the case here, and he did not think that it was practicable here, even if desirable. The limitation of the power of the governing bodies to two years was confined to the making of statutes—upon the general powers of the governing body there was no such limitation. The Commission had recommended the constitution of such governing bodies as they thought would be in itself best for these Schools; he, for one, had certainly never meant to found those recommendations upon any great actual fault or misfeasance on the part of the existing governing bodies; and when a noble Lord said that the noble Earl who moved the second reading of this Bill had rested part of the case on the fact that Eton had done nothing to meet the recommendations of the Commission, he had rather overstated what his noble Friend had really said.

He was himself far too much attached to Eton to come forward as a public prosecutor to prefer charges against that School; but he could not say that enough had been done either there or at any other of these Schools, hardly even excepting Rugby, to induce their Lordships to hope that the necessity for improving their constitution would be superseded by anything which would be done by the existing governing bodies.

LORD CAMPBELL, in reply to what had fallen from the noble Lord who had spoken last, remarked, that an Executive Commission was not to be regarded as an alternative to new governing bodies, since part of its function would be to create new governing bodies. Even if an Executive Commission were not required at the other public schools, special facts, wants, and complications all demanded it at Eton. The new body proposed to govern Eton was universally condemned. The noble Earl, who led the Opposition, had insisted upon some, although not all of its defects. He (Lord Campbell), last Session, had attempted to point out the discordant elements of which it would be formed, and the absolute inaction towards which it tended. In the debate to-night not a speaker had defended it. If at Eton certain changes were required of the existing government, if the school was incompetent to make them, if the proposed body was yet more unsuited to the purpose, an Executive Commission became a necessary measure. The whole course of the debate had been to recommend it. More he would not add, since the hour of the evening did not warrant him in doing so, and since a deputation of Eton men would be likely soon to bring the subject more directly, and with greater clearness and authority, before the noble Lord who had presided over the Commission of Inquiry.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON, in reply, regretted that any noble Lord should suppose for a moment that he thought the Head Masters of the public schools were averse to the projected improvements in the regulations of those institutions. He had only particularized the Head Master of Rugby as being favourable to the alterations because that gentleman had published a very able letter approving them. He must say he had a very serious objection to an Executive Commission, as one body could not possibly govern so many Schools, and it would not answer to have seven or eight Executive Commissions to supply the place of the governing bodies proposed by the Bill. Another objection to an Executive Commission was that it would be the means of establishing a certain uniformity among the public schools which would be far from desirable. Besides, an Executive Commission was not a continuing body, and it was absolutely necessary that the Schools should be regulated by a permanent governing body, always ready to amend and modify the rules whenever such alterations were necessary. He could not help regretting the little favour men of literature and science had found in their Lordships' House. It was said, in the first place, that they were not discoverable, and, secondly, that if found they would not be of much use. Now, he had heard from several of the eminent men who had given advice to those who drew up the Bill that men of literature and science were not only easily found, but that they were also well deserving of confidence.

THE EARL OF DERBY inquired whether the noble Earl intended to consent to the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the provisions of the Bill.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON said, the proposal to refer the Bill to a Select Committee had taken him by surprise, and therefore he could not give an answer to the question of the noble Earl without taking time for consideration.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>d</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday the 2nd of May next.

OUT-DOOR CUSTOMS OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. LYALL said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Why such an unequal system prevails at the Customs for remunerating their Out-door Officers, so that in some ports, like Whitehaven, where both the cost of living is higher and the business much greater than in many other ports, yet the salary of the Officers is on a more reduced scale?

MR. PEELE, in reply, said, the want of uniformity in the pay of Out-door Officers of Customs appeared to have arisen from the circumstance that up to 1856 those Officers were paid not by salaries, but by rates of daily pay, which varied according to the nature of the duties they were employed in; but in 1856 the daily pay was reduced to a uniform sum of 1s. a day, and the difference was commuted to a fixed salary, or wages, the amount of salary being fixed with reference to their average earnings during the three preceding years.

COLLECTION OF TAXES.—QUESTION.

MR. BAZLEY said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it be his intention to re-introduce the Bill for the Collection of Taxes; and, if so, to include exceptional Clauses in the same, or the compensation Clause, as before?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was bound to say that very great inconvenience was felt in the country from the want of a measure of this kind, and he much regretted having failed to obtain the assent of the House to it. At the same time, it was such a measure as it would not be satisfactory to have passed unless it received a very general assent, and he could not see any prospect of obtaining that degree of assent to it during the present Session. However, he looked forward to the House legislating upon the subject on a future occasion.

DEEP SEA FISHERY (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, When the Report of the Deep Sea and Coast Fishery Commissioners of Ireland, for 1864, will be presented to Parliament?

SIR ROBERT PEELE, said in reply, that he expected to be able to present the Report to Parliament shortly after Easter.

INCOME TAX PAPERS.—QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he has recently received any communications relative to certain discrepancies in the papers which persons assessed to the Income Tax are called upon to fill up; and, if so, whether he will lay the same upon the table of the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, in reply, that he had received a communication on the subject from one gentleman, and that was the only communication he had received. He had also received the answer of the Board of Inland Revenue to the statement made by that gentleman, and if his hon. and learned Friend wished to see the papers he could do so, and he would then be able to form his own judgment whether or not it was necessary to bring the matter before Parliament. For his own part, he thought such a course unnecessary.

ARMY—CULTIVATION OF GARDENS BY SOLDIERS.—QUESTION.

MR. W. EWART said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether he will state or allow a Return to be made showing to what extent the Cultivation of Gardens by Soldiers has been adopted in the Army?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON replied, that there would be no objection to produce the Returns. Up to the present time very few gardens had been cultivated by soldiers. A circular had lately been issued from the War Office giving greater facilities for the cultivation of gardens, and since the issue of that Circular many applications had been made. The weather had not lately been very favourable for garden operations, and he should be much obliged if the hon. Member would wait a month or two before he moved for the Return.

UNION CHARGEABILITY BILL.

QUESTION.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he would beg to ask the President of the Poor

Law Board, Whether he will fix a later day after Easter for going into Committee on the Union Chargeability Bill?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, the Bill could not come on on the 27th, and he would state on the 24th what day he would proceed with it.

DRILL INSTRUCTORS OF VOLUNTEERS.

QUESTION.

MR. J. R. YORKE said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, with reference to his statement that no Capitation Grant is made to Drill Instructors of Administrative Volunteer Battalions because they are not attached to any particular corps. Whether he is aware that the cost of clothing and equipping such Instructors now falls on the particular companies to which they are attached; and whether, considering the greater need companies in Administrative Battalions have of Government assistance, it is intended to make any provision for defraying the cost of such equipment?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that in fixing the pay of Sergeant Instructors of Volunteers a sum was included to cover the expenses they were put to for lodging and clothing themselves. The pay of these Sergeant Instructors was 6d. a day higher than the pay of the similar rank of sergeants in the militia, that 6d. consisting of 4d. a day for lodging allowance, and 2d. in lieu of clothing allowance. He believed that in many cases the Sergeant Instructors were clothed by the corps which they instructed, but that was not in the contemplation of the Government when the rate of their pay was fixed.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS—SERVICE ON JURIES.—QUESTION.

MR. ALGERNON EGERTON said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether the Government have come to any decision on the question of the exemption of Officers of the Volunteer Force from service on Juries?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that upon the representations made by the deputation introduced to Lord de Grey by his hon. Friend opposite, Lord de Grey made inquiries as to the facts relating to the exemption from serving on juries allowed in favour of militia officers. It appeared that they were not exempted from serving on juries except when the militia regiments to which they belonged were embodied. It was supposed that militia officers were exempted during the time their regiments were out for training, but such was not the fact, and it was only when their regiments were actually embodied that militia officers were exempted from serving on juries. Under these circumstances, it did not appear desirable to extend to Volunteer officers a privilege which was not enjoyed by militia officers.

OYSTER FISHERY.—QUESTION.

MR. CAVE said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the Report of the Sea Fishery Commission would be made in time for legislation on the Oyster Fishery during the present Session?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, in reply, that he did not think it probable that any legislation on that subject could be undertaken during the present Session.

ARMY—ORDNANCE EXPERIMENTS.

QUESTION.

MR. PEACOCKE said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether it is intended to test the Lancaster, Scott, and French 7-inch gun, competition guns, by firing from them shells filled with powder, before coming to a decision as to the best system of rifling; and whether it is true that the 7-inch shunt and French guns have, in the late competition at Shoeburyness, been placed under similar conditions, and whether one has yet been fired from a wooden and another from an iron carriage; and whether other advantages have not been given to the shunt gun?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, it was rather unusual and very inconvenient that information of that kind should be asked for during the progress of these experiments. The experiments which had been ordered between the competitive systems of rifling were now going on, and not likely to be concluded for a short time yet. As a matter of fact, he believed the competition guns had not yet had shells filled with powder fired from them, and he could not say yet whether it was intended to test them in that way or not. As to the shunt and French guns, they had both been fired on wooden carriages; the shunt gun had been fired from an iron platform, but the French gun had not been placed on that platform. The Committee were not aware of any advantage having been given to the shunt gun over any other, and perhaps he might be permitted to observe that if the hon. Member supposed—as he appeared to do—that the Committee did not carry out the experiments fairly, he had better state to the House what the circumstances were which gave rise to that impression, rather than convey imputations against the Committee by means of questions.

RAILWAY SYSTEM (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman opposite (the Member for Limerick County), When he proposes to bring on this Bill, and whether he has made any arrangement with the Government to secure a proper opportunity for its discussion?

MR. MONSELL, in reply, said, it was certainly his intention to bring on the measure, which excited very great interest in Ireland. It stood first among the notices for Friday upon going into Supply; but the Motion for the adjournment of the House unfortunately stood before it. He trusted, however, to be able to make an arrangement with the noble Lord at the head of the Government to secure the object which the right hon. and learned Gentleman desired.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE LATE MR. COBDEN.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said: Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for this House to have that order put without calling to its mind the great loss which this House and the country have sustained by the event which took place yesterday morning. Sir, Mr. Cobden, whose loss we deplore, occupied a pre-eminent position both as a Member of this House and as a member of the British nation. I do not mean, in the few words I have to say, to disguise or to avoid stating that there were many matters upon which a great number of people differed from Mr. Cobden, I among the rest. But those who differed from him the most never could doubt the honesty of his purpose or the sincerity of his convictions. They felt that his object was the good of his country, however they might differ on particular questions from him as to the means by which that end was to be accomplished. But we all agree in burying in oblivion every point of difference, and think only of the great and important services he rendered to our common country. Sir, it is many years ago since Adam Smith elaborately and conclusively, as far as argument could go, advocated as the fundamental principles of the wealth of nations freedom of industry and unrestricted exchange of the objects which are the results of industry. These doctrines were inculcated by learned men, by Dugald Stewart and others. They were taken up in process of time by leading statesmen, such as Mr. Huskisson and those who agreed with him. But the barriers which long-established prejudice—honest and conscientious prejudice—had raised against the practical application of those doctrines prevented for a long series of years their coming into use as instruments of progress in the country. To Mr. Cobden it was reserved by his untiring industry, his indefatigable personal activity, the indomitable energy of his mind, and by—I will say—that forcible and Demosthenic eloquence with which he treated all the subjects which he took in hand—it was reserved to Mr. Cobden, aided, no doubt, by a great phalanx of worthy associates—by my right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Villiers) and by Sir Robert Peel, whose memory will ever be associated with the principles Mr. Cobden so ably advocated—it was reserved, I say, to Mr. Cobden, by exertions which never were surpassed, to carry into practical application those abstract principles with the truth of which he was so deeply impressed, and which at last gained the acceptance of all reasonable men in the country. He rendered an inestimable and enduring benefit to our country by the result of those exertions. But, Sir, great as were Mr. Cobden's talents, great as was his industry, and eminent as was his success, the disinterestedness of his mind more than equalled all of these. He was a man of great ambition, but his ambition was to be useful to his country; and that ambition was amply gratified. When the present Government was formed I was authorized graciously by Her Majesty to offer to Mr. Cobden a seat in the Cabinet.

Mr. Cobden declined, and frankly told me that he thought he and I differed a good deal upon many important principles of political action, and therefore he could not either comfortably for me or for himself join the Administration of which I was the head. I think he was wrong. I lamented it, but it was he who had to decide. But this I will say of Mr. Cobden, that no man, however strongly he may have differed from him upon general political principles, or the application of those principles, could come into contact with him without carrying away the strongest personal esteem and regard for the man with whom he had the misfortune not entirely to agree. Sir, the two great achievements of Mr. Cobden were, in the first place, the abrogation of those laws which regulated the importation of corn and the great development which that gave to the industry of the country, and next the commercial arrangements which he negotiated with France, which paved the way for improving the trade, and tended greatly to extend the intercourse between the two countries. When the latter achievement was accomplished, it was my lot to offer to Mr. Cobden—not office, for that I knew he would not take, but to offer him those honours which the Crown can bestow—a Baronetcy and the rank of a Privy Councillor, honourable distinctions which it would have gratified the Crown to bestow for important services rendered to the country, and which I think it would not have been at all derogatory for him to accept. But the same disinterested spirit which actuated all his conduct, whether in private or in public, led him to decline even the acknowledgments which would properly have been made for the services he had rendered. Sir, I can only say that we have sustained a loss which every man in the country will feel. We have lost a man who may be said to have been peculiarly emblematical of the Constitution under which we have the happiness to live, because he rose to great, eminence in this House, and acquired an ascendancy in the public mind not by virtue of any family connections, but solely and entirely by means of the power and vigour of his mind, that power and vigour being applied to purposes eminently advantageous to the country. Sir, Mr. Cobden's name will be for ever engraved on the most interesting pages of the history of this country; and I am sure there is not one in this House who does not feel the deepest regret that we have lost one of its brightest ornaments, and that the country has been deprived of one of her most useful servants.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, having been a Member of this House when Mr. Cobden first took his seat, and having remained in the House during the whole of his lengthened career, I cannot reconcile it to myself to be silent on this occasion, when we have to deplore the loss of one so eminent, and that too in the ripeness of his manhood and the full vigour of his intellect.

Although it was the fortune of Mr. Cobden to enter public life at a time when passions ran high, and he himself by no means a man insensible to political excitement, still when the strife was over, there was soon observed in him a moderation and a tempered thought that indicated a large intellectual horizon, and the possession of statesmanlike qualities. Though formed in the tumult of popular opinions; with which he identified himself, there was in his character a vein of reverence for tradition which, even unconsciously to himself, subdued and softened the acerbity of the cruder conclusions at which he may have arrived. That in my mind is a quality which in some degree must be possessed by any one who attempts or aspires to sway this country. For, notwithstanding the rapid changes in which we live, and the numerous improvements and alterations we anticipate, this country is still Old England, and the past is one of the elements of our power.

What the qualities of Mr. Cobden were in this House all present are aware, yet, perhaps, I may be permitted to say that as a debater he had few equals. As a logician he was close and complete; adroit, acute, perhaps even subtle; yet at the same time he was gifted with such a degree of imagination that he never lost sight of the sympathies of those whom he addressed, and so, generally avoiding to drive his argument to extremity, he became as a speaker both practical and persuasive.

The noble Lord, who is far more competent than myself to deal with such subjects, has referred the House to Mr. Cobden's conduct as an administrator. It would seem that, notwithstanding the eminent position which he had achieved and occupied, and the various opportunities which offered for the exercise of that ambition which he might legitimately entertain, his life was destined to pass without his being afforded an occasion of showing that he possessed those qualities which are invaluable in council and in the management of public affairs. Still, fortunately, it happened, that before he quitted us, there came to him one of the finest opportunities that a public man could well enjoy, and it may be truly said that by the transaction of great affairs he obtained the consideration of the two leading countries of the world.

Sir, there is something mournful in the history of this Parliament, when we remember how many of our most eminent and valued public men have passed from among us. I cannot refer to the history of any other Parliament which will bear to posterity so fatal a record. But there is this consolation when we remember these unequalled and irreparable visitations—that these great men are not altogether lost to us; that their opinions will be often quoted in this House; their authority appealed to, their judgments attested; even their very words will form part of our discussions and debates. There are some Members of Parliament who, though not present in the body, are still Members of this House: independent of dissolutions, of the caprice of constituencies, even of the course of time. I think, Sir, Mr. Cobden was one of these men. I believe that when the verdict of posterity shall be recorded on his life and conduct, it will be said of him that he was, without doubt, the greatest political character the pure middle class of this country has yet produced—an ornament to the House of Commons, and an honour to England.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, I feel that I cannot address the House on this occasion; but every expression of sympathy which I have heard has been most grateful to my heart. But the time which has elapsed since, in my presence, the manliest and gentlest spirit that ever quitted or tenanted a human form took its flight is so short that I dare not even attempt to give utterance to the feelings by which I am oppressed. I shall leave to some calmer moment when I may have an opportunity of speaking before some portion of my countrymen, the lesson which I think may be learned from the life and character of my friend. I have only to say that after twenty years of most intimate and almost brotherly friendship with him, I little knew how much I loved him until I found that I had lost him.

THE BOARD OF ADMIRALTY.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR MORTON PETO said, that as one who had known Mr. Cobden for seventeen years, he could not refrain from joining in the profound regret which had been expressed at the loss which the House and the country had sustained.

In calling attention to the constitution and administration of the Admiralty Board, he should bear in mind that on many occasions on the Estimates recently this subject had been discussed more or less, and therefore he should confine himself entirely to the terms of his Notice. He desired rather to place before the House the evidence of the dissatisfaction which the Board of Admiralty had given from its establishment, than to express any unsupported opinion of his own. On the recent examination of witnesses before a Commission, it would be found that almost the whole of them expressed condemnation of the Board, and even where there was approval, it proceeded from circumstances and opinions which would have elicited the strongest condemnation if the witnesses had been in possession of the real facts. His case was that there was no direct responsibility. He had only to refer to the evidence of three or four officers who had rendered eminent service in connection with our naval affairs. The opinion of Sir George Cockburn was, that the establishment at the Board of Admiralty was the most unsatisfactory and least effective for its purpose that could have been devised; and he owned himself to be the advocate for all bodies being responsible for what they did. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) said that the Board was a bad arrangement, and did not work favourably for the public service. He (Sir Morton Peto) therefore contended that it ought to be reformed, and that the present system should not be allowed to exist. Sir James Graham only supported the system provided the First Lord was always supreme. Sir Charles Wood was of opinion that the distribution of the business of the Admiralty had been altered at various times to fit into the peculiar competence of the Lord at the time. Mr. Goulburn, in a debate which took place in that House, said that when the head of a Board was responsible, there was a greater share of responsibility than if you threw it on the whole Board. He also said the responsibility of the Board of Admiralty was a point which never could be ascertained under the present system; that the whole thing was given up, and the Board had no direct responsibility, and it was no longer worthy of the confidence of the country. With regard to the mode in which the business was conducted, Mr. Goulburn said that the correspondence of the Admiralty might be reduced, so that one letter might be written where there were now ten. Other witnesses were equally strong in their expressions against the Board of Admiralty. The Duke of Somerset said he did not hold that a better plan could not be devised, but that a better plan had not been submitted to him for consideration. Now, he hoped that the noble Lord would give to the plan which he would that night suggest, his calm and careful consideration. Sir Richard Bromley was of opinion that only one Minister of State should be in charge of the entire naval service; that that marine Minister should hold office by patent, and rank as a Secretary of State. He further recommended that the marine Minister should have four principal assistants to advise him; two naval officers and two civilians, and that those officers should have seats in the House. They should go out with the Ministry but should not require re-election on taking office. He described also the duties to be allotted to them, that the whole machinery might be set in motion, so that there should be a corresponding action, by each acting and re-acting upon the other. He (Sir Morton Peto) had communicated with Sir Richard Bromley as to the suggestions which he was about to offer to the House, and found they had met with his entire concurrence. With respect to the Constructor of the Navy, Mr. Reed was entitled to receive at the hands of the House the fairest possible trial, and the plan he was about to propose would not trench upon that fair trial. In connection with the Constructor of the Navy there ought to be a Council of Reference, before whom all designs should be brought for consideration. This Council should not be a paid body, and should be composed of eminent men, who had an intimate acquaintance with ship-building, machinery, and engineering, and who would, therefore, be competent to give a sound and practical opinion upon all matters coming before them. In order to obtain the services of such men without any pecuniary consideration the office must be made one of honour. He knew many men who would be most valuable Members of such a Council, and who would be most ready to benefit their country by giving their services in this way. He also proposed that the Constructor should be made responsible to the Minister, and the Minister responsible to the House of Commons. The opinion of the Council of Reference was not to be in any way binding upon them. The Government would have in this Council a valuable Board of advice, and it would not trench in the slightest degree upon the responsibility of the Minister. He did not wish to interfere with the offices of the Controller of the Navy, the Constructor, or the three assistants, but he wished them to have the opportunity of consulting eminent men who had had great and varied experience, and who would be able to give very valuable advice and information. At present the Storekeeper General and the Controller of the Navy had equal power. The officer having charge of the construction of the navy should have supreme control, and the Storekeeper should be subordinate to him. He would next refer to the question of the Department of Works. The public works executed by the Admiralty at the present time were out of place as to the persons who should have the conduct of them. The Board of Admiralty had no efficient representatives who could carry out the public works of the country so far as it was concerned. The Board of Admiralty should simply define its requirements, and say what it wants, and have the works carried out by the Minister of Public Works. A Committee of the House in 1860 on the Miscellaneous Expenditure reported its opinion that all public works not already under the Department of Public Works, except those of naval and military defence, should be under that department. As to the conduct of affairs by the Admiralty, although the members of the Board might be excellent sailors, have an admirable knowledge of ships, able to give sound opinions on naval affairs, and fully competent to deal with all matters properly appertaining to a sailor's duties, they could not be said to have received such an education as qualified them for exercising an efficient superintendence over public works. In France these things were managed differently and more wisely. The Minister of Marine and the Navy Constructor had nothing to do with the superintendence of public works, excepting that they had to define that which they wanted doing, and the works were then left in competent hands. It would be well if our Board of Admiralty would take a lesson from our neighbours. With respect to public works, he would like to see the Minister of that department assisted by a council composed of men of the highest eminence as engineers or contractors, who, having ceased from active business, should be able to devote their time and experience for the benefit of the country. This council might be consulted and its opinion obtained, although that opinion need not necessarily be binding, and the result could not but be advantageous. Would any Minister have made such a mistake as was made in building the gunboat slips at Haslar if there had been a body of competent and experienced persons to advise the Minister? To take another instance of blunder, he would refer to a building—the Herbert Hospital—recently erected at Woolwich, on a slope and overlooking a cemetery. It was found necessary to place the building upon a concrete foundation. The concrete was placed upon the clay, but the drains were placed below the clay, and the consequence had been that the clay had become so saturated with moisture that one-third of the building was shored up. The Board of Admiralty were not responsible for that blunder, but there were plenty of blunders which could be attributed to them. Would Alderney Harbour have been made if there had been a competent Board of Public Works? Would four or five times the original Estimates have been expended upon Holyhead and other harbours if we had had a competent tribunal to decide upon such questions? Again, he must remark that such mistakes were not made in France. In that country the Estimates were framed with so much care, and by such competent persons, that his firm, in the execution of some of the largest public works in that country, had been content to accept the figures of the Minister, which, with all respect, he must say they could not have ventured to do in this country. Then, again, as to the management of the dockyards, there was clearly something defective. Taking Portsmouth as an instance, he found that there was an Admiral Superintendent who was appointed for five years, but as he was usually selected from names very high up in the list, the office generally became vacant in about three years. However, that officer was a naval man, quite unqualified by any previous education to undertake the management of a large establishment. If the Admiral Superintendent was absent his place was supplied by the captain of one of the ships in port, who would no doubt be a very excellent naval officer, but one of the very last persons to be intrusted with the charge of a dockyard. It must be remembered that a dockyard was nothing more or less than a large establishment in which Her Majesty's ships were built and repaired, and in which the object should be to combine the utmost efficiency with the greatest economy. Again, he must observe that the system in France was different to and an improvement upon our practice. Of course he did not mean that there should not be an admiral to take charge of the ships in port, and to superintend everything that properly fell within the sphere of a naval officer's duties, but he did not think that such an officer could be a very efficient manager of an establishment for the construction and repair of ships. It was quite certain that our dockyards would never be efficient while the present system was adhered to. He did not say that there should not be an admiral at Portsmouth, but he ought not to be made the superintendent of the public works or the constructor of ships. In France, the superintendent of the dockyard was well qualified for his post, and not removable on change of administration. The Admiral Superintendent was about as well qualified to make his own uniform as to perform the ordinary duties of the dockyard. Then, as to the cost of the superintendence of labour. He took the figures from the Estimates of 1861-2 and he found the percentage to be 13 at Deptford, 9 at Woolwich, 6 at Chatham, 9 at Sheerness,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  at Portsmouth,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  at Devonport, and 9 at Pembroke; the average being 8 per cent. He had had as much experience in public works as any man, and he declared that such a percentage of cost of superintendence was unheard of, and in the execution of works to the extent of millions in different parts of the world he had never known anything like such an amount for the cost of superintendence. The very fact of its costing so much showed that the superintendence could not be very effectual, as in the multiplication of checks all individual responsibility was lost. With respect to the system of labour in the dockyards, he approved the day system, but thought that at present there was no adequate motive for men to exert themselves. Nothing could ever be regarded as satisfactory where no motive was held out to a man to exert his energy beyond his fellow labourer, who did as little as possible beyond handling his tools. He had recently been reading a work which had afforded him some amusement—the Biography of Samuel Bentham, by his widow. That person made himself troublesome about naval reforms, and at last he was put upon a Board, which entirely put an end to his declaiming about the wrongs of his country. He would recommend the perusal of the work to the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty. Then, as to the contract system, he understood that while two lords of the Admiralty were required to enter into a contract, one only could annul it by writing his initials. After finding so much fault with the Board of Admiralty, it was pleasant to express a word or two of approval. In 1858–60, when the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Pakington) was First Lord, he, in association with Sir Richard Bromley, originated a system of accounts, which was better than any theretofore in use. The present Secretary to the Admiralty had followed that system up year after year, and now the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) had promised them a system of accounts. But he warned his hon. Friend that if the accounts were to be satisfactory they must show the expense of working each dockyard, the balance value of the stock in hand, the stock issue within the year, and the amount expended for labour employed. Another point to which he desired to refer was that of the great unsteadiness and uncertainty of action on the part of the Board of Admiralty. As an instance of this the hon. Baronet mentioned that in 1805 Lord Melville, acting on a letter from Lord Nelson, then Commander-in-Chief in the Mediterranean, took steps for raising the position of the medical officers of the navy, and a uniform, and other advantages, were granted, but his successor in office reversed his policy. In 1858 the right hon. Baronet opposite placed the medical officers in the navy on the same footing as those in the army; but the Duke of Somerset had reversed that policy. Until this system of direction by a Board was broken up naval affairs would never be efficiently conducted. The time was come when the question ought to be taken up. They looked to the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) to do much, and what ability and practical acquaintance with business details would effect he would do; but he hoped that his hon. Friend would not be drawn into that official vortex of passive inaction which had swallowed up so many talented men. If he found himself at any time placed in a position in which he could not discharge his responsibility to that House, he trusted that he would know how to resign a post which would be unworthy of a Gentleman of his high character and talents. The country had a right to expect that the governing body of the Admiralty, whatever it were called, should be placed in a position of direct responsibility towards that House which voted the money for the maintenance of the honour of the country. That was not the case at the present moment. He believed that the £58,000,000 of money which had been voted to the present Government for naval affairs had not been—if the accounts were closely analysed—properly expended, or in a manner which the House ought to be satisfied with. He would have the whole of the dockyards managed upon strictly commercial principles. Why should there be a difference between the management of the nation's establishments and those of private persons? But he believed that there would be no improvement so long as they appointed men to superintend these establishments who knew nothing about the matter. He might say frankly that he did not wish to see all the Government shipbuilding conducted by private firms. But he did want to see a fair share in private yards, in order that by means of the competition which would thence arise there might result economy in the construction of our vessels, and he did complain that the Royal Dockyards were not conducted as efficiently and economically as private establishments. The country had a right to expect that the Government would abandon the system of patronage, and that all promotion should proceed upon merit alone; but the Government were not the only parties to blame in this matter; so long as hon. Members would ask for places for their friends, the Government would not give up this patronage. He believed that this system of patronage was forced upon the Government by the House. As regarded the whole subject, it, in his opinion, demanded at the hands of the Government, an instant course of action. Things were not now as they used to be, when valour in the men and talent in the admiral were all that was looked for. Steam and scientific appliances of new kinds were now seen on every hand. He thought the Government ought not to say, "Leave the matter in our hands, and we will make all the improvements which may be necessary, and then do nothing." If the House desired that this country should be successful in future wars, the affairs of the Admiralty must be better conducted. He would call upon the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and those associated with him, to get out of this system of inaction. This subject was one which required the calm, thoughtful, and careful consideration of the noble Lord, and he hoped that he would in a new Parliament propose measures which would conduce to the welfare of the country.

MR. BENTINCK said, he was very glad that the hon. Baronet had again brought this subject before the House. He agreed with much that had been said on the subject by the hon. Baronet, who had referred to high authorities who had expressed opinions condemnatory of the present Board of Admiralty. He might have gone further and have said that, with the exception of those who were, or had been, members of the Board, he would not have found a single sane man in the country who was satisfied with the present system. He (Mr. Bentinck) agreed with the hon. Baronet in condemning the system of having a Board of Admiralty at the head of the Naval Department of the country. The business could not be satisfactorily conducted by a Board. The first result was the entire absence of all responsibility. This alone was sufficient to constitute inefficiency. But it appeared to him that the system of such a Board as the Board of Admiralty was doubly mischievous, and for this reason—that in a Board of Admiralty, composed as it generally was, with a civilian at its head, and the two senior Naval Lords, a great part of the business must be conducted under the authority of those Naval Lords, without responsibility on their part, the responsibility remaining with the civilian. Thus there was action without responsibility, and responsibility without the power of action. Another great imperfection in the constitution of the Admiralty Board was its political character; and this necessarily led to those constant changes in the members of the Board, which entirely prevented the possibility of any continuous and well conducted system. With respect to the practice of appointing a civilian to the post of the First Lord of the Admiralty, he asked what instance could be found in any other description of business of a person being put at the head of it who could not by possibility possess any knowledge of the business with which he was called on to deal? One of the most essential improvements in the constitution of the Admiralty Board would be to place the navy under the charge of a naval officer, as the army was placed under the superintendence of a military officer. He did not agree with the hon. Baronet in thinking that the business of the dockyards could be as economically managed as the business of any private firm. In private yards there was always some person superintending who had a direct personal interest in the work that was being done. He joined in the wish expressed by the hon. Baronet, that some change would be made in the constitution of the Board of Admiralty; but he was not sanguine enough to expect its realization, and he would explain the reason why by referring to what had occurred in that House within the last few years. After a good deal of discussion a Committee was appointed by that House in 1861 to inquire into the constitution of the Board of Admiralty. Upon that Committee there were several distinguished Members of the House, who had been First Lords of the Admiralty, some others who had been Secretaries to the Admiralty, and one or two Members connected with the Government. The result was that the Committee assembled with the conclusion already arrived at that nothing could be better than the present state of things respecting which they had been directed to inquire. He had proposed the removal of some of those members, but as the House did not agree with him, the Committee met and proceeded with the business before them. He had taken his share in the labours of that Committee, and had attended its sittings for about three months. They had had long self-laudations from First Lords and former Secretaries of the Admiralty, all endeavouring to prove that, during their connection with the Admiralty, everything was done for the best. After three months, his patience being exhausted, he stated to the Committee and to the House the reason why he wished no longer to serve on that Committee, and that was that he considered it to be an absolute waste of time. He was allowed to withdraw, and the Committee sat till the end of the Session. In the following Session so unsatisfactory were its proceedings regarded, that neither the hon. Gentleman who had moved the appointment of the Committee nor the Government were prepared to move its re-appointment. He wanted to know what hope his hon. Friend had of obtaining a more practical Committee now, or what hope he had of any proposal being made to re-model the Board of Admiralty. As there was no likelihood that those in office, or those waiting for office, would diminish the political power and patronage they enjoyed, or anticipated to enjoy, the only way in which the object of the hon. Baronet could be attained, was by the action of independent Members forcing this question on the consideration of the House, and by a direct Motion calling on the House to declare whether or not the constitution of the Board of Admiralty was of a satisfactory character. Believing the present constitution of the Board of Admiralty to be the cause of inefficiency and extravagance, he thought it would be a better mode of dealing with the question to move a direct Resolution condemnatory of that constitution; and if such a Resolution were brought forward it should have his cordial support.

MR. WHITBREAD said, that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had rested his charge against the Board of Admiralty on the ground that almost every man who had been connected with that Board, and who was thoroughly acquainted with its working, had given his support to the present system, while those who were unacquainted with its mode of conducting business accused it of inefficiency. But it was to be hoped that when the Resolution to which the hon. Gentleman had referred was hereafter proposed, the House would be guided by the opinions of those who were practically most conversant with the matter. The whole drift and burden of the speeches made against the constitution of the Board was "the total want of Parliamentary responsibility." What, he asked, was meant by that often repeated phrase? He had never heard any definition given of it, but he supposed that those who used it intended to imply that when the heads of a public Department did anything in the opinion of the House which was wrong, or failed to do anything which in the opinion of the House ought to be done, the House should have the power of censuring them or driving them from office. Well, he maintained that the House had at that moment full power, in either of those cases, to censure or expel the heads of the present Board of Admiralty. He did not see how they could have a more direct responsibility than that which that Board was under towards Parliament. The hon. Baronet had said that if any private undertaking conducted its business in that way it would certainly fail; but did he forget how many railways and banks were conducted by Boards, which were not a whit more responsible to their shareholders than the Board of Admiralty was to that House? That was a favourite mode of managing large commercial affairs, and yet many Boards of Directors were far less conversant with the nature of the business they had to transact than the Board of Admiralty was with its duties. If a standing Committee for this, or a standing Committee for that, were appointed, how was it to be made responsible to Parliament? It would act as a shield to the Board of Admiralty. A council of naval officers might be able to give valuable advice; but if its members were to go out of office with the Government, the faults of the present system would remain; and if they were not to be changed, the Minister of the day, when any of his measures were called in question, could easily turn round and say, "Oh, I acted under the advice of my Council." Again, one of the charges against the existing Board was that it was slow; but if they had one council to advise and another body to execute, as had been suggested, he was convinced that the evils of delay would be doubled, the cost of works largely increased, and great confusion, coupled with divided responsibility, introduced. The hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury had said that 8 per cent was an amount of cost for superintendence such as he had never known to be called for in regard to works with which he had been connected, the expenditure on which extended to millions. But if the hon. Baronet was there referring to the construction of railways or other large works of a similar character, he was instituting a comparison between things which were really very dissimilar, for there was an enormous variety of detail and of different manufactures incident to the operations in the Royal dockyards, which placed them in a separate category from the undertakings which the hon. Baronet had in his mind. What they ought to aim at was to arrive at such a balance between the work done in private yards and the work done under the Government, that the one should act as a check upon the other in regard to cost and time of execution. Wherever they could buy the articles they required, and could make sure of having the market always open to them, it was unnecessary for the Government to manufacture them for themselves. He thought articles not of vital importance might be got in the market cheaper and in the quantities wanted, and in this way many of the articles now manufactured might advantageously be struck off the list. He thought the question of the superintendence of dockyards was a point of considerable importance, and the hon. Baronet (Sir Morton Peto) had stated that it was impossible to get the dockyards properly superintended so long as a man was appointed for only five years, and removed whenever he was promoted. He agreed with the hon. Member to a considerable extent in that opinion. He considered it desirable that the superintendent of the dockyards should be a naval man, but he never could see any reason for withdrawing him at the end of five years, or when he got promotion. He thought it would be a beneficial reform if the Admiralty would employ these officers for three years, and renew the term of office if their services should be found efficient. With respect to the Board of Admiralty, it had this great recommendation, that whatever came into the office went directly to the heads of the Department. He knew no machinery better adapted for administering the navy; and as to any more direct responsibility, he could not see it.

MR. H. ROBERTSON said, there was one department of the Admiralty to which he had turned his attention—namely, that of the Director of Public Works, and by way of illustration he would mention two important public works respecting which there were not two opinions both as to their necessity and the advantage both as regarded the efficiency of the navy and in an economical point of view of executing them rapidly; he meant the contemplated improvements in Portsmouth Dockyard, and that at Malta. There was a great want of efficiency in that department. With regard to Portsmouth, on the 18th of February in last year a plan was produced for the extension of the dockyard at that place, bearing the signature of the Director of Public Works, but anything more ridiculous he had never seen or less fitted for the object in view. In the last Estimates there was an item of £7,000, and in answer to an inquiry whether that item had reference to that large plan, he was informed that it was to be applied to the purchase of some property that was required to test the scheme, while the works were likely to cost between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000. Up to the present time nothing had been done towards rendering the dockyard more efficient. A Committee had been appointed to inquire into the subject, but everyone seemed to ignore the plan. They were now asked to vote £20,000 towards carrying out that large plan. Although the improvement was admitted to be necessary, and the House was prepared to vote the amount required, it seemed that not more than £20,000 could be spent during the first year, showing that they had not got the right Director of Works. The case would not bear argument, and all he would say upon the matter was that it was simply too bad. It was said that a model was necessary. Now, a model was a very pretty thing, but it was a mere plaything. A plan was far better, when a proposition was made for expending a large sum of money. Who was now the Director of Public Works? Major Clarke was a man of talent and experienced in his own line, and no doubt he had superintended some railway works in Victoria; but he thought a man of the highest eminence was required to design and construct important works such as that to which he had referred. There were four or five engineers of experience in Great George Street, who could give the Admiralty a design in six weeks, why had one of these gentlemen not been selected for this work? There were very able men in the Royal Engineers, but the corps of Engineers was a limited field, and he was of opinion that the public service would obtain a great advantage from a competition open to the profession of Civil Engineers. If the choice were limited to such a narrow field it was impossible to obtain men properly qualified to spend the money in a proper manner. In that department of the Admiralty there was a manifest defect so far as regarded the dockyard at Portsmouth, and the same remark applied to the works at Malta. He had known Boards of Directors amusing themselves with dilettante engineering, and he supposed something of the same kind was going on at the Admiralty. He trusted that before the Admiralty spent this large sum of money they would take the opinions of some engineers of experience, and having selected the best plans, then to select the best men to carry them out.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: I am bound to say that of the tone and temper of the hon. Gentlemen who desire to criticize the constitution of the Board of Admiralty I have no right to complain. I have rather to thank them for the valuable suggestions which they have made with respect to various matters. I think, however, that my hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury, in making the wholesale charges he has made regarding the responsibility of those who are at the head of the Admiralty, would have done well to take into consideration the opinions of those who held the post of First Lord. Sir James Graham when examined before the Committee on the Admiralty of 1861 deliberately told them that the First Lord was fully responsible for the duties of the Admiralty. I think he mentioned on that occasion that he gave his evidence most disinterestedly, because he never expected to hold the office of First Lord again. I submit, therefore, that the opinion so given by Sir James Graham is one to which my hon. Friend was bound to give every attention. If he (Sir Morton Peto) did not quote to-night, he quoted on a former occasion some evidence which Sir James Graham once gave to the effect that in order to make the Board of Admiralty work efficiently it should be made as unlike a Board as possible. But it is only fair to notice the evidence subsequently given on the same subject by the same distinguished man. No doubt Sir James Graham did once express that opinion, but he afterwards, before another Committee, stated that having given the subject his most careful consideration, he had seen reason to change it. He was asked by the Chairman—

"Do you think, taking the whole administration of the army and navy, that the First Lord is more or less responsible for the whole conduct of the Navy than the Secretary for War is responsible for the conduct of the army?"

Sir James Graham replied—

"I look upon the First Lord of the Admiralty to stand in regard to the public, so far as relates to responsibility, in the same relation as the Secretary for War. But until recent changes in regard to the War Department the First Lord was infinitely more responsible."

The Duke of Somerset when asked—

"Do you consider yourself entirely responsible for the administration of the Navy?"

Mr. H. Robertson

Replied—

"Yes, I consider the First Lord is responsible for the whole administration of the Navy."

The Duke of Somerset gave his evidence after he had been two years in his present office, and if any persons be justified in complaining that the First Lord is not in a position to carry out his views they must be those who have themselves filled the office. The right hon. Member for Halifax (Sir Charles Wood) in his evidence told the Committee that various changes had been made from time to time to meet an altered state of things, and, as showing that there is no feeling in the Department against introducing improvements, I may refer to a recent order issued by the Duke of Somerset. This order states that no question of general policy and no expenditure of money shall be undertaken by any of the branches of the establishment without its coming under the cognizance of those who represent the Admiralty in the House of Commons. Going over the various proposals which have been made for the reconstruction of the Admiralty, I am not prepared to say that if we had now to construct the Department I, for one, should be an advocate for having it in the shape of a Board. I quite admit that there are certain disadvantages in having it in that shape; but there are advantages also. Every project submitted to the Admiralty is at once brought under the notice of a Board. A Board meets every day except Saturday, and in this way delay is avoided in the arrangements connected with the active service of the navy. If it was found necessary for example to commission a ship or send out a squadron the matter was brought immediately before the Board, and the various necessary orders were at once issued. With regard to the suggestion that the Admiralty should seek the advice of eminent private persons either in the construction of ships or of docks and basins, I think undoubtedly there is great force in that. I, for one, have always been of opinion that there are many advantages in obtaining certain external advice before entering upon the construction of great ships or of expensive public works. The question of the construction of ships was brought before the Duke of Somerset, and he expressed his opinion upon it when being examined before a Royal Commission on the Dockyards. In reply to a question asked by Lord Gifford, the Duke of Somerset said he had known alterations suggested in the construction of large ships, but they were not brought before the Admiralty scientific men unconnected with the Department. Lord Gifford said the French Admiralty had a council or committee of reference. The Duke of Somerset, in reply to that, remarked that the Admiralty of this country had at one time a council, of which he believed the late Lord John Hay was a member, but it was not found to work well. There were so many checks and so little agreement that the progress of the works was stopped, and it was found necessary to make an alteration. He added that whether any other council could be introduced was a very important question. It would be very desirable if it could, but it was a very difficult matter to decide. With regard to vessels of war, if you bring in men who are not accustomed to that particular style of shipbuilding they will have to learn their business before their opinion will be worth much. "I see (said the Duke) the desirability of having a Committee, but I also see very great difficulty in the way." And there indeed lies the whole difficulty. It would be of very great advantage to us before constructing such a ship as the Minotaur if we could get any scientific gentleman to assist us, but the fact is that it is only within the Department of the Admiralty that there is sufficient knowledge to give a good opinion on questions of this sort. We do not depend upon ourselves in the construction of large and costly transports, but call upon eminent shipbuilders to furnish their own drawings; but in building vessels of war, as the Duke of Somerset said, it is a peculiar business, which mercantile shipbuilders could not give so sound an opinion upon as the officers of the Admiralty. With reference to other public works, such as the construction of docks and basins, it would doubtless, as the hon. Member for Shrewsbury (Mr. Robertson) says, be a great advantage if we had some persons in the service of the Admiralty who had great experience in such works. The present Director of Works, however, has carried out great works in one of our colonies; but I do not know that he has had that particular experience in the construction of basins which it has been said is desirable. The House must remember that it is not solely in the construction of basins that our Director of Works is engaged. We have barracks to construct, and warehouses and various kinds of buildings to erect, and it is therefore impossible to combine in any one individual all the requisite qualifications. I will tell the House what we have done with regard to the works at Portsmouth. We laid preliminary plans upon the table of the House last year, and the reason why we did so was that the House might obtain a general idea of the proposal which we meant to carry out, the locality and other general information, and I stated at the time that there would be full and detailed plans laid before the House before the whole work was commenced. I only asked then for a small Vote of £7,000 in order to take certain lands and make certain preparations before bringing in the more detailed plan this year for the consideration of the House. An hon. Member (Mr. Robertson) seems to think that we have instructed the Director of Works alone to prepare these plans; but, on the contrary, we have a Committee composed of our best officers connected with the docks, who have had various plans put before them which they have been invited to criticize, and after their united recommendations in favour of one plan we have adopted that plan, and these are the men who, after all, you have to look to for a good opinion on these subjects. The construction of a basin is not more an engineering than a naval question. I hold that it is our naval men who can give you the most practical opinion as to what is the best position for a basin, and the best place to put the entrance gates with the view of getting ships in at certain times, and many other details which are eminently naval in their character. The hon. Baronet (Sir Morton Peto) proposes that the construction of docks and other works should be under a distinct Department of the State. That would be a very convenient course for us, and it would relieve me from a great deal of discussion in this House; but I think the House would not be quite satisfied with the representative of such a Department of works defending the form of a dock or basin. I think it is essentially an Admiralty question, and if you take away the responsibility of that Department and confer it upon another Board I think in the result it will not be found to promote efficiency in the public works. There is another important question which has been raised by the hon. Baronet with regard to the superintendence of Her Majesty's dockyards. No doubt, there are many arguments in favour of appointing scientific civilians to these offices, and there are branches of the business of the dockyards which could be performed by such persons, but I have often stated to this House, and I repeat it, that the business of the dockyard is not confined to shipbuilding. I believe I may say that building forms the smallest portion of the business. There are the numerous details which sailors can alone criticize and determine upon. There are, for instance, the fitting, the rig, the armament, and the stowage of the ships, which sailors alone can deal with. Moreover, if you were to put your dockyards into the hands of a civilian, you would have the captains coming in wanting their ships altered and fitted, and it is well known captains ask for a great many little things which it would be extravagance to grant, and which a civilian would grant, because it is only a superior naval officer that can decide what is really necessary to be done to the ship. There would, therefore, be a great extra expenditure entailed. The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) objects to the removal of the Captain Superintendent every five years, and my own belief is, that if you take the advantages on the one hand and the disadvantages on the other, it is better that this officer should be removable after a certain period. It may be advantageous to put a man into any position for life, without the power of removal, but I think the greater advantages are in favour of removing periodically. With regard to the cost of the superintendence of our dockyards, there is no doubt that in comparison with private establishments it would not stand in a favourable light. The case of the private ship yards is not always analogous to that of our dockyards. Some of our shipbuilders are also shipowners, and their case is more nearly alike to our dockyards, so that some comparison can be drawn. A shipowner, however, sends his ship abroad in a foreign trade; she returns at a certain period and takes her proper turn to be docked and refitted. But the business of the dockyards are so multifarious—ships are always coming in for repairs on account of disasters or other causes, for alteration of armament and various other reasons—that it is absolutely necessary to have a much larger staff of superintendence than is required in private yards; and it is an undoubted fact that men who are working for the public do require a larger amount of superintendence than persons who are employed in private establishments. But I also believe that the excellence of the work done in the dockyards counterbalances the additional cost of a closer and more extensive system of superintendence. But let me tell my hon. Friend that in making this comparison and in making out this large percentage he has included many expenses which do not exist in private yards. As an instance, I may mention that he has included all the medical superintendence—an item which is not to be found in the expenditure of private yards, and I have no doubt there are many other items which must be omitted to make the comparison at all a fair one. But what I do most strongly disapprove is the tone in which the hon. Baronet referred to the patronage and promotions of the Duke of Somerset. I would challenge the hon. Member or any hon. Gentleman, to show me any case in which the Duke of Somerset has promoted any officer either in the dockyards or out of them from motives of favouritism. Such a charge ought to be proved, and when it is made against a great officer of State those who made it should be prepared to give the facts. I challenge the hon. Baronet to bring forward any case in which the Duke of Somerset has promoted or appointed any officer upon any other principle than the good of the public service. As to the charges which the hon. Baronet has made of the present Board of Admiralty upsetting what had been done by its predecessors, that is entirely without foundation. The story is that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir John Pakington) greatly improved the pecuniary and social condition of a very deserving class of officers—the medical officers of the navy. These officers—and I do not blame them,—considered that the additional rank given to them was to be equivalent to the military rank, and that by it they had obtained a right to assume a superior position to officers of the Executive branch of junior standing. On shore there is no great difficulty, but on board ship it is impossible to allow any assumption of rank by a civilian over an Executive officer. I regret that some of the surgeons—the great majority of medical officers, I am bound to say, thoroughly understand their position—but some few did raise difficulties which rendered it necessary that the distinction between civil and military rank should be precisely defined. I believe if the right hon. Baronet had remained at the Admiralty, he would himself have had to do the same as we did. Well, then, as to the oft-repeated assertions of my hon. Friend, that it is absolutely necessary to change the constitution of the Board of Admiralty. Nothing is so easy as to attack a great Department, to attribute to it all sorts of faults, and to criticize all its acts, but I have failed to hear from the hon. Baronet any proposition of a practical nature. We gave the fullest consideration to the recommendations of the Committee of 1861. I believe, notwithstanding what the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) says, that every hon. Member who sat upon that Committee performed his duties with a sincere desire to ascertain what would most conduce to the efficiency of the Department upon which the existence of the country mainly depends. If any new system could be devised which would improve the navy, if it could be shown that any steps could be taken to improve the administration, then we should have something to go upon; but my hon. Friend has mentioned specially only the cost of superintendence in the dockyards as being too high. But that might be the case if you had a Secretary of State for the Navy. I think it would be wiser to allow the Minister of the day to make such alterations as he finds to be necessary, as I have stated the Duke of Somerset has done, than to raise annual discussions in this House upon general charges against the Department which do not I am bound to say in any way contribute to the efficiency of the navy.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he desired to explain that he had not intended to impute any blame to the Duke of Somerset, but rather to cast blame upon the House for what was notorious. He had heard the noble Lord himself regret that influence of a particular kind was brought to bear upon the Admiralty upon certain occasions.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: As the hon. Member for Finsbury had not concluded his speech with any Motion, I should not have troubled the House had it not been that he has referred to the evidence which I gave before the Committee of 1861. I must say that I know no reason for receding from the evidence I then gave. That evidence certainly was not favourable to the present constitution of the Board of Admiralty as being the best mode in which the administration of the great Department of the navy could be efficiently worked. I gave that reluctantly, as I was following three or four witnesses who then held, or had held, the office of First Lord of the Admiralty for a longer period than it was my good fortune to do, and they all gave evidence in an opposite direction to that which I felt it was my duty to give. My reasons for giving that evidence, however, were not those which have been assigned by the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck)—the extreme impolicy of having a civilian at the head of the Admiralty. When I hear the hon. Member for Norfolk repeating those opinions I cannot help wishing it were possible that he could change places with the Duke of Somerset for a short time. If the hon. Member were at the head of the Admiralty for a few months, I do not think he would afterwards insist upon the impossibility of managing the navy with a civilian at the head of the Board. My hon. Friend talks as though the Admiralty had nothing to do but to judge of the height of masts, the length of yards, the best form of anchors, and such questions of detail of which professional men would be undoubtedly the best judges. He seems to be quite unconscious of the fact that a very large proportion—the most important proportion—of the business to be transacted is really business which has nothing to do with professional knowledge, and of which a civilian is as capable of judging as a professional officer. I do not mean to deny that it is an open question whether there are not grounds upon which it would be desirable to have a naval officer at the head of the Admiralty, but I think it would be impossible for this House to take a more unwise step than to lay down as an indispensable condition that the head of the Admiralty should always be a naval officer. I must say that I do not believe that in the Minister at the head of the Board of Admiralty there is that sense of full, concentrated, and personal responsibility which the head of a great Department ought to feel. It is asked how could there be greater responsibility, and is there not a power to set anything right which is found wrong at the Board of Admiralty? My own experience at the Board was, I admit, short; but I cannot accept this answer. I do not think there exists that amount of responsibility which ought to exist. There is not the necessary degree of responsibility for things which are done; still less is there responsibility for things which are omitted. Looking at the extreme importance of the Board I think there could be a better constitution of the Board than at present exists. My noble Friend opposite (Lord

Clarence Paget) has naturally adverted to opinions the weight of which must be admitted—I allude to the evidence of Sir James Graham; but I do not think he gave quite an accurate description of the evidence which Sir James Graham gave. Sir James Graham did not recommend that there should be a change in the constitution of the Board. The ground on which he rested that opinion was a thoroughly constitutional one, but I think he pressed the reason he gave further than it would bear. On the other hand, we must remember that important opinion of Sir James Graham, that the only way to work a Board was to make it as unlike a Board as possible. Sir James Graham, too, a few years ago was Chairman of a Committee which sat to inquire into the new system of administering the army, and if hon. Members will turn to the Report of that Committee they will find in it a warning to avoid adopting for the army the system which was in force for governing the navy. Notwithstanding, therefore, the general complexion of the evidence which Sir James Graham gave before that Committee, I venture to think that his opinion of the Admiralty as a machine for administering the navy differs little from that which I have expressed myself. There are, moreover, things in the present condition of our navy which entitle me to say that I am not satisfied with the present construction of the Board of Admiralty. In recent debates I have twice alluded to rumours which I had heard as to the conduct of the Admiralty with reference to our fleet and armour covered ships, which certainly, if true, amounted to one of the most flagrant instances of indiscretion and mal-administration that ever I heard of. They were to the effect that at the commencement of a great critical experiment, involving important changes in the construction of our navy, the Board of Admiralty took upon themselves entirely to disregard the opinions of the eminent scientific authorities whose assistance they had at hand, and built ships on their own opinions and in a manner which in the event of war we should have reason deeply to deplore. The noble Lord has never contradicted the statement I then made, and I venture to say now, that if there had been at the head of the Admiralty a Minister acting under a sense of concentrated personal responsibility he never would have dared to commit such an indiscretion. I am bound to admit that it is one thing to find fault and another to re-organize a Department. When I for a short time was Secretary for the Colonies I was also Secretary for War. I said then, both in public and private, that though the thing might do for peace it would break down directly in war. War did come, and the system broke down at once, and the Government, in the face of actual war, had to undertake the task of reorganizing the Department. Even now I believe the re-organization of the War Office is not finally settled. But though the Board of Admiralty is not all that I should like to see it, I cannot give my support by any means to some of the suggestions of the hon. Baronet opposite. If I understood him rightly, he proposed that the head of the Admiralty should have an unpaid council to assist him in shipbuilding, and another unpaid council to assist him in the construction of public works. I quite acknowledge the weight which is due to the opinion of a practical man like the hon. Baronet on a matter of this kind, but my impression is that if the head of the Admiralty were to attempt to manage the navy with amateur councils like those referred to he has described, then he would very soon find himself obliged to look out for an opportunity of getting rid of such Colleagues. There is no doubt that changes may be advantageously made in the present construction of the Board of Admiralty, and I do not think it would be impracticable, still less impossible, for the Government to make them. This is one of the questions which give rise to a great deal of dissatisfaction out of doors. There is a general feeling out of doors that the Board of Admiralty is not the best machine for managing the affairs of the navy, my short experience as First Lord inclines me to adopt the same conclusion; and a matter of this sort is certainly well worthy the consideration of the Government and of Parliament.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, though he could not agree with him in all respects, he thought the House ought to be greatly obliged to the hon. Baronet (Sir Morton Peto) for giving it an opportunity of again recording its dissatisfaction with the present constitution of the Admiralty. The noble Lord had quoted Sir James Graham, as usual, but, as a sailor, he (Sir James Elphinstone) had always contended that Sir James Graham's administration of the navy was more disastrous than any operations of the French. He came into office, never having held any office before. He was a man of great ability and energy. He worked his Board as if it were not a Board. He destroyed the Naval College, the Transport Board, the Marine Artillery, the Navy Board, and the College of Naval Architecture, and he built a class of the most expensive and unmanageable ships that ever were in the navy. During the Crimean war he sent a fleet to the Baltic without a single light-draught vessel in it, and the war was in consequence prolonged much beyond what it otherwise would have been. And what was the Admiralty Administration at the present day? When screw ships were adopted by the merchant service and ships were lengthened, the Admiralty lagged behind, and when iron ships were built by the Emperor of the French, our Admiralty built them in a square form, and they did not reach Sebastopol, where they were destined, until after the place had been conquered. With respect to our fleet, the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) when at the head of the Board had adopted the right course in assembling the School of Naval Architects, and, under their advice, in constructing four iron-clad ships which were practically the only four seaworthy ships in the possession of the Government at this day. The rest of the iron-clad ships were entirely harbour ships. But what was the subsequent policy of the Admiralty? By the most contumacious and insulting means to supersede the Board of Naval Architects, and substitute a man who had never drawn a line of a ship, and whose first production in ship construction was a most miserable abortion. What was the consequence? It was this—that those four ships were the only iron-clads that could be trusted at sea, while the iron-clad ships constructed by the successor of the able and scientific men he had alluded to were not seaworthy. Judging from these fruits, he came to the conclusion that the Admiralty tree was rotten. Again, as soon as it was decided that iron ships were to form the armament of this country, it was absolutely necessary that there should be docks abroad for the purpose of receiving and cleaning them. The Admiralty sent out an officer to report as to docks in the Mediterranean. They begun them at Malta, where some £50,000 or £60,000 were expended in the most disgraceful manner, the proposed docks being commenced at a point where they would be the least serviceable. At last the Duke of Somerset went to the spot and perceived that the Board of Admiralty were wrong; but what had the noble Duke done to the officer who led him into the scrape? Why, that officer was made a Grand Cross of the Bath, though he had never seen a shot fired in his life. By a very small amount of expenditure, Halifax, on the other side of the Atlantic, was capable of being converted into a position where ships of the largest class might be put into dry dock, but not one shilling for this purpose was asked for in the Navy Estimates for a graving dock there. The Admiralty had sent an officer to report as to a dock at Bermuda, but not a shilling was asked in the Estimates on account of such dock. What had occurred with reference to the new principle, which was brought to a most wonderful state of perfection by Captain Coles? The Royal Sovereign was put in commission by one of the best officers in the service, and the guns were fired to the admiration of the whole squadron. That ship was put out of commission to make good some trifling defects which did not amount to half the defects observable in the Prince Consort, which was kept in commission; the reason being that Captain Coles was not backed up by the power of the Admiralty. He now wished to make some remarks on the victualling of the navy, the present system being, in his opinion, most improper. The men had not enough to eat. The quantity might be sufficient to maintain life, but it was infinitely inferior to the food given to convicts, and it was given out at such lengthened intervals that the men suffered in health from that cause as well. They dined at twelve o'clock, had tea and biscuit at five o'clock, and then they had nothing till six or seven o'clock next morning. The old men whose stomachs were pretty well toned down by tobacco, did not feel the craving of hunger so much; and the young men, in order to get rid of a feeling which was actually painful to them, took to chewing tobacco. By the scantiness of their diet, and the injudicious mode in which it was administered, they struck off ten years from the age of their seamen. The food was virtually insufficient for the young men especially, and led them to contract that most pernicious of all habits, the chewing of tobacco, which injured their health more rapidly than anything else. He was glad to see the Secretary of State for India in his place, because he wished to ask him why the taxpayers of England had to provide naval defence for India, and why he did not raise the pay of those who protected a race of people to whom our rule had brought greater blessings than to any other race on earth. The people of India had been ground down and oppressed by their own princes, but now they were in the enjoyment of protection to life and property, and many of them had grown so rich that they were putting silver tiles on their verandahs. Why, then, was this country to find naval defence for such a community without receiving any subsidy for that service? He must now advert to the grievances of various classes of naval officers. The emoluments of the superintendents at Woolwich and Chatham were insufficient to enable them to meet the expenses to which they were put by their official position. His noble Friend (Lord Clarence Paget) seemed to think they had been included in the rise of pay granted last year to certain officers, but that was not so. Then, again, as regarded lieutenants, their grievances were very strong, and in reference to them he might notice the death of the Rev. Mr. Harvey, who had devoted his life to improving the condition of naval officers, and who had produced a work on the state of the navy, which he (Sir James Elphinstone) would recommend to the consideration of the Lords of the Admiralty. The noble Lord would find that there were officers in the navy who had been serving fifteen or sixteen years without leave of absence, but the moment a naval officer went on leave he was put on half-pay. Lieutenants now were allowed three weeks and had half-pay, while military men had three months and full pay, and civil servants had six weeks and all their Sundays. He asked that they should have three months' leave of absence at the end of each commission upon full pay, and that those of their number who were on home stations should, instead of three weeks' leave in the year, have six weeks on full pay, like the Civil Service. A grade of first-class warrant officers had lately been created, but it had been extended to so few—those few being men whose acceptance of it would not tend to increase the Estimates—that it had been practically inoperative as regarded the service. The widows of warrant officers had been very cruelly treated. Some thirty years ago Sir James Graham abolished their pensions, on the plea that increased pay had been allowed to warrant officers for insuring their lives. That was a mean and paltry plea, because the increased pay was miserably inadequate for any such purpose; and, moreover, it was not easy to get any insurance office to insure the lives of men employed on the coast of Africa or in China. There were now thirty-seven of these widows who had been reduced to extreme poverty by the arbitrary withdrawal of their pensions; and all that was required from the Government to bring some of them out of the workhouse, and to enable the rest to keep out of it, was only £800 a year. This subject had been referred to on a former evening, and he was now authorized to say that these poor women did not ask for payment of the arrears to which they were justly entitled; they would be satisfied with the restoration of their yearly pensions. He hoped this righteous demand would be complied with by the Board. With respect to the docks at Portsmouth, no doubt certain officers had been consulted, as the noble Lord had told them. Where public offices were to be erected for the accommodation chiefly of the clerks of any Department, the plans of our public buildings were thrown open to competition; and how much more was it necessary in connection with the proposed works at Portsmouth, to invoke the genius which had constructed the great works at Liverpool, Grimsby, Leith, and Aberdeen, in comparison with which no docks belonging to Her Majesty, were worthy to be mentioned on the same day. It was plans of that description that ought to be considered by the Committee. At present they knew nothing further than that the noble Lord told them that plans had been submitted. In the matter of so great a national undertaking it was incumbent on the Government to bring to bear the whole science and ability of the country before finally deciding on the details of the plan to be adopted. Secretaries to the Admiralty had put down works in Portsmouth Dockyard which were most objectionable. Sir Henry Ward, for instance, who had been a most excellent Governor of Ceylon, when Secretary to the Admiralty, had placed the workshops in a most inconvenient situation, and destroyed the best site in all the dockyards of England, for building slips and graving docks; and they would have something of the same kind again unless these plans were most carefully looked into.

MR. SEELY said, that his hon. Friend

the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) had agreed that the statements he made on a former occasion, instead of being debateable, were now to be admitted as facts. It would be recollected that his hon. Friend had denied some of his statements, and he immediately offered to meet him at Somerset House to endeavour to ascertain which of them was correct. His hon. Friend, with that desire to promote the public service which he had always shown in that House, and with that frankness of character which belonged to him, at once accepted the offer. A few weeks ago they met at Somerset House, and he would briefly state the results of the interview. On a former occasion he said that in the four years from 1860 to 1864, there was a sum of £2,262,281 not accounted for. He now found there were certain items not put into the Admiralty accounts for which they claimed credit, amounting to £388,075, which had to be deducted from £2,262,281, leaving a balance of £1,870,000 not accounted for in these four years. His hon. Friend's solution of this deficiency was that a considerable portion of it had gone to stock in the purchase of naval stores. He had then called his attention to the £1,500,000 unaccounted for between 1848 and 1858, but this also was said to have gone in the increase of naval stores. This made, from 1848 to 1864, an amount of £3,370,000 which was unaccounted for. His hon. Friend said that the amount of naval stores at the present time was about £5,000,000, and he now put it to him if he would assert his belief that in the year 1848 the amount of naval stores in all the dockyards was only £1,630,000. If he would not assert that, he must make to the House what other explanation he thought fit. With reference to the amount of stock in 1848, he believed there were 86,507 loads of timber (the main item of stock), and now he fancied there were only 112,000 loads. The difference between 1848 and the present time was only 25,493 loads, which at £8 per load, the average value, came to £203,944. That seemed to account for a very small portion of the deficiency. But there was another matter to which he must call the attention of his hon. Friend. He found on the examination of the accounts that from the year 1859-60 to 1863-4 there was voted under Vote No. 10 (for the purchase of ships), £2,619,644, and there had been expended £3,670,980. In those years, therefore, there was £1,051,336 more voted for ships than the amount actually expended on them; taking that sum with the sum of £339,328—which was expended for stores but not voted that year—it appeared that there was about £1,390,604 more expended on stores than had been voted for them. If these figures were correct, the farce of going through those Estimates had better be dropped; the House had better give the Board of Admiralty power to spend money for whatever purposes they might think fit to disburse it. He had further stated that to the sum for repairing and building ships in the four years he had mentioned—namely, from 1860 to 1864—there ought to be added £1,560,000. He would not trouble the House by going through the details by which he arrived at that conclusion, but he assumed that they were correct. They had been admitted to be correct by his hon. Friend with the exception of an item of £287,948 for pensions to artificers, which his hon. Friend thought ought not to be included in the cost of building and repairing ships. In 1860-1 the total expenditure in building, repairing, and purchasing of ships was £4,017,780. But ships and engines were bought, of the value of £1,273,000, so that only £2,744,780 was left for the building and repairing of ships; £390,000 (the fourth of £1,560,000) added to that would be about one-seventh of £2,744,780, and it would be an addition of one-fifth other years. He mentioned this in order to show the effect it had upon another statement made by him as to the cost of repairing certain vessels. His hon. Friend admitted that he (Mr. Seely) was correct with regard to the amount expended in repairing the Falcon, but he had to add to that expense one-fifth, so that in 1858-9 the Falcon cost £13,491 in repairs, and in 1863-4, £31,970—a total of £45,461. Taking the highest testimony on this subject—namely, that of his hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead—£35 per ton was the value of a new vessel, and £55 per horse-power, which would give a sum of £31,768 for her purchase. But she had cost more than that even in two years for repairs—namely £45,461. Moreover, her speed was only eight miles an hour, and as her armament was only twelve 32-pounders, four 20-pounder Armstrongs, and one 40-pounder pivot gun, it was manifest that she could neither fight nor run away. Then there was the Wasp, in two years, 1861-2 and 1863-4, she would cost for repairs £48,097, and at £35 per ton she should have cost new £39,000. The Lyra, in the year 1863-4, cost for repairs £21,183; new, she should cost £20,380. And in round numbers the Sharpshooter cost for repairs in two years £28,000, and was worth £22,000; the Salamander £43,000, and was worth £39,000. He asked who was responsible for those repairs? There were several other somewhat similar cases, but he would not weary the House by going through all his figures in detail, but hand them to his hon. Friend if he desired it. He thought it of the last importance that the accounts of the Admiralty should be correct. The late Sir James Graham stated on one occasion that an account misrepresenting the facts was infinitely worse than no account at all. The conversion of the timber was another question between him and his hon. Friend. He had stated that there was a difference between the actual cost of conversion and the rate-book prices of somewhere about £35,000, and his hon. Friend told the House that the rate-book was about being revised, and in another year would be made to represent the actual cost price. He thought there was no actual necessity for altering the rate-book prices; it would be better to look to the mode of conversion. He thought the excess of waste was greater than it should be, and in that opinion he was borne out by the evidence of Llewellyn, a dockyard official, given before the Commissioners of 1861. On 180 feet of rough timber there should not, even according to this evidence, be more than 60 feet of waste; and Mr. Llewellyn gives a table of the actual waste on the various sorts of timber at Devonport Dockyard from 1850 to 1854. In 1862-3 there were 222,673 cubic feet of wood wasted over and above Llewellyn's Devonport rate of waste in 1850 to 1854, occasioning a loss of £37,760; that was, deducting from the value of the timber the amount for which the waste sold. He was quite aware that the House would be told, and he hoped with truth, that these accounts would next year be put into better form. That statement, however, had been made again and again from the commencement of the present century. He found on reference that attention had been called to dockyard mis-management as early as 1796. He believed, however, that the present mode of superintendence in Government dockyards was likely to lead to the results of which they had complained. In the ordinary business of life the services of responsible and competent men were secured, and on proof of incompetency the men were discharged; but the expenditure of £4,000,000 for the purposes of building and repairing our ships was intrusted to superintendents placed at the head of the dockyards, who, according to the acknowledgment of the Duke of Somerset himself, were totally unacquainted with the details of shipbuilding, and who were removed every five years. In the army some sort of examination was required, and commissions were even occasionally given to those who distinguished themselves. But for these appointments no examination was necessary. The noble Lord had said that there were many things connected with dockyards which a civilian could not understand, but the noble Lord must also admit that there were many things which naval men could not understand; and he believed that if men practically acquainted with shipbuilding were appointed to the management of the dockyards the result would be a great economy to the nation. It was well known, too, that there was a good deal of jealousy between the different departments. As an instance of this feeling he might mention a circumstance which happened to a friend of his. The Admiralty sent down an officer from Woolwich to view his friend's works. The officer was very much pleased with one portion of the machinery, and promised to recommend it to the Government for adoption; but his friend on going to Woolwich some short time afterwards not only saw machinery there similar to his own, but absolutely combined with greater improvements. On informing the officer of the fact he was told that the machinery which he had seen at Woolwich belonged to the Arsenal, which was a department with which the officer had no connection. The selection of practical men would secure also the purchase of the best and cheapest machinery, and a great saving would thus accrue to the nation. The change was but a small one, and might be easily effected. It appeared to him that facts, theories, and authority were alike against the present system. The Admiralty would certainly never manage the dockyard business of the country cheaply until they placed at the head of their management men who were thoroughly acquainted with the value and the practical nature of the work which they were appointed to superintend.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he should not have arisen but to reply to what had been said with reference to Captain Clarke, the officer who was appointed to conduct the Admiralty engineering works. If the Admiralty had asked any officer in the service whom he would recommend for the appointment, all the elder officers of the corps of Royal Engineers would have recommended that officer, who was one of the most able and intelligent in that branch of the service. The hon. Member for Shrewsbury (Mr. Robertson) had stated that the field of selection was a very narrow one; but when made out of hundreds it could not be very fairly considered narrow. He thought, in fact, that the Board of Admiralty, in making that appointment, had done honour to themselves. It had been stated, as a blot in the system, that the captain superintendents were not mechanics nor acquainted with engineering. But had any one ever known an inefficient captain superintendent? He could not understand why it was thought necessary by some hon. Members that the captain superintendent should be acquainted with the details of every branch in the several departments under his control. The hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely) had stated that the master shipwrights, the engineers, the master ropemakers, and other heads of the respective branches, were all efficient. Well, it was a fact that none of them were inefficient. But was any one of them more qualified than the superintendent to conduct any other branch than his own? What was wanted at the head of the yard was a man of judgment, a man of experience in the naval profession, a man of industry, a man of temper. He had to deal with a variety of circumstances. Place a civilian, however well acquainted with mechanics and engineering or shipbuilding works at the head of the dockyard, and he came into conflict almost immediately with the officer of a ship coming in for repairs. Who was to judge of the necessity of repairs? A report was first sent in to the superintendent of the yard; and then the vessel was visited by the head of each branch, the foreman of shipwrights, the carpenter, the engineer, the caulker, the ropemaker, and others—all of whom made reports to an admiral or captain of the navy, one who knew every part of a ship, and then the necessary repairs were ordered on his judgment. He could not conceive a better system to ensure what was wanted—good work, and economical work. If they had not the right man, get him; but the system itself was good. The engineers in the Royal yards were all striving to get to the head of their profession; and some of the master shipwrights had built for the private trade some of the very fastest ships on the ocean. Objection had been taken to patronage. But there were some officers in the Admiralty with no connection whatever with politics. In their cases patronage had not operated; and with regard to the remainder, could any one point out a superintendent and say he was not efficient? With regard to another objection, the Board of Admiralty was not the only Board we have known. He remembered the breaking up of the Board of Ordnance, and he believed it was the worst step ever taken. As to the head of the Board of Admiralty, there were reasons why he should be a naval officer, and there were reasons in the opposite direction. Whether the head should be a naval man or a civilian should, he thought, be an open question, left to the Crown, and to be determined according to the circumstances of the day. It would be rash in the House to attempt to force the Government into a change of the present Admiralty system. At present every question was discussed by the Board of Admiralty the day it was brought forward, and there could be nothing more prompt than their proceedings in that respect. Some of the ablest administrators of the country had been at the head of the Admiralty, and if an inefficient man were placed there it was the fault of the Government; but it had not been proved that the practice of appointing other than naval men to that office had failed. He (Sir Frederic Smith) would be ready to vote for the sum set down in the Estimates, and regretted that a larger amount was not provided. He was sorry that the docks and basins were neglected. At this very moment, supposing we had a war, we had only two docks at Portsmouth and two at Devonport which would take in first-class ships. We wanted ten docks for large vessels and ten for smaller vessels in the Channel. France had four times the dock power that we possessed in the Channel. This state of things ought not to be permitted to remain. The Admiralty did not ask for money enough. They ought to commence at once at Portsmouth making large docks. They wanted means in the Channel to repair a fleet in the event of their sustaining disaster. The French ships could run into Cherbourg and Brest to repair after an action, and then sweep the waters of the Channel; while our ships, which had sustained serious damage, would be waiting for dock accommodation to repair. He trusted that the Government would not allow another year to pass without well considering these points, and bringing up Estimates to put the Channel Dockyards in a proper state. They might erect fortifications around Portsmouth and Plymouth; but the money would be thrown away if they were without docks in which to repair and make good disasters of any kind that might happen to our fleet. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) had remarked that nobody seemed to be responsible for things which were not done. Well, here were things not done, and the Government were responsible. He trusted that no time would be lost in preparing plans for the necessary works. The preparation of plans had heretofore been done in a very incomplete manner. What was wanted was more vigour, more rapid action. As to the medical officers, respecting whom some remarks had been made, he would observe that, in regard to authority, those of the army and navy were now on a par. They were non-combatant officers; they had no control over any portion of either army or navy, except over the hospital orderlies. The observations of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) were sound; but the hon. Gentleman seemed to push the point a little beyond what was reasonable. The hon. Member for Lincoln, with his usual acuteness, had shown that there had been a certain waste of materials, such as did not take place in the generality of private yards; but the hon. Gentleman seemed to have been misinformed as to facts, and he trusted that the hon. Member for Pontefract would show the House the real state of things, and that, on the whole, our public establishments were worked with a due regard to economy, bearing in mind that none but the best materials were used in building or repairing ships in the Royal yards, and that, therefore, articles which would be used sometimes very improperly in private yards, were very judiciously placed in the refuse stock by the Government officers,

MR. LAIRD said, he agreed with the strictures made by the hon. Member (Mr. Robertson) as to the system upon which the dockyard works were conducted. Instead of getting a practical engineer to make a plan and then carrying on the works with the necessary rapidity, Votes for small amounts were passed from year to year, and the work was delayed till a new Administration came into office, when an entire change was probably made in the plan. In looking over the accounts, he found the result of this system to be that in ten years £1,500,000 had been spent upon peddling alterations of works without making them more efficient for the business of the navy. He hoped, therefore, that any new plan would be laid on the table soon, would be properly discussed, and then executed more rapidly than had been the system hitherto. Another point to which he would refer was the expense of managing the dockyards compared with the results obtained in the shape of ships turned out. Next year it appeared the cost of management of the various dockyards would be £132,631, and that it was proposed to build 15,100 tons of ships and to employ a total of 4,802 shipwrights. It appeared to him that the cost of management in the dockyards was quite disproportioned to the work done, and unless his hon. Friend (Mr. Childers) could give some more detailed explanations than the Returns laid upon the table furnished, the House and the country would probably come to the same conclusion. The cost of repairs formed a very large item, and would continue to do so while the present system was in operation. It would be much cheaper for the Government to repair only such ships as were serviceable, or to build new ones, instead of wasting so much money in patching up old vessels that were of very little use.

MR. CHILDERS said, after the three nights' debate which they had had upon questions connected with the Admiralty the House would not probably wish to postpone the subject of the detailed Estimates much longer. He thought that many of the questions which had been asked in the course of the discussion would best be answered in Committee when the Vote to which any question had reference was before them. However, he would risk detaining them for a few moments while he did his best to reply to some remarks which had been made by hon. Members. With reference to the remarks in the very temperate speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Sir Morton Peto) upon the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, he would remark that he should be very unwilling to go into a general theoretical discussion as to the constitution of the supervising body. That question—as to the comparative merits of a Board, a Secretary of State with a Council or without one was like all those constitutional questions which had agitated all ages—every one had his own opinion upon the subject, and, whatever one or another might say, somebody was sure to find fault. But the fact was this:—If, as the Duke of Somerset had stated, the First Lord was responsible for the business of the Department, and if the Admiralty were represented in both Houses of Parliament, the question whether there should be a Board or a Chief Secretary and Under Secretary, or what assistance should be given to the head of the Department, was comparatively of minor importance. A bad workman always complained of his tools; but the real question was this—whether they got good work out of the men, and whether the men were working harmoniously together? The hon. Baronet had recommended that when large public works were to be executed the opinion of certain able men accustomed to the carrying out of great plans, but outside the Department, should be taken, and that to their advice great weight should be attached. That might be all very well, but as to the specific proposal of his hon. Friend, that the works of the Admiralty should be put under the control of the Board of Works, or some other Department utterly unconnected with the Admiralty, that was a proposition which, in the naked form in which it was put, the House would hardly be disposed to accept. His hon. Friend said that there was nothing in the naval men at the Board of Admiralty which should make the country take their opinions upon public works; but that was an objection which would equally apply to all public Departments with a Parliamentary head, unless they had the good fortune to have in Parliament persons with professional experience willing to take office. His hon. Friend had spoken of what was done in France, and said that the construction of docks and basins was under the control of the Minister of Public Works. He (Mr. Childers)

was at Toulon last year, and he went carefully into the subject, and every one to whom he spoke informed him that the responsible Minister was the Minister of Marine. However, as he might possibly be mistaken upon that point, he would not speak positively, as he should be sorry to mislead the House. His hon. Friend had afterwards asked some questions about the supervision by the Board of Contracts. Upon that subject he might be allowed to say that that question had lately received special attention from the Duke of Somerset, and arrangements had been made with respect to them which could not but prove satisfactory. He would now pass to some remarks made by the hon. Member for Shrewsbury (Mr. Robertson), whose eminence in his profession entitled anything which he said upon the subject of public works to great weight. He (Mr. Childers) entirely agreed with him when he said that such works as they were carrying on at Portsmouth should not be taken in hand unless they were thoroughly satisfied that the plan was a really good one, and that then they should be prosecuted not bit by bit in one year after another, but as they would be by a private person or a public company. Other hon. Gentlemen took the opposite objection, that the Admiralty were unduly delaying the commencement of these works, but when they came to Vote 11 he should be prepared to defend what had been done. Hon. Members had laid great stress upon the necessity for careful inquiry into the expenditure, and had said that merely taking a plan and laying it upon the table upon the authority of one man was not all that was required. But the Government had done exactly what had been recommended. They had not undertaken those great works this year without the fullest inquiry, and they were coming to the House not only showing the total amount of the Vote in connection with the contracts, but also the amounts for certain portions of the works to be executed by contract, and they should endeavour to obtain the authority of the House for carrying them on as quickly as possible. When they proposed to take only small sums for certain works this year, that course would be justified on grounds which he hoped would be conclusive to all men of business conversant with large works. Upon Vote 11 he should be prepared to go into the details. It had been said that the plans for the works at Malta were open to grave objection, and that Mr. M'Lean's plan of last year was to be preferred. He would not enter upon a comparison of the two plans, but would merely say that the present plan was founded upon soundest principles. The original plan of Mr. M'Lean was an excellent one, with the information the Government then had, but the able engineer by whom it was formed was not then in possession of the facts since ascertained, that the dock could be made upon the land between the French Creek and the old Dockyard Creek without interfering with the defences of Malta. The gallant Member opposite (Sir Frederic Smith) had given a satisfactory opinion as to the capacity of the Director of Works. He thought that the Board were fortunate in the selection of such an officer. Technically the Duke of Somerset alone was responsible for this appointment; but he (Mr. Childers) declined to shelter himself behind this responsibility, and was fully prepared to justify his recommendation to the First Lord. When the works were completed he believed they would be as acceptable to his hon. Friend as to all those with whom the officer in question had been connected. The appointment of Mr. Reed had been adverted to, and it was said that the Government had placed themselves in a false position in disregarding the long services of other gentlemen, and in finding themselves mainly dependent upon Mr. Reed as a shipbuilder. But what had been the tone of hon. Members throughout these debates in this and former years? Had it not been that the Government were entering upon a new course of shipbuilding, and that they required the experience of a new class of officers? The Government were building in iron for the most part instead of wood, and in iron of a new kind, and it had been said over and over again that with new works they should have new men. His hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely) went so far as to advise the Government to have business men as managers at the dockyards, instead of admirals and captains. Yet, at the same time, they were told that they must keep the old class of constructors, merely because they had been long in the service. He was sure that no private shipbuilder would take this advice? He thought they were and would be the first to urge the necessity of new blood, and the propriety of engaging men of known ability like Mr. Reed. The building of ships was now more a matter of engineering and less a matter of shipbuilding than it used to be. Were, then, the Government to blame in engaging the services of a gentleman in regard to whom he might appeal to the hon. Member (Mr. Laird) whether he had not done his work with great ability and marked success? He trusted that Mr. Reed would not only receive the confidence of the Government but also of the House. He must now for the fourth time advert to the remarks of his hon. Friend (Mr. Seely) on an exceedingly dry subject, that of figures and balance-sheets, but he could introduce no new matter into the debate. His hon. Friend truly said that he and his hon. Friend met and exhibited certain figures to each other. His hon. Friend quoted certain figures which could not be gainsaid, and he (Mr. Childers) quoted certain figures which were also in black and white and equally undeniable. But his hon. Friend drew certain conclusions which he could not admit, and his hon. Friend refused in turn to admit the conclusions he drew from the figures, and however often they might meet, he feared that the result would be the same. After they left the realms of facts and figures and proceeded into those of the imagination, he could not, he was sorry to say, follow his hon. Friend. His hon. Friend said that there was a difference between the accounts of 1858 and 1863 of £1,870,000; but that difference was easily accounted for by the stock in hand in those years. He had already stated the figures as to timber and other articles, and those figures he had entirely substantiated to his hon. Friend. The hon. Member, however, went back to 1848, and said that between 1848 and 1863 there was a difference that he could not reconcile. But between 1848 and 1858 these accounts did not exist, and, therefore, the remarks of his hon. Friend were no answer to him. He (Mr. Childers) did not go beyond certain plain facts and figures in account, and when his hon. Friend evaded the plain comparison he had shown, and drew conclusions from words spoken years ago as to supposed stocks, at a time when no such accounts were kept, he could not admit that his statements had been shaken. He had found it impossible to follow his hon. Friend in the remarks he had made upon the sum of £2,200,000, but if his hon. Friend had put the figures into his hands a day or two ago, he should have been only too happy to enter upon the discussion with him. What he (Mr. Childers) had really said as to debiting the amount of dockyard pensions in the expense account was that it was exceedingly difficult to see on what principles it was right to add the amount of pensions in any one year to the other expenditure in the same year for wages. He hoped next year to be able to show a satisfactory balance-sheet of expenditure in shipbuilding in the Royal yards, but the details of such an account could only be settled after very careful consideration by able accountants. They all agreed that the accounts ought to be prepared in a certain way, and he trusted that they would be clear and satisfactory to the House.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that nothing could be more unsatisfactory than the discussions in Committee on these Estimates. They embraced details which it was quite uncertain whether hon. Members would take up, and the House could never depend upon their being discussed. The House was often asked to give a Vote on account for Estimates that were not before it. It had often been suggested that it would be well to refer the Civil Service Estimates to a Select Committee before they came before the House for discussion; and as he thought that suggestion was well worthy of trial at least, he took this opportunity of submitting it to the House. The only objection that ever he had heard suggested to such a course was that it would weaken the responsibility of the Government, as the Estimates would be those of the Committee not of the Government, but he did not understand that any recommendation of a Committee could interfere with the free action of the House. In France and some other foreign countries it was the custom to refer the Budgets of different departments to Bureaux, and the same course might be attended with advantage here. They would be considered item by item in Committee, and the taxpayers would have further security that there was no excess in the public expenditure. He therefore begged to move—

"That the Civil Service Estimates be referred to a Select Committee for examination, and to report thereon, in respect of each class separately, such matters as may appear to them specially to deserve the attention of the House."

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words

"the Civil Service Estimates be referred to a Select Committee for examination, and to report thereon, in respect of each Class separately, such matters as may appear to them specially to deserve the attention of the House,"—(Mr. Augustus Smith.)

—instead thereof.

MR. PEEL said, he thought that the course suggested by the hon. Gentleman's Motion was objectionable, because it would have the effect of taking the conduct of the business of the House very much out of the hands of the Government, as they would be unable to bring forward the Estimates when they wished, and because it would indefinitely extend the time during which the expenditure for the Civil Service would be going on without proper authority from Parliament. With respect to the Report of the Select Committee, if it was intended that they should only call attention to the variations in the Estimates from year to year, he must remind the hon. Gentleman that as the Estimates were now prepared those variations were shown; and if it was intended to do more and to give the reasons for or against such variations, then the Committee would undertake a task which it would be impossible to finish by the time when it would be absolutely necessary the Estimates should be submitted to Parliament. Why should a different course be adopted with reference to the Civil Service Estimates and the Army and Navy Estimates? The Civil Service Estimates were not increasing—on the contrary, their tendency was to decrease. He did not see any reason for a preliminary examination of the items of the Estimates, in addition to the examination which took place at the Treasury. They were now prepared in such a manner as to show the sums taken in the former year, so that the House was enabled to see at a glance whether the items had increased or diminished. As the proposition of the hon. Gentleman, if carried out, would tend to diminish the responsibility of the Government, and to weaken the interest which many Members took in the discussion of the Estimates, he trusted that the Motion would not be adopted by the House.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he would not press his Motion.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he wished to call attention to a subject of considerable importance, but which, on its first aspect, might not appear to be very deserving the attention of the House. He desired to invite their attention to the correspondence just laid before the House between Sir Richard Mayne and the Magistrates of Barnet. The subject seemed small, but there was involved the question, whether that House would consent to allow habitually the Chief Commissioner of Police, an Executive officer, to set at naught or explain away by his instruction the legislation of Parliament. The facts out of which this question arose were briefly these. The magistrates at Barnet sentenced two boys under the Juvenile Offenders' Act to be whipped, and took advantage of a section in that Act which enabled them to order the punishment to be inflicted by a constable, as, the boys being the children of respectable parents, it was desired to spare them the stigma of confinement in the county gaol. Upon applying to the Inspector of Police, however, the magistrates were informed that to carry out their sentence would be contrary to his instructions. Now, the House ought to consider whether it would share with the ordinary, by a process of official instructions, the functions of legislation. At least the instructions so issued should be always laid before Parliament, so that the Legislature might be made aware of what had become of previous legislation, and on what practical conditions of the law it might proceed to further enactments. The magistrates, of course, were rather astonished at the Inspector's statement, because Barnet being a rural district, within the Metropolitan Police Act, their own constables had disappeared, and had become merged in the metropolitan Police. They remonstrated, and in reply they got a letter from Sir Richard Mayne referring to two cases which had occurred at Epsom and Richmond some twenty or thirty years ago. This letter seemed somewhat to implicate the Home Secretary in the matter, for Sir Richard stated that in these cases he had taken the advice of Sir George Grey, who thought that though the police were not exempt in case of magisterial order from the duty of whipping offenders, yet some arrangement might be made "by which the necessity of throwing it on the police might be obviated." Now, whatever might be the private opinion of the Home Secretary or Sir Richard Mayne it mattered nothing compared to the public duty of the execution of legislative enactments. When Parliament had once said that such and such should be the law, the course was simple to the Executive administrators of the law. Judging from the opposition which was made by the right hon. Gentleman two years ago to the proposition for extending the punishment of whipping to garroters, he fancied the Home Secretary had allowed private feelings to intrude in this case into his public office. Under the encouragement given by Sir George Grey, Sir Richard Mayne stated to the Barnet magistrates that, looking at what occurred in the cases at Epsom and Richmond, he had reason to believe that the constables would feel great repugnance in carrying out the sentence. The case had now arrived at this point—not only might the Chief Commissioner explain away, but he might also obstruct legislation, and he might do so simply on the ground of his officers having a repugnance to it. It was a grave question, whether the Executive of the country could, on the mere ground of the repugnance of its officer, obstruct the carrying out the enactments of Parliament. The magistrates seemed to have thought this letter very unsatisfactory, as, no doubt, the House would also, and they wrote again to Sir Richard Mayne, and received from him a reply which was most significant. He required, if the police were to perform the duty, that there should be provided for the birching of two little boys—a punishment inflicted in most of our public schools—all the paraphernalia which was provided in the old days when 400 or 500 lashes with a cat-o'-nine tails were inflicted in the army, when it was necessary to have a surgeon on the ground, and all the hospital appliances, and to provide for the contingency of death. He said—

"I do not think the police ought to be allowed by me to inflict such a punishment unless precautions are taken by the magistrates to guard against any abuse of the power proposed to be given, and that the sentence should not be inflicted if, from the state of health of the prisoner, or other causes, dangerous consequences might ensue. For these purposes, some persons should attend on the part of the magistrates to see that the punishment is duly inflicted according to the sentence, and a competent medical man, appointed by the magistrates, be present during the punishment."

Now, such a demand where all that was to happen was the birching of two little boys, could never have been seriously made by a man in Sir Richard Mayne's position, and it was therefore merely a pretext for obstructing the execution of the sentence. Sir Richard went on to assign a further reason against executing the magistrates order—that if the sentence were carried out at the police-station, it would be within the hearing of the wives and daughters of the constables, whose nerves, no doubt, were so delicate that the cries of these little boys would be too much for them. He had no objection to police constables being married and having families, but if the fact of their having wives and families was to excuse them from performing the duties cast on them by law, he should be ready to propose a Vote to provide a separate house for the wives and daughters, where they could not be shocked by the cries of little boys who were birched. Would the House permit Executive officers to set its legislation at naught in this fashion? He hoped the right hon. Baronet opposite would explain the transaction, and that he would promise at least, if such transactions were to continue, to supply the House with copies of all instructions which Sir Richard Mayne might think fit from time to time to issue to his police on particular Acts passed by that House, especially as he had been informed that in many other cases those instructions had completely set Acts of Parliament at naught. This matter might be small, but the principle involved was a very important one.

MR. AYRTON said, he thanked the right hon. Gentleman for bringing this subject before the House. He thought this case was a remarkable illustration of some observations which had fallen from him on a previous evening respecting the position of the Chief Commissioner of Police in reference to the rural districts. It showed how entirely out of harmony Sir Richard's police administration was with the circumstances of those districts. They had been included in his jurisdiction not from police reasons, but from financial reasons. All counties, however, were now able to get contributions from the Consolidated Fund for their police, and there was no longer the same reason for these districts being in connection with the metropolitan police as when that force alone received a contribution from the funds of the State. It was a great mistake to suppose that any advantage was gained in police administration from having a large area. On the contrary, police efficiency depended a great deal on having a small area and close inspection. Another essential was that the police should be in harmony with the judicial functionaries of the district and with public opinion. What might be a good system in London was not necessarily a good system in a country district, and it would be better to give back to the counties the jurisdictions which had been taken from them. It would be judicious to revert to the rural police system in the districts now under the metropolitan police, and to make such police responsible to the magistrates of the counties, where no such case as the present one would ever occur again. The most satisfactory way of administering justice was through unpaid magistrates acting in petty session. What ought Sir Richard Mayne, the chief of the metropolitan police, to have to do at Uxbridge? Possibly, the system of "unpaid magistrates," like all other systems, might be open to some objection, but he should be very sorry to see "barristers of five years' standing" scattered all over the country as stipendiaries. The police force under the control of Sir Richard Mayne had grown up into a gigantic system quite beyond control, and such as ought never to be placed under the absolute authority of any one man. In the metropolis there was nothing to induce anybody to perform gratuitously those duties which were so generously and well performed by the body of country gentlemen throughout England. But though they could not have petty sessions in London, they certainly might confine Sir Richard Mayne within his legitimate sphere of action; for the military display of helmets, &c., gratifying though they might be to look at, were of slight importance compared with the due preservation of life and property.

EARL PERCY said, that he differed from the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down, and believed that within a certain circle of the metropolis it was desirable that the metropolitan police should have jurisdiction. At any rate, as far as the mere detection of crime was concerned, it was more satisfactory to have the jurisdiction in the hands of the police than in those of the magistrates of the county.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he believed that what the noble Lord said was perfectly true—namely, that it was desirable the metropolitan police should have jurisdiction within a certain area beyond the actual metropolis with a view to the prevention and detection of crime. Outlying districts included within the police jurisdiction were brought within its limits at the express request of the inhabitants. As regarded the question raised by the right hon. Gentleman, he could assure him that the views and instructions of successive Secretaries of State for the last twenty-five years were perfectly consistent on this point. With regard to the question of the right hon. Gentleman, he was at perfect liberty to see all the instructions which had been issued from the Home Office for the last twenty-five years. In 1847, after the Act of 11 & 12 Vict., which subjected boys to the punishment of flogging, the question was brought before the Home Office, and it was decided that it would be inexpedient to allow any police constable without check or supervision to inflict this punishment, and instructions were accordingly given that in all cases it should be inflicted by the gaoler of the police station, who was to be sworn in a constable of the metropolitan force for the express purpose. Lately, he had inquired from Sir Thomas Henry whether these regulations were still in force, and found, notwithstanding the ridicule thrown upon the matter by the right hon. Gentleman, that the cries of the boys did attract such a disorderly crowd and occasioned so much inconvenience, that for some years past the practice of whipping at the police stations had been abandoned, and boys were sentenced to imprisonment, though it might be only for a few days or a few hours, in order that the punishment might be inflicted at the prison, subject to those precautions which the right hon. Gentleman had also ridiculed. The other night his attention had been called to a Return of the whippings inflicted by order of the magistrates, and especially to one case where twelve lashes were inflicted on a boy six years of age. Into the circumstances of that case he had inquired, and the answer had not yet been received. The right hon. Gentleman, however, was quite in error in supposing that no precautions were taken against excessive punishment. In one case contained in that Return where twelve lashes were ordered, the surgeon who was present stopped the punishment at the eighth stroke. If the whippings were inflicted in the manner that was desired, and without any supervision, the House would ring night after night with complaints of the undue severity of the police. In the case of every boy who was sent to prison to be whipped, the surgeon was ordered to superintend the punishment, and the Governor was also bound to be present. In the outlying districts, no doubt, police constables were bound to carry out the lawful order of the magistrates, and both they and Sir Richard Mayne would be ready to do so; but he thought Sir Richard Mayne only did his duty in protecting the constabulary from the complaints which would be made if they inflicted these punishments free from all control and supervision. The magistrates, on their part, ought to see that proper precautions for this purpose were taken.

MR. HENLEY said, this was one of the gravest questions that could come before the House, and the manner in which it had been met by the right hon. Gentleman did not lessen its importance; for what did he say?—that the members of this highly-organized and highly-paid police force would only carry out the law if the magistrates did something which the law did not authorize them to do. The papers showed that this question did not come upon the police by surprise, but formed a branch of a regularly codified system. The law had been altered two or three times since the Epsom case in 1850, and if the Home Secretary thought it was still defective, why had he not provided the necessary Amendment? The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the power as dangerous, and talked about "lashes." Language of that kind served very well to get up a cheer in the House, but he knew very well this was no case of lashes, but of whipping with a birch rod. These two things were as different as chalk and cheese. In 1850, in 1857, or in 1865 did Sir Richard Mayne dream of securing the attendance of a surgeon? He never dreamt of it. Was it out of mercy to the child that the whipping was withdrawn from the hands of the police constables. Such a thing never entered into his consideration. The real and only reason for the course adopted was that it was repugnant to the feelings of the highly-paid constable to discharge these functions, and the humane considerations were thrown in as corks to float the case. The paid constable could not soil his fingers, but he turned the dirty work over on the unpaid constable, the tradesman, perhaps, who had properly nothing to do in the matter. The question was, where was all this to stop? England was fast becoming one of the most police-ridden countries in Europe. When Sir Robert Peel got up the force, he gave to the policeman, at 20s. a week, the power which the common law had given to the tradesman, and they had been growing on step by step. It was quite clear that Sir Richard Mayne did not like flogging, and he did not wonder at it. But what would it come to? The next thing would be that a constable would not take a man into custody because he would have to be hanged, and a special constable would have to be sworn to take him. In the present instance, the House had the case submitted to it of a Chief Commissioner of Police who of his own arbitrary will relieve the constables under him from the performance of a duty which happened to be disagreeable to them, while if anybody was aggrieved by them there was no remedy against them unless the existence of private malice could be proved. That was a state of things which, in his opinion, was open to the strongest objection, and it would, he feared, continue to grow step by step in the direction pointed out unless a check were put upon it. It was evident that the boys in question had not been flogged either because Sir Richard Mayne did not like the infliction of that punishment, or because the police thought it a disagreeable task. If, however, the law imposed such a duty upon them, they were bound to perform it; for it was as monstrous to contend that they ought not to be called upon to do so as that a man should not be flogged in prison because the wife and children of the Governor resided within its walls. As matters stood we seemed to be getting into a very awkward position. If the law relating to such cases as the present were wrong it was easy to amend it; but while it remained on the statute book he did not think it was either right or fair of the Home Secretary to back up a Police Commissioner who refused to obey it because it did not happen to be to his mind. As to there being any danger to the boys from being flogged with that murderous instrument, a birch, those who were as old as he was would not entertain much apprehension on that score, and he felt sure the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who possibly might have had himself some experience in that way, would concur in that opinion. At all events, when Sir Richard Mayne talked about dangerous consequences in the present instance there was as much an air of what was commonly called humbug about the whole thing as he had heard of for a long time. It was, he might add, the duty of the right hon. Gentleman to compel Sir Richard Mayne, as an Executive officer under the Government, to obey the law, and not to make such absurd excuses for its violation as the House had just listened to.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

(1.) £175,957, Admiralty Office.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he wished to impress upon the Government the expediency of concentrating the various Admiralty Offices in one locality, instead of having them divided, as at present, between Somerset House and Whitehall. He hoped they would state to what, if any, decision they had come.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that he agreed with the hon. Baronet as to the great importance, for the better administration of naval affairs, that the whole of the Offices connected with the Admiralty should be under one roof; but the concentration suggested would be attended with considerable expense, and that the only reason he could give the Committee for not having carried out a scheme which he admitted would effect a great public convenience was the enormous outlay which had been incurred in consequence of the change in the construction of the navy within the last few years. He was, however, in a position to inform the Committee that the Director of Works had been instructed by the Duke of Somerset to prepare plans on the subject, and that those plans were nearly ripe for consideration. The question to be decided was whether the whole of the Admiralty Offices were to be concentrated at Somerset House, or whether those Offices now situated at Somerset House could not be provided for by means of additional buildings at Whitehall. During the present year he was afraid he could hold out no hope that that question would be practically solved, but he sincerely hoped he should be able next Session, if he should continue to hold his present office, to introduce a measure for the concentration of the Offices in one or the other of the places mentioned.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that he wished to ask for an explanation with reference to the positions occupied by the temporary clerks at the Admiralty, in whose case promotion was very slow, while they received no increase of salary from year to year.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, it was formerly the system to subject the temporary clerks to two different examinations before they were permanently placed on the Establishment, while others obtained their appointments at once without that double ordeal. The Duke of Somerset had deemed it right to lay down a rule in accordance with which all now after one competitive examination entered the service as temporary clerks and then fell into the Establishment as vacancies occurred. There were a great many temporary clerks both at Whitehall and Somerset House, as owing to the pressure of business the staff had been increased, and he was not prepared at the present moment to say that the Admiralty were about to recommend to the Treasury any increase in the Establishment; but those who conducted themselves properly might in process of time hope to be placed upon it.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he understood that some of those clerks had filled their "temporary" position for as long a period as fourteen and even twenty years. He also drew attention to the fact, that whilst the cost of the Board of Admiralty was £9,700, that of the legal department of the Admiralty was £10,713.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that for the sum of £2,600 the solicitor of the Admiralty provided an office and clerks. It must be borne in mind that legal gentlemen would not abandon their private practice for the sake of government work unless they had a fair salary. As to the other item, all he could say was that legal expenses of the Department were increasing; there had been a good many contracts and much litigation arising out of them.

(2.) £284,395, Coast Guard Service, &c.

SIR JOHN HAY said, that one of the principal objects of appointing a Controller General of the Coastguard was that they might assemble the ships under him in the summer months, as a squadron of evolution. During last year, however, this had not been done; but he hoped that it would be done this year.

MR. AYRTON, said, the customs duties of the country were very much reduced, and he wished to know why, if the Coastguard was kept as a revenue force, they were not reduced in a proportionate degree. He wished to know if there was any prospect of a reduction in the Vote. It was to a great extent part of the navy, and the cost should really be placed upon the Navy Estimates.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the sum of £688,648 was the total cost of the Coastguard, and was a reduction by £16,000 upon previous years. There was a yearly increase in the reserve. The difficulties in the way of assembling the Coastguard squadron for evolutions were that its assembly caused a considerable expense, and occasioned inconvenience to the volunteers. Although the ships had not the advantage of cruising in squadron, which he admitted was of great importance, they went into the Channel singly and practised and manœuvred.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that the Vote for the Royal Naval Reserve was exactly the same in amount as last year; the number was 16,000 men, and he wished to know whether there was any endeavour to increase the number.

MR. CHILDERS said, that the number of this force was steadily but slowly increasing. No addition had been made to the Vote this year, because the Votes of last year and the year before had been in excess of the amount required.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to ask, what increase of number there was during the year, and what it was intended to raise the number to?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the increase in number was about 400 or 500 per annum. They might increase the number rapidly by lowering the qualifications, but they found it desirable to keep the force as select as possible.

MR. C. P. BERKELEY said, he wished to ask, how many of the 16,000 men of whom the force was stated to consist were in this country? He also desired to be informed as to the state of the Coast Volunteer force.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that on the 31st of January last the number of men belonging to the Royal Naval Reserve at home, and available at once, was 9,613; the number on leave for short voyages and available in six months or under was 4,995; and the number on leave for long voyages, and who could not be got at in less than about a year, was 1,141. Therefore, about two-thirds of the force were available at once. Those only received pay who underwent their annual exercise. The number of the Coast Volunteers had somewhat diminished, in consequence of the Act which authorized their being required to serve at a distance of more than 300 miles from England. The result of the introduction of armour-plated ships was that smaller crews were required than were necessary on board the old wooden line-of-battle ships. Therefore, this year the Vote for the Coastguard would be 500 less. After consulting with officers of the Customs he found that it was no longer necessary to keep up the number of the Coastguard on shore for the purposes of the revenue, and, therefore, the number of that force on shore was being gradually, but steadily, reduced.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to know, whether the long voyage men received a certificate entitling them to their retaining fee in cases where the length of their voyage had prevented them from going through the prescribed drill.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: No certificate was granted unless the necessary twenty-eight day's drill had been gone through.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he wished to ask, when the Admiralty were going to provide a suitable ship for exercising the Naval Reserve at Aberdeen? There were 1,000 first-rate seamen enrolled in that town, and they were compelled to go through their drill in an old frigate of the class "Jackass frigates." He recollected that vessel forty years ago, when she was called the Conway. She had once been under the command of Captain Basil Hall, and she had the reputation of being an exceedingly bad ship, and when the Naval Reserve was established she was the Reformatory ship at Liverpool. It was utterly impossible for the men to be properly drilled on board her, as her decks were not of sufficient width to permit large guns to be worked. So useless was she for the purposes of drill that the officer in command of the men had applied for permission to build a shed on shore in which to exercise the men. In the meanwhile the Admiralty were selling numbers of ships admirably adapted for the purposes of drill. He wished to know why the name of the vessel had been changed from the Conway to the Winchester; the latter having been the name of an exceedingly good ship, why should such a name be given to such an old beast of a ship? In consequence of some suppositions saving the services of these 1,000 men were entirely wasted, as they were not being taught to work the heavy guns now in use.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the change of name in the Conway was to prevent confusion in the Paymasters' Office and in the books of the navy. He was aware that every port was anxious to have a large ship for the purpose of drill; but the cost of preparing vessels for that purpose was very large. As soon as possible Aberdeen would be supplied with a more commodious vessel.

(3.) £70,042, Scientific Departments.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that the opposition he had offered last year to the removal of the School of Naval Architecture from Portsmouth to South Kensington had been fully justified by the results. It was then stated by the noble Lord that the removal was resolved on because there were already the requisite staff of professors at Kensington for the instruction of the students. It now turned out that, so far from that being the case, it had been found necessary to appoint a Director of Education for the Admiralty, at a salary altogether amounting to £1,200 per annum, and to bring officers from the different naval dockyards to lecture. Thus the Timber Inspector at Woolwich Dockyard; Mr. Reed, the Chief Constructor of the Navy; Mr. Murray, the Chief Instructor for Portsmouth; Mr. Bains, the Assistant Instructor for the Navy the surveyor at Lloyd's, and Mr. Murray, the engineer to the Board of Trade, were all taken to Kensington in rotation to lecture—the whole cost of the establishment being about £5,000 per annum, instead of the £2,500 it was estimated to cost. All this expensive and elaborate machinery was for the sole benefit of sixteen dockyard and four private students. The young men were brought from the different dockyards for six months in the year, for the purpose of going through a course of lectures occupying the greater portion of the day and a part of the evening, by which means these pupils were deprived of all opportunity for the discipline and exercise which was necessary for the preservation of their health. During the other six months these young men were employed in the dockyards without receiving any kind of education whatever. He regarded this system as a most extraordinary one in every respect.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he had to complain that no models of modern ships, such as the Warrior and the rams, were to be found in the School at Kensington. They were all old models which appeared to have been dug from the vaults of the Admiralty, and some means ought to be taken to place the school on a better footing.

MR. AYRTON said, he regretted that the noble Lord (Lord Clarence Paget) should have determined to establish the school of naval architecture at the extreme west end of London, at a distance from all the shipbuilding establishments which existed on both sides of the Thames. He regarded it as an extraordinary piece of official eccentricity. In all probability the present situation was chosen in order to accommodate the protégés of fashionable people at the west end of the town. It could not, however, but be prejudicial to the best interests of the country.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that he had distinctly informed the House last year that the probable amount to be asked for the year would be £4,000. The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Augustus Smith) appeared to regard this sum as extravagant, but a comparison with the expenses incurred by the French Government for a similar school at Paris would show that their expenditure was equal to ours. According to the report of Dr. Woolley and a captain of Engineers sent to Paris to inquire into the subject, the number of élèves in the school was twenty-eight, with occasionally two or three free pupils, but usually none of that class, and the cost was 100,000*f.*, or £4,000 per annum. The object of our own School of Naval Architecture was not only to foster our naval shipbuilding, but also to promote the extension of a higher branch of shipbuilding in our private yards, and several pupils from the latter establishments had already availed themselves of the advantages offered by the Government institution. He did not believe that the position of the School was inconvenient. It was a pleasant ride from the east end of London by omnibus. The School was fixed at Kensington because, as he stated last year, the Government had a very convenient building there where the pupils could be lodged at a comparatively small expense. With regard to the models, it was true that they had not such models as they would like to see in a museum of the kind, but the fact should not be overlooked that they had block models of the modern ships, and they hoped gradually to introduce other models of ships of the present day. The collection of models at Somerset House had been removed to the Museum. With regard to the Educational Director, education in the dockyards, the training ships, and the fleet had so increased, that the appointment of such an officer was deemed necessary. The Duke of Somerset had therefore appointed Dr. Woolley, a most efficient person, to the office.

(4.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £192,415, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Salaries of the Officers and the Contingent Expenses of Her Majesty's Naval Establishments at Home, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1866.”

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN said, he had last year opposed the introduction of machinery into the rope-making department of Her Majesty's Dockyards, believing that it would have the effect of throwing a great many men out of employment. It appeared that since then a great many deserving men, who from six to twenty years had been employed on those works, were thrown out of employment without any compensation, and many of the men with large families. He admitted that those men had no claim on the Admiralty in point of law, but surely on the ground of equity it was most unjust to dismiss honest industrious men, who had served the Government for eighteen or twenty years, on the plea that they were after all but temporarily employed. The only persons who had not been benefited from the increase of wages in our national establishments were the joiners. They were paid only 3*s.* 10*d.* a day and had to find their own tools. The ropemakers had been thrown out of employment, because the noble Lord had found it cheaper to employ women to do their work.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE moved that the Chairman report Progress.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped the hon. Baronet would not press the Motion to a division.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, it was too late then (ten minutes to twelve o'clock) to go through the Vote that night.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir James Elphinstone.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 27; Noes 51; Majority 24.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(5.) £37,332, Naval Establishments Abroad.

Vote agreed to.

SIR JOHN HAY moved that the Chairman report Progress. The Vote was one of great importance, and he hoped it would not then be pressed.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he would not press the Vote. He proposed, however, to proceed with the remaining Votes in the Navy Estimates on Friday next, and to defer Vote 11, for works connected with docks and basins, until after Easter.

Motion withdrawn.

Resolutions to be reported.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

MR. PEEL moved the Vote he had given notice of for £1,748,000 on account towards defraying certain Civil Service Estimates for 1865-6. He said he had presented a Return to the House which showed the different services to which the Vote was to be applied, and the amount that would be appropriated to each service. No service was included for which provision had not been made from year to year for a long time past. It was, therefore, presumed that Parliament would again make provision for them. The object of the Vote was to enable the Government to meet the necessary charges during the first quarter of the current financial year, until Parliament should have passed the Civil Service Estimates in the regular course. The necessity of the Vote was owing to the circumstance that the balances in the Exchequer, to the credit of the different services were merely the balances of last year's Votes, and were not sufficient without this Vote on Account. In former years it was different, because the balances of former Votes were allowed to accumulate in the Treasury; but under the recent arrangement the Treasury gave up the balances in the Exchequer except the last year's balances, and those were not sufficient for what was now required.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,748,000, be granted to Her Majesty, on account of certain Civil Service Estimates for 1865-6."

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he had no wish to oppose grants which might be necessary for the public service, but could not help drawing attention to an irregularity which might be drawn into a very evil precedent. He understood that the sums now asked for were intended for services for which the Estimates had not been laid on the table, or at least were not in the hands of Members. He did not say that the hon. Gentleman meant to take any advantage, or was not dealing towards them with perfect honour, but the House ought to be careful how it sanctioned a practice that might lead to dangerous consequences by voting public money for services of the details of which it had not yet been informed. He quite admitted that it might very often be necessary to vote sums on account before the time had arrived when the Estimates could be discussed in detail; but it ought never to be necessary to vote sums on account before the Estimates were in the hands of Members.

MR. TORRENS said, he hoped the Secretary of the Treasury would specify the services for which he asked that Vote. He wished to know in particular whether the salaries connected with the Mixed Commission at the Cape of Good Hope—which he believed to be a sinecure—were included in the Vote. If so, he should like to divide the House against those salaries, as he thought that that expenditure might be saved to the country.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he entirely concurred with the noble Lord (Lord Robert Cecil) as to the irregularities of that proceeding. Last year was the first case he recollected of these Votes on Account being taken before the Estimates were in the hands of Members; but this year the practice was carried to an unprecedented length. That was the first time they had been asked to vote instalments without knowing what were the total sums of which they formed a part. The Estimates seemed to be kept back in order to prevent hon. Members from informing themselves previously about what they were called upon to vote.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he believed that the course now pursued had been adopted for the last two or three years, and it appeared to him most expedient and likely to prove economical. It was designed to obviate the necessity of waiting for the Estimates before they could have a full discussion on every Vote. There were many details which might remain undecided, and which it was desirable that the Government should have time to consider.

MR. PEEL said, that the Return presented on the 14th of March showed exactly in what manner the Vote now asked for was to be appropriated among the services; that Vote would not give authority to expend more for any particular service than the sum placed opposite to it in the Return. As to the Slave Trade Commission, the amount that would be allotted to it was only £3,000, whereas the total sum that would be required for that particular service was £10,000. If, therefore, the hon. Member (Mr. Torrens) desired to propose a reduction on that head he would have an ample margin left him for doing so. It was not always possible to produce the Estimates as early as could be wished, because if a single Vote, or even a single item, remained undecided it prevented the presentation of the whole class to which it belonged. For example, Class 5 had been ready for some time past, with the exception of one Vote, but that one Vote was received only yesterday, and it was necessary to keep back that entire class of the Estimates in consequence. He might observe that all the services for which provision was made by a Vote on account were established services, well known to the House for which it was accustomed to make provision year by year, and as to which there could be no doubt Parliament would grant the sums asked for.

MR. BENTINCK said, he could not agree in the doctrine laid down by the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peel). The House ought to be placed in possession at an early period of the Civil Service Estimates, as these were the only Estimates in which there was a chance of effecting any reasonable reduction, and he wanted to know why they were not placed in possession of all the details of the accounts before they were asked for a Vote. Any item that had not been agreed on when the Estimates generally were ready could be included in the Supplementary Estimates. Several of the items referred to in the Return would certainly lead to discussion. The present system not only led to inconvenience, but committed the House to the principle of the items for which Votes on account were granted. The doctrine laid down by the Secretary of the Treasury would preclude them from pronouncing an opinion on any items which they had voted in previous years.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, no inconvenience existed by the present arrangement, as any hon. Member could, if prepared, propose to strike out or reduce any items in this Vote of the accounts just as he could if the Estimates were before him. As to the remedy proposed by the hon. Gentleman, it would interfere with the classification of the Votes and be productive of great inconvenience. It was impossible to prepare the miscellaneous estimates for the commencement of the Session, as they did the Military and Naval Estimates, owing to their multifarious character. There was no desire on the part of the Government to withhold those Estimates a moment longer than was absolutely necessary.

MR. COX said, that his hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield had given notice for the omission of the Vote for the Belfast Theological Institution. If they passed now a Vote on account would they not be met hereafter by the answer that they had already voted a sum on account?

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he wished to point out that if this system were to be pursued they would lose their established right of controlling the expenditure of the country. It was the practice of the House to go through these Votes one by one. For the Civil Service Commission they were asked at once to vote on account three-fifths of their salaries. £10,000 out of £13,000 was asked for the National Gallery, and a similar item for Dr. Stevens's Hospital. It appeared to him that they were asked to vote a lump sum which included a number of separate items involving various important principles upon which great difference of opinion existed in that House. This plan was a most objectionable one, but if they were to reject this Motion he supposed they would bring the public service to a standstill, but there should be an unmistakable expression of opinion on the part of the House against the practice.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he thought the system of taking Votes on account, especially in the case pointed out by his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury, was exceedingly objectionable; but, like the noble Lord (Lord Robert Cecil), he did not see what they could do now.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the system no doubt was to some extent inconvenient, but it could not be avoided. There was no alternative, except that of leaving the services unpaid during the period till the House settled the details, or of giving a Vote on account. There remained a sufficient sum when the Estimates were examined in detail to enable the House to express its opinion and object to a particular Vote if it thought that the service to which it referred should cease; and therefore the House was just as free when it came later in the Session to discuss the Estimates in detail to object as if there had been no Vote on account. The first and most important Estimates were those of the Army and Navy. They were not disposed of and probably would not be till after Easter; and what was to become of those miscellaneous services if nothing was voted on account in the meantime? The introduction of these Votes on account was a necessary consequence of a recommendation made by a Select Committee of the House.

MR. BENTINCK said, he thought they were in a more complicated position than ever. The noble Lord said they would be perfectly free at a future time to discuss any detail of these Estimates; whereas he understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that if they assented to-night to the Vote before the House they were committed to the principle of the Vote.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Member was perfectly at liberty to take objection now to any Vote in the instalment asked for; and at a future time it would be competent to object to the balance, but not to the whole amount of the Vote. If the Vote on account was adopted the House might discuss the principle of any Vote in future, but would scarcely be open to come to any practical Resolution on the subject. Whether this system of voting on account were good or bad, it was not the invention of the Government, or of any former Government, but the system recommended by an authoritative Committee on Public Accounts nominated by that House.

MR. WHITE said, he thought that any contested Votes should be omitted from the Vote on account. For instance, the hon. Member for Sheffield had a notice of objection on the paper with respect to the payment of the Belfast Professors.

MR. PEEL said, the hon. Member for Sheffield had authorized him to state that he reserved his objection until the Vote was moved in the usual course.

MR. BENTINCK said, it appeared to him that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had admitted the truth of his objection—namely, that if they sanctioned the Vote that night they were precluded from negating at a future period the whole amount included in that Vote. He wished to know if the right hon. Gentleman sanctioned the practice of asking thirty or forty Members, at nearly one o'clock in the morning, to pledge the Whole House to the principle and details contained in this Vote on account?

LORD ELCHO said, that in Class 4 there were Votes for Science and Art, for the British Museum and National Gallery. The hon. Member for Galway had a notice on the paper for Friday to call attention to the British Museum, the National Gallery, and the Museum at South Kensington. It was possible that he might influence the views of hon. Members with respect to the Votes for those institutions. He should like to know whether these Votes on account for those establishments would effect such questions as to whether the British Museum should be broken up, or as to the removal of the Cartoons from Hampton to Kensington Museum?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the reply of the Secretary to the Treasury with respect to the Motion of the hon. Member for Sheffield was an answer to the question of the noble Lord. A Select Committee of the House had recommended that the balances on Votes should be paid over to the Exchequer at the end of each financial year, and that in order to pay the expenditure of departments at the beginning of the financial year, before the miscellaneous Votes could be discussed, Votes on account should be taken. The course proposed by the Government was, therefore, in exact conformity with the recommendation of that Committee. At the same time, it would be perfectly open to the House to discuss at a later period the principle of every one of the services for which a Vote on account was proposed to be taken on the present occasion. He had never heard any hon. Member wheobjected to a Vote contend that his objection should have a retrospective effect, and that the service which had been performed before, and was being performed at the time the Vote was objected to, should not be paid for. With regard, for instance, to the British Museum and the National Gallery, more expense was necessarily going on. It was inevitable; and it must be defrayed up to the final Vote. That being so, no harm could be done by agreeing to the Vote on account which was now before the House.

MR. TORRENS said, that no explanation having been given as to them, he moved that the Votes of £1,200 for the Commissioner of the Mixed Commission Courts, and £800 for the Arbitrator, be suspended until the Estimates be placed in the hands of the Members.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £8,000, on account of Commissioners for Suppression of the Slave Trade, be reduced by the sum of £2,000."—(Mr. Torrens.)

MR. LAYARD said, that without this Mixed Commission Court the slave trade would be revived in its original form, and we were bound to prevent this by existing treaties with Spain, Portugal, and the United States. While it was perfectly true that the duty of the Commissioner and the Arbitrator appeared very light, it was necessary that the Court of the Mixed Commission should be maintained as well as that of the Court of Admiralty. Other countries had similar courts, and they were necessary for the prevention of the slave trade. The Court of Admiralty could only confiscate the vessel, while the Court of the Mixed Commission could, in addition, punish the crew engaged in the slave trade.

MR. TORRENS said, the Mixed Commission did nothing but draw their salaries. The entire work was done by the Court of Admiralty.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he wished to ask would that Amendment, if carried, preclude all discussion on prior items?

THE CHAIRMAN said, after this Motion was put from the Chair, no discussion could be raised as to any previous item.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, it was quite necessary to prevent this matter going further. The House had been told that these Votes on account were a mere form, but they now seemed very important in point of principle.

MR. COX said, he quite agreed that this Vote on account was adopted in pursuance of the recommendation of the Committee. He thought it would be better to propose the Vote in a lump sum than in such a way as would preclude future discussion. He submitted that after what had been stated by the Chairman each item of the Vote ought to be put separately, so as to give the Committee an opportunity of objecting to any particular item.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the course which had been adopted had been deliberately recommended to the House in a Report of a Select Committee, which received the general approval of the House. That Report distinctly stated that—

"Votes on account are only to be applied to the payment of services which have received the sanction of the House in former years."

The hon. Member for Finsbury had asked, "Why not have a lump sum?" The Committee on that point said—

"We are of opinion that this difficulty (the lateness of the Civil Estimates) may be overcome by taking one aggregate Vote upon account for such Civil Services as have been sanctioned by Parliament in the preceding Session, and in order to facilitate this practice it is recommended that all salaries for the last quarter shall be payable on the 31st of March in each year, and the amount thus made applicable to each separate Vote for Civil Services should be stated in the schedule and detached from the amount voted."

The course taken to-night was precisely in accordance with that recommendation of the Committee.

MR. COX said, that the items should be put seriatim from the Chair.

THE CHAIRMAN: It has never been the practice of the House to put the separate items to the Vote seriatim. It had always been the practice to propose the Vote, and then any Member may raise a discussion and make a Motion upon any individual item in that Vote.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he wished to ask whether it was the design of the Government in asking for this Vote on account to apply it exclusively to the payment of that which had fallen due this year to current expenditure as distinguished from extraordinary and incidental expenditure? With reference to the Science and Art Department, great doubts existed as to whether the sums applied by Government in that direction should be continued. He merely mentioned this as an illustration of the difference of opinion which existed.

THE CHAIRMAN : The Motion before the Committee is, that the items for commission and arbitration for the suppression of the slave trade be reduced by £2,000, and the hon. Member must confine his observations to that subject.

LORD ROBERT CECIL : I object to the Vote being proceeded with. Because an hon. Member chooses to object to an item we are told that every other hon. Member is precluded from making any remarks with regard to previous items. I protest against that decision, as one limiting the just rights of the House of Commons.

THE CHAIRMAN begged leave to read to the noble Lord the Resolution of the House of Commons upon which he had acted. That Resolution, agreed to on the 19th of February, 1858, stated that when a Motion was made in Committee of Supply to omit or reduce any item of a Vote, the question should be proposed from the Chair for omitting or reducing such item accordingly and the Member should speak to such question only until it had been decided.

MR. AYRTON moved to report Progress.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that another Resolution had been passed by the House at the same time with the Resolution he had just read—

“Resolved, that after a question has been proposed from the Chair for omitting or reducing any item, no Motion shall be made or debate allowed on any preceding item.”

MR. HENLEY said, that according to the strict rule of the House, the Chairman was no doubt right in deciding that no question could be discussed excepting that which had been put from the Chair. But his hon. Friend (Mr. F. S. Powell) had merely alluded to the Vote for the Science and Art Department, not with a view of entering into the merits of that question, but as an illustration to show how inconvenient was this mode of taking Votes on account. If the mouths of Members were to be tied in this way, nothing in the shape of an illustration would be possible in such a case for the future. He thought the Chairman must have misunderstood the argument which his hon. Friend was using.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had hesitated for some time to stop the hon. Member, until it appeared to him that the hon. Member was discussing the item on its merits, and was not alluding to it as an illustration. Thereupon, in accordance with the rule of the House, he thought it his duty to stop that discussion.

MR. TORRENS said, he wished to ask, whether he was at liberty to withdraw the Motion, in order to give hon. Members an opportunity of objecting to other items?

THE CHAIRMAN said, it might be withdrawn with the permission of the House.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he wished to ask, whether it could be withdrawn until the Motion for reporting Progress had been put from the Chair?

MR. AYRTON said, he thought it would be irregular to withdraw the Motion until that for reporting Progress—which he had made and would now repeat—had been disposed of. The Resolution which had been read by the Chairman had no reference to the case before the House. This was not a single Vote in the sense of that Resolution. It was an Estimate showing the several services for which Votes on account were required for the year 1865–6. The Resolution read by the Chairman referred to the ordinary Votes, each of which was made up of several items. The ruling of the Chairman might lead to embarrassing consequences, and the subject was not one to be disposed of hastily at one o'clock in the morning.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, that he was distinctly alluding to the Science and Art Vote as an illustration only.

THE CHAIRMAN, interposing, said, that the Motion of the hon. Member (Mr. Torrens) was withdrawn.

MR. TORRENS said, that his Motion had been withdrawn, and he had been ready to withdraw it if the House consented, provided he had the opportunity of bringing it forward again.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had put the question for the withdrawal of the Motion, and there being no dissentient voice, he had declared it withdrawn accordingly. The question now before the House was, that he report Progress.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed determined to have a grievance. The Motion having been withdrawn, there was no reason for continuing the discussion.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, that a series of decisions had just been given, most irregular in character, and entirely preventing the Committee from proceeding with any satisfactory discussion. It was, therefore, his intention, and that of his

hon. Friends, to use the power possessed by a minority in such a case.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that if there was one principle more than any other which it was necessary the House should respect in conducting its debates, it was acquiescence in the decision of the Speaker or of the hon. Member who sat as Chairman of Committees. If decisions made and founded on recorded Resolutions of the House were to be controverted and discussed by every hon. Member who thought he knew better than the Speaker and the Chairman, and who was wiser than the Committees by whom these Resolutions were framed, the proceedings of the House would fall into perfect confusion, and they would present a spectacle not at all creditable to this Assembly. As to the objection taken by the hon. Member, the decision of the Chairman appeared to him perfectly consistent with the invariable practice and with the Resolution which had been read. The Vote proposed was a single Vote. Every single Vote referred to a great number of details which were stated in the Estimates, and therefore this Vote was exactly in the category to which the Resolution pointed. However, he really thought that the House was not in a temper to make it desirable to continue the discussion. It was quite evident that they were not disposed to come to a final decision that evening, and therefore instead of wasting their time in constant wrangling, he would suggest that the Motion for reporting Progress be agreed to, and he hoped they would meet in a calmer temper another evening.

To report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again on Wednesday.

THE EPIDEMIC IN RUSSIA.—QUESTION.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD desired to ask his noble Friend the Lord President of the Council, Whether the attention of the Government had been called to statements which had appeared in the public papers, and which had created considerable excitement in the public mind, as to an epidemic which was said to be raging in some parts of Russia, and to be rapidly advancing towards this country? This epidemic was represented as being of a most mysterious character, and seemed to be somewhat analogous in its fatality to the visitation of the cholera which had occurred within the lifetime of most of those present, and was represented as coming in almost a straight line from the Ural Mountains to this country. It had reached St. Petersburg, where its ravages were so great that the number of deaths was no longer officially stated, and had broken out in some parts of Prussia. He wished to know whether the Government had taken any steps in this matter?

EARL GRANVILLE said, that his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary had already given orders to the Consuls and our Ambassador in Russia to furnish all the information they could procure on the subject; and on that very day he had sent suggested questions to the Foreign Office in order that they might be telegraphed to our representatives not only in Russia but in the Baltic ports, and that replies might be received as soon as possible.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS BILL.—PETITIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in presenting a petition from the Inhabitants of Harrow-on-the-Hill, praying to be heard by counsel against the Bill, said, he desired to remind their Lordships that Harrow School was founded in the time of Elizabeth, by John Lyon, who left certain portions of estates to be invested under the patronage of the Crown for the purpose of educating the sons of poor and respectable inhabitants of Harrow, and other portions for the repairs of the roads in the neighbourhood. The School flourished for a long time, but at last the trustees seemed suddenly to have gone to sleep, for they allowed an Act of Parliament to be passed which alienated a considerable portion of the proceeds of the estates from their original objects. The part which now remained to Harrow amounted to the sum of about £1,600 a year, and he was informed that its value was rapidly increasing with the spread of the metropolis. The foundationers, though always kept up to an average number, had not of late derived all the advantages to which they were entitled under the will of John Lyon. But though they had not received the full benefit which they had a right to expect, yet the natural result of the endowment was to induce many people to reside at Harrow for the purpose of educating their children. Now, however, it appeared that the Commissioners thought it desirable that there should be but one class of boys educated in the School; but the petitioners were anxious that poor parents should still have the same opportunity of educating their children as before. This Bill contained a most extraordinary clause by virtue of which at the end of ten years the foundationers should altogether cease, and thus the intention of John Lyon would be entirely disregarded. The clause to which he referred was the 20th, by which it was provided that the privilege of free education at Harrow School, and the right of preference in elections to John Lyon's scholarships, which were given by the statutes of the founder to children of the inhabitants of the parish of Harrow, should cease, except in cases of persons residing in the parish at the time of the passing of the Act, in which case the children of such parents born within ten years after the passing of the Act should be entitled in the same manner as if the Act had not passed. As there was an apparent discrepancy between the figures quoted by the noble Earl (the Earl of Clarendon) and those supplied to himself by a deputation from Harrow, he would read an extract from a letter which he had received in explanation—

“ The Founder's property consists of the buildings immediately connected with the school, consisting of the two schoolhouses, chapel, library, master's house, racket and five courts, cricket ground, &c., and £1,100 per annum derived from the rental of real estate. All the school buildings are appropriated to the use of the whole school, boarders as well as foundationers. The £1,100 a year is expended in keeping in repair, lighting, warming, and otherwise maintaining the buildings, and providing other necessities for school purposes, and in exhibitions to the Universities. These matters provided for (some of the particulars of which appear in the Report of the Commissioners), there would probably remain not more than the surplus mentioned by Lord Clarendon.”

The petitioners prayed that their Lordships would refer the Bill to a Select Committee; and the case of Harrow seemed to him so strong that he trusted the noble Earl would consent to this course, and give the parties interested the fullest opportunity of showing the injustice that was about to be perpetrated by the measure.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON said, that Her Majesty's Government had no objection to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. He could not give the noble Earl opposite an answer last night without consulting his Colleagues. It would, however, he trusted, be understood that the Select Committee was to be appointed with the bond fide intention of examining the Bill, and not with the design of delaying its progress.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY, after expressing his gratification at the announcement of the noble Earl, said, that so far as he knew, there was no desire to delay the progress of the Bill in Select Committee.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he had a petition to present from the inhabitants of Rugby, of a similar nature to that presented by the noble Marquess, but it asked not only that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, but also that they may be heard before that Select Committee by their counsel. Nor did he see how, on considerations of justice, their Lordships could refuse the prayer of the petition. The injuries that the petitioners would suffer from the operation of the Bill would be very great, and those injuries not being of a general (which was usually the reason given for not hearing counsel against a public Bill), but of a private nature, they were entitled to be heard by counsel. These petitioners were the inhabitants of Rugby and the adjacent parts, and they had a special interest in the Rugby School. That School was founded by Lawrence Shirreff, in 1576. It was founded as a free grammar school, and the direction of Lawrence Shirreff was that it was to be built in a convenient locality and placed under the direction of a Master of Arts, "an honest, discreet, and learned man, for ever." For the purpose of maintaining this School, he left property in London, which has become very valuable, and some property in Rugby. In 1777 an Act of Parliament was passed which defined the limits within which the inhabitants should be entitled to the privileges of the School, those limits being a distance of five measured miles of Rugby. By a decree of the Court of Chancery, in 1780, those limits were extended to ten miles on the side of Warwickshire. The School prospered greatly, and the privilege of sending a boy to the School had become of great value. The School extended itself under trustees practically similar to those created in the first instance in the year 1602—namely, a dozen country gentlemen residing in Rugby and the neighbourhood. These gentlemen had so well executed the trusts confided to them, that the School of Rugby was now considered almost as the model School of this country. It had been in advance of others, and for a number of years it had been placed under a succession of distinguished men as Head Masters. The management of these country gentlemen had been such as not to interfere with the action of the Head Masters, and consequently that had been done at Rugby by a succession of good Head Masters which was effected in States under a succession of good Governors. The School had prospered, and had become what it is. It had, he believed, at the present moment, nearly 500 boys. By four Acts of Parliament, or some of them, and the decrees of the Court of Chancery resting on those Acts of Parliament, the trustees had sufficient power to rectify anything which might appear wrong, and thus the School had within itself the means of reform, so that the value of the privilege of sending boys to the School was very great. He saw that one gentleman, Mr. Caldecott, whom he recollected as one of the most distinguished civil officers of the East India Company, stated at a meeting that was held on this Bill, that he and five brothers had enjoyed the benefit of this School, that he was there nine years, and that when he left his father told him that the charge of his education, so far as the School was concerned, did not exceed £100. He saw that another gentleman, of the name of

Sale, stated that he had had seven sons at the School. The benefit to each of these gentlemen in the education of their sons sent gratuitously to the School at Rugby could not be less than from £500 to £600. This privilege of sending their sons to the School was, therefore, a valuable property; and the inhabitants of Rugby held that property by a deed of great antiquity; they had possessed it undisturbed for very nearly 300 years. It had been recognized by successive Acts of Parliament, and regulated by successive decrees of the Court of Chancery under these Acts of Parliament, yet valuable as it was, it was now proposed by this Bill, without their being heard, to take it at once from some, and in a few years from all, and that without the slightest compensation. It was proposed by the Bill at once to disfranchise all who were beyond the limits of five miles from Rugby, and all within these limits who were born after ten years from the passing of the Act. He knew not what property could be held to be secure if a property resting on deed, on antiquity of possession, on successive Acts of Parliament and decrees of the Court of Chancery for 300 years, was yet to be violated by an Act of Parliament without hearing the persons interested, in order to carry out some fanciful scheme. He trusted that their Lordships would take a very different view of the rights of these persons from that which was taken by those who had promoted this Bill. He was quite aware that there were persons who, for the purpose of obtaining the benefit of this privilege, had established themselves as sojourners within the limits of the foundation; but their right was as good in law as the right of those who were born to the privilege. Lord Langdale had distinctly declared that the children residing within the boundary were to be considered as children of Rugby, and that they had as good right to all the privileges of the school as any person born within the privileged limits. The right existed, and whatever right they might have by law, the law would preserve to them. He confessed that he felt very deeply interested in this measure. His father had his education at the foundation of the Charterhouse; at that time his grandfather was a clergyman with very limited means indeed, and it would have been perfectly impossible for him to give to his sons that education through which, or at least assisted by which, one rose to be

Chief Justice, two to be Bishops, and the others to take important positions in their respective professions, unless he had been able to avail himself of the advantages which that foundation afforded. His grandfather, the Bishop of Carlisle, had himself been educated in the same way in a free school. He (the Earl of Ellenborough) considered his family to be the creatures of free education, and he was resolved as far as he could to retain for others the benefits to which his family owed their prosperity. If it should be necessary—but he trusted it would not—he should move that the petitioners be heard by counsel against the Bill.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he was afraid that some observations he made upon that subject the other evening had been misunderstood. In the statement he had made with respect to Harrow he had not intended to give expression to the opinions of the inhabitants of that town, but had merely declared what were his own impressions in reference to that question.

THE EARL OF POWIS presented a petition from the Master, Fellows, and Scholars of St. John's College, Cambridge, against those provisions of the Bill by which their connection with certain public schools would cease, and praying to be heard by counsel against the Bill.

LORD LYTELTON said, he hoped the prayer of the petitioners would be heard by counsel and would be granted. It was clear to him that a Select Committee was inevitable; but, looking to the state of business in the other House of Parliament, he felt great doubt whether the effect would not be to postpone the Bill for another year. When Bills affected the rights of individuals, and they desired to be heard by counsel, it was very seldom that such an application was refused. If the Commissioners had in any instance omitted to give a due hearing to interested parties, those parties would naturally be the more anxious to make their case known to Parliament. He desired to point out on the part of the Commissioners that they recommended that the privileges enjoyed by those who had a vested interest should be retained for a longer time than that set forth in the Bill, and he thought a longer period should be adopted.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, till Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

LAND DEBENTURES (IRELAND)

(re-committed) BILL—[BILL 80.]

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that he desired it to be understood that in consenting that the Bill should pass through Committee receiving appropriate Amendments, he distinctly reserved to himself and the Government the right to take any course at a later stage of the present Bill, as well as of other Bills with a similar object, which might seem to be right. The Bills involved very important principles, and it was for the House to consider how far it would be contrary to the course hitherto pursued—with respect to Irish legislation especially—to give Parliamentary facilities for the re-creation of encumbrances on land. The next point to which the attention of the House ought to be directed, was the question how far it was expedient to give the appearance of an especial Parliamentary security to mortgages on land by means of debentures, which might be created at common law without such security. Another important point was the question of value in regard to the proposed debentures. If the appearance of a Parliamentary security was given, it would be perfectly delusive, unless the debentures were represented by a sufficient value in land; but there was great danger that the powers created by the Bill might be made the means of fraud. He hoped that that point would be taken into due consideration. Three Bills had been introduced in reference to this subject; and a considerable number of persons thought that, on the whole, it would be of advantage if greater facilities were afforded for raising money on land with proper securities. Under these circumstances it had been thought right to allow the Bills to be referred to a Select Committee, and the form in which the Bills had been returned to the House, showed that some care had been bestowed on them. It, therefore, appeared to the Government that it would not be an improper course, if it were only out of deference to the judgment of the Select Committee and for the sake of many persons who took an interest in the measures, to permit them to go through a Committee of the whole House, the Government reserving to themselves the full right to oppose the Bills, if it should seem desirable to do so, at some future stage.

MR. HENLEY said, he was glad that the House had received an assurance that these Bills, which were important either for good or evil, would have the consideration of the Government, and he desired it to be understood that if they were passed the adoption of them would be upon the responsibility of the Government. When they were brought in he had called the attention of the House to what he feared might be the quasi-character of security given to the debentures by mixing them up, as proposed in one of the Bills, with a Government Office. Many persons at present believed that a security attached to the debentures which in reality they did not possess. He hoped that point would receive the consideration of the Government.

Clauses 1 to 6 agreed to.

Clause 7 (Owner of Land may issue Debentures with sanction of Court.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that by the Bill the Landed Estates Court was to examine the title to the land on which the debentures were to be charged, and also to ascertain that since the granting of the certificate no persons had acquired

rights which would be injuriously affected by the debentures. The common seal of the Court was then to be put on the debentures, and the seventh clause concluded with these words —

“The seal of the Court shall be conclusive proof of the validity of the debenture to or upon which such seal shall be affixed or impressed.”

He felt some apprehension that those words would have a misleading effect, for though they did not give a Parliamentary title they might seem to some persons to have that effect, and he was inclined to suggest that those words should be omitted.

MR. SCULLY said, he had at first intended to move the omission of the clause, and that another should be substituted. But he would suggest that to the words “common seal” should be added “special seal,” a course approved of by Judge Longfield, to whom he had sent a copy of the Bill as it came from the Select Committee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said he could not agree to the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman. He would move the omission of the words “by its common seal, and also by the signature of such Judge or Officer” after “shall be signified,” in order to insert “in such manner as the Court may by any general order authorize for such purpose.”

Clause 8 (Form and Effect of Debentures.)

Clause 9 (Transfer of Debentures.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the clause provided that there should be two modes of transferring these debentures; the one by memorandum, entered in the books of the Court; the other by indorsement of the transferee. He objected to the second of these modes of transfer, and proposed that the words authorizing it should be struck out.

MR. SCULLY said, he had previously proposed a third mode of transfer in addition to the two now contained in the clause, and that third mode was by delivery, like a bank note; but as the Select Committee would not agree to it, he had to give it up. He supposed he must also give up the second mode—namely, by indorsement, as the Attorney General would not assent to it; but he believed its omission would be mischievous. For his own part, he did not see why these debentures should not pass by delivery, like a bank note; but, probably, the Chancellor of the Exchequer might object to that, as introducing a new kind of currency.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH counselled caution in that matter, and thought the hon. Member (Mr. Scully) would exercise a wise discretion in acceding to the proposal of the Attorney General.

Words struck out.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 11 (Debentures on Unincumbered Land.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, this clause, which was the most important of the Bill, provided that in the case of unencumbered land no debenture or debentures should be charged upon the land for more than ten times what might appear to the Court to be the yearly value of the land, having regard to any lease or other matter affecting it; nor was the annual amount of interest reserved on any debenture to exceed one-half of what might appear to the Court to be its yearly value. Now, how was the Court to ascertain the value of the land? There was no machinery for doing so supplied by the Bill. He had no faith in Court valuations. The Court, which in such matters had no knowledge of its own, must place confidence in other persons, such as surveyors and professional valuers, who, he was sorry to say, were certainly not infallible and not always honest. They could never be sure that the margin they proposed to leave really existed. This was the clause in regard to which his great objection to that scheme mainly turned. What he disliked and distrusted in all Bills of that kind—although he did not think it belonged to his department to take the whole responsibility of opposing a considerable opinion entertained in favour of that experiment—was that a great number of simple people in the country might be led by the machinery of these measures, by the intervention of the Court, and all the other forms, to suppose that they need not look narrowly into the title or the value of the property on the security of which they lent their money, and that great losses and, perhaps, frauds might occur. The limit of one-half, the yearly value fixed by the clause, appeared very fair, provided they could be quite sure that that amount would be bona fide ascertained; but there was no machinery in the Bill for ascertaining it.

COLONEL DUNNE concurred in the objections taken by the Attorney General to

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART believed that the public valuation of land in Ireland was based on sound principles, and would admirably answer all the purposes required by the present Bill. It was from 10 to 20 per cent under the real value.

MR. SCULLY allowed that this clause contained the whole essence and marrow of the Bill. However, his intimate acquaintance with the transfer of land in Ireland enabled him to state that he had every confidence in the valuations of the Landed Estates Court, the Judges of which were practical men, with every appliance at their command. In a letter which he had recently received from Judge Longfield, that learned Judge expressed a hope that he would insist on the principle of valuation by the Court, otherwise the Bill would be of little value. The writer saw no substitute for such a system of valuation, and did not believe that the public would have any confidence in any valuation by a person selected by the owner himself. That a public valuation was a safe standard of value was proved by the experience of other countries. In Poland the limit of three-fifths was adopted, whereas the present Bill took only one-half. In Hamburg and Frankfort the limit was one-half, with a guarantee of the title by the State. In Belgium, Lombardy, parts of Germany, and Switzerland, public valuations were also used to measure loans on land; and in Ireland they had a uniform Government valuation, which regulated all rates on land, such as poor rates, income tax, &c. He had tried to keep down the limit as low as possible, so that the debenture should be almost cash, and he gave no Government guarantee, which was expressly negatived by the 30th clause, providing that under no circumstances should the holder of a debenture have any claim on the Court or on the public funds in respect of any mistake or omission relating to the value of title to any estate or otherwise.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the explanation elicited in the course of that discussion as to the public valuation of lands in Ireland seemed to be important; but there was not a word about that valuation in the Bill. He proposed, therefore, to add to the clause, as an additional security, these words, "Not exceeding in any case the value fixed by the public valuation of lands in Ireland."

MR. SCULLY hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would not insist on that alteration, which would cut down the Bill much too far. In many cases the public valuation in Ireland was far too low, and no one would dream of dealing with land merely on that valuation.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had proposed the words in order to get out of the region of mere speculative values, and he must express some surprise, after the course which the discussion had taken, that any one should object to such an Amendment.

MR. SCULLY supposed he must submit if the hon. and learned Gentleman persevered, but if this alteration were now made a Bill would have to be introduced before long to get rid of it.

MR. KER suggested that, as a general rule, the Government valuation might be taken, subject, however, to certain exceptions, within the discretion of the Court.

COLONEL DUNNE thought it would be much safer to adopt the Government valuation than to leave the matter to the Court.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE O'DONOGHUE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, it was intended to repeal an Act of Queen Anne, under which poor people in Ireland were sentenced to penal servitude for the offence of vagrancy. The Act of Anne was intended to deal with a state of things which no longer existed, and had often been made an instrument of oppression. He hoped the Government would not object to the second reading. Should any discussion be thought desirable it might be taken on going into Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The O'Donoghue.)

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he had no objection to the Bill being read a second time on the understanding that in Committee a discussion would be taken on various points arising on the wording of the first clause. The first clause proposed to repeal not only the Act of Queen Anne, but also "the several Acts amending and continuing the same." This he thought too extensive ; but that was a question which would be best considered in Committee. He would only add that it was hardly correct to say that under the statute of Anne poor persons were committed to penal servitude for vagrancy. He did not defend the Act of Anne ; but it should be known that the man who was convicted at Kilkenny had been going about the country causing the greatest possible disturbance and distress to the poor, not merely asking for alms as a pauper, but threatening to quarter himself on the poor farmers whom he intimidated, often burning down their stacks or homesteads if they refused compliance with his demands.

MR. GEORGE said, he was ready to assent to the Motion for the second reading of the Bill, upon the understanding that it should be open to discussion on the Motion for going into Committee. He believed that some misapprehension prevailed with respect to the existing state of the law. There were three Acts which related to this subject—the Act of 6th of Queen Anne, in which the words "Tories, Robbers, and Rapparees" were introduced ; the Act of the 2nd of George II., with respect to which some doubt had arisen whether it continued that of Queen Anne ; and the 31st George III., chapter 44, which continued not only the Act of Anne, but many other most useful Acts, which no one wished to see repealed. The first clause of the present Bill would, however, under the words "the several Acts amending and continuing the same" repeal all those Acts, and so far it should be considered wholly inadmissible. It was under the Act 31st George III. that presentations before the grand jury took place, and however absurd the thing might seem to be in these days, it had worked very beneficially in many instances. There were and had always been in Ireland, a number of idle vagabonds prowling about the country, without any visible means of subsistence, who were found, not only "coshering," but intimidating farmers to give them supplies, and it was in the prosecution of this class of offenders that the Act was found convenient. At the same time it was too harsh and peremp-tory for ordinary cases of vagrancy, and if the Act were repealed the Law Officers in Ireland should be consulted to see whether some available substitute could not be provided for the protection of farmers and the industrious classes in Ireland against this class of offenders.

COLONEL DUNNE thought that legislation of this kind was not conducted in a manner sufficiently careful—when it proposed to repeal existing Acts of Parliament they ought to be careful to have those Acts before them and know what they meant. It seemed absurd to him to talk of taking action against “Tories, Rapparees, and Robbers.” There are not in Ireland such things as “Tories.” He did not think that at this day there was such a thing as a Tory to be found even in that House. Originally, “Tories” were disbanded soldiers in Ireland, who lived a very irregular life, at least were said to do so by their enemies, and the name was finally given to the Royal party; just as the “Whigs” in Scotland did, who were opponents of the Government, and gave their names to the democratic party. Nothing but the fantastic name of the Bill—“Tories, Robbers, and Rapparees”—had called attention to it. The Bill seemed to be a remnant of the old penal laws, and as such objectionable; but as there were no other objects, it seemed now to have been exercised as a law against vagrants, and the case mentioned by the hon. Member, against a notorious and incorrigible thief. If it were necessary to deal with the subject of vagrancy let a proper Act be introduced upon the subject. He hoped that at a future stage of the Bill a further explanation of the objects of the Bill would be given to the House.

COLONEL FRENCH observed, that presentments to the grand jury under this Act were made, not in cases where the parties accused had merely threatened, but had actually committed, malicious injuries. If the Act was repealed, something should be done to suppress this class of offenders who were very common in the rural districts of Ireland.

MR. SCULLY said, he would not object to the second reading of the Bill; but it would require to be considerably altered in Committee. The Act of Anne being to continue only for seven years, had died a natural death; but a subsequent Act, which was not alluded to in this Bill, had set it on its legs again. The 6th of Anne was only one of the penal enactments affecting Ireland, each being more cruel than its predecessor. The same year, what was called the Registering Act was passed for the discovery of the estates of Papists and handing them over to the Protestants, or for the benefit of the Established Church. A great number of Irish gentlemen were in this way deprived of their estates. They were left without a shilling to live upon; and being much respected in their localities, and not able to get out of the country, they were obliged to go among their former tenants, getting from them what scanty subsistence they could. This was the origin of this Act of Anne—to extirpate “such as pretended to be Irish gentlemen.”

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed for Friday, 28th April.

METROPOLITAN HOUSELESS POOR BILL—[BILL 83.]—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Provisions of 27 & 28 Vict., c. 116. extended to Michaelmas and Lady Day next.)

MR. C. P. VILLIERS stated that the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil) had given notice of an important Amendment to this clause, and, as he was not present, he should move that the clause be in the meantime postponed.

Clause postponed.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clauses 3 and 5 agreed to.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS moved to insert after Clause 3 the following clause:—

“Any constable of the Metropolitan Police, or of the Police of the City of London, may personally conduct any destitute wayfarer, wanderer, or foundling, not having committed or being charged with any offence punishable by law within the knowledge of such constable, to any wards or other places of reception approved of by the Poor Law Board under the said Act or this Act; and every such wayfarer, wanderer, or foundling shall, if there be room in such wards or other places of reception, be temporarily relieved therein.”

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That this clause be added to the Bill.”
—(Mr. C. P. Villiers.)

MR. BROMLEY said, he should not object to the insertion of the right hon. Gentleman's clause if the following, of which he (Mr. Bromley) had given notice, was also added:—

“That, from the passing of this Act, every

Police Station within the Metropolitan district shall be constituted an office for the issuing of orders of admission for destitute persons requiring the same, into the casual ward of the workhouse of the district in which the said Police Station is situated."

He had only these objections to the new clause proposed by the right hon. Gentleman—first, that it was not imperative enough in requiring the police to interfere in the case of both vagrants and destitute persons; next, that in conveying the poor person to the workhouse or other place where relief was to be administered there would be an unnecessary loss of time by the police by which the public might suffer. He preferred the system now adopted in the Strand Union—namely, that of issuing at the Police Station tickets which the casual pauper took to the workhouse; and when a particular ward was full, the Inspector of Police was made acquainted with the fact, and any further applicants were sent to the relieving officer, who was bound to provide accommodation for them. He saw no reason why the clause of which he had given notice should not be appended, and if the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to admit it, he would not offer any opposition to the clause which the right hon. Gentleman had proposed.

Moved, "That those words be added to the clause."—(Mr. Bromley.)

MR. NEATE said, it was not clearly shown by the Bill whether, when the police officers took destitute persons to the relieving officer, they would certainly be relieved. There should be no doubt left on that point.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, that the clause which he had proposed would have the effect of giving the police full authority, after inquiry, to take any person in distress to an asylum provided for the relief of vagrants. The clause had been well considered, and he had communicated with the head of the police on the subject, and he considered the clause made ample provision for the objects in view. When a policeman conducted a vagrant to the workhouse the authorities of that establishment would have no power to refuse the destitute person admittance—it was imperative on them to admit him, because he had been brought there by the police. With respect to the doubt expressed by the hon. Member for Oxford, the words "other places of reception" made it clear that the workhouse authorities were under the obligation to relieve persons said to be destitute whether there was room in their wards or not, and they must either find room in the workhouse itself or provide it in some other place. With respect to the clause proposed by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Bromley), he had the authority of the Police Commissioners for saying that it was not really necessary. The Poor Law Guardians could now make all the arrangements requisite to carry out the objects of that clause, and the Guardians of the Strand Union had shown an instance of this. Sir Richard Mayne had given notice that he was perfectly ready to place constables at the disposal of each Board of Guardians as soon as they thought fit to avail themselves of their services. Those who would apply for relief would be examined and would then receive orders to be presented at the workhouse. In the case of the Strand Union, Sir Richard Mayne placed three constables at the disposal of the Guardians, and all the other authorities might make the same arrangements. There was, therefore, not the slightest necessity for legislation on this point. If it were compulsory to have three constables placed at every station for the relief of vagrants, it would entail a considerable expense, and render necessary an addition to the police force, and consequently to the police rates. The Boards of Guardians had, with one exception, professed themselves willing to provide all the necessary accommodation for vagrants, and the only reason why that accommodation was not more largely provided previously was, as the Guardians had stated, the temporary character of the Bill which was introduced last year. The Guardians were in doubt as to what their position would be after the 25th of March. In some places wards had been completed and ample provision made for the reception of vagrants in future. It must be remembered that the places where destitute persons went to be relieved were not the police stations, but the workhouses, and it would be much more convenient for destitute persons to go to the workhouses at once with a policeman than to go first to the police station and there obtain an order and afterwards have to travel to the relief ward. At the workhouses, too, persons were obliged to sit up all night in order to provide for the wants of the destitute persons who might be brought there by the police. As the clause proposed by the hon. Member was unnecessary, he recommended him not to press it.

MR. HENLEY desired to know how far it was necessary to have the proposed addition made to the clause; and also whether the right hon. Gentleman had added to the clause the words "destitute persons," which he (Mr. Henley) privately suggested to him; and for this reason the object of the Bill was to take care that persons destitute in the streets of London at night should not perish, and that any neglect that should occur might be readily traceable to the person really culpable. As the clause of the right hon. Gentleman was now drawn, the first inquiry must be whether the person found destitute was a wayfarer, a wanderer, or a foundling. Now, it would not be very easy in the case of a man sixty or seventy years of age destitute in the streets for the police to ascertain if he really were a foundling; and the proof of what was a wanderer might also be a matter of some difficulty. The next question was whether he was a wayfarer, and as to this there might be a difference of opinion. Now, if the man were not one of those three things no person would be to blame for not taking him to one of the places provided under the Bill, or for not receiving him when he was so taken. But if the right hon. Gentleman would consent to the introduction of the words "destitute persons" as he (Mr. Henley) had suggested, that would meet everything. He understood that the right hon. Gentleman was willing to make that alteration. He now wished to call the attention of the Committee to the places to which vagrants were taken, which was a matter of some consequence. A Return had been lately circulated giving a minute and particular description of the places provided by the different unions for their reception. In the main, the accommodation provided appeared to be sufficient and reasonable; but there were, he was bound to say, three strange exceptions to the rule, and he was rather astonished at their having escaped the lynx eye of the Poor Law Board. The exceptions to which he alluded were Paddington, Rotherhithe, and St. George's, Southwark. Paddington was one of those unions which generally provided the most liberal accommodation for the poor of any of the unions, and yet the accommodation they provided for the houseless poor appeared to have escaped the notice of the Poor Law Board, notwithstanding that their attention had been called by Mr. Farnall to the circumstance that upon one occasion one man more was received into the Paddington Union than the ward was calculated to accommodate. The accommodation in that union was about at the rate of 360 cubic feet for each poor person to be admitted, and therefore an additional person, being thirteen instead of twelve, would not be any great matter; but still attention had been directed to it by a note in Mr. Farnall's Report. In the two other unions, however, which he had mentioned, the provision was very much smaller. In Rotherhithe the area of accommodation was described in one of the wards as about 21 ft. 4 in. superficial measurement; the height about 7 ft. 6 in., and the authorities stated that it was capable of accommodating two persons. Now, let the Committee consider what that accommodation was. The table of the House was about 5 ft. 1 in. high; so that, under a place such as that, with their heads touching one wall and their feet another, two women were supposed to be accommodated, and the width they would have would be about, at the outside, somewhere between 1 ft. 9 in., or 1 ft. 10 in. each person. The women would have to double their legs up, like the unfortunate man Daley, who died, and where their knees would have to go did not appear. Taking the height, the cubical feet, therefore, for two women would be about 80 feet each in which to pass the night. That appeared to him to be a matter of great and serious consequence, because by law they were very rarely permitted to confine prisoners in less than between 600 and 700 cubic feet for each prisoner. The Rotherhithe accommodation, therefore, was, to say the least of it, very queer, especially when they considered that the tax was imposed upon the whole area of the metropolis, which was a very rich fund to draw from. He found by the Return that on the 24th January eleven women were accommodated in the different wards in Rotherhithe, with about 71 cubic feet for each person; so that these people had to lie in a space about 5 ft. 1 in. long, which was not certainly above the average height of a woman, and about 1 ft. 9 in. wide. That, he considered, was rather narrow, and closer than people were packed in an omnibus. They used to hear of fat and thin sixpennyworths in an omnibus, and it seemed to him that this accommodation was very insufficient. The area of the wards in St. George's, Southwark, was 178 ft. 6 in., the length about 8 ft. 6 in., giving 1,517 cubic feet for twenty women, or about 75 ft. for each woman. He, therefore, asked upon what grounds such a state of things could be justified. On one night he found that fifteen women slept in St. George's, and he should like the problem to be submitted by the Civil Service Commissioners. If fifteen women were lying down on this space of 35 ft. by 5 ft., and five more came in afterwards and laid down upon them, what time it would require for the additional five women to find their way to the ground—because the fifteen must have been touching each other before the other five were admitted. They must lie upon each other like candles in a shop window. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give the Committee some information—because it was useless to pass a measure of this kind unless there was some prospect that the poor persons who were taken to the unions would receive that provision which might save them from perishing from want. There was no information how these persons were treated. Whether they were stripped and had to lie naked in heaps, or how they were managed, but he thought it was very unlikely, except under extraordinary pressure, that any person would go to them a second time. The accommodation should be such that it could not fairly be complained of, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to assure the Committee there must be some mistake about the matter, and that it had been remedied. At all events, it disclosed a state of things which, to say the least of it, was not satisfactory.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he was quite willing to accept the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman to insert the words "other destitute persons" after the words "wayfarer, wanderer." With respect to the parishes which had been referred to, where it was considered adequate provision had not been made, he (Mr. C. P. Villiers) thought the figures in the Return were quite correct, and he was glad the subject had been introduced. He had observed the inadequacy of the provision made in these parishes when the Returns were published, and it was asked what power there was of compelling any parish to provide better accommodation. The answer was that those places which did not make sufficient provision would not be certified as having complied with the Act, and therefore would not be re-imbursed for any expenses incurred. There were three parishes that had not been certified in consequence of their not having made adequate provision for vagrants; and two of these were St. George's, Southwark, and Rotherhithe. The accommodation in some of these places was better than it was before. An imperfect attempt had been made to meet what was considered necessary, and it was thought by one parish that when all the other parishes were making enlarged provisions, that particular parish would not have so many applications from vagrants. There had not been any unwillingness on the part of any of the parishes to make ample provision. He (Mr. C. P. Villiers) believed that withholding the certificate would be the best means of securing the adequate accommodation. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) that the figures had not escaped his notice.

MR. HENLEY: If the right hon. Gentleman said that a place which gave seventy cubic feet for a human being to sleep in was better than under a former state of things before the passing of this Act, he thought it was not a revelation of a very creditable state of things. It was like putting two persons in one coffin to confine them to a space of seventy cubical feet. It was quite clear that poor people would die in the streets sooner than be confined in such places.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS: Before the passing of this Act, in many parishes there were no vagrant wards at all, and in some of the rich parishes boards were put up to say there was no admittance. As to the seventy cubic feet of space, there must be some mistake. At Rotherhithe the space was ninety feet, the height being seven feet six inches; in the other parishes it was 109. However, difficulties in the way of providing these refuges had now been removed.

Amendment (Mr. Bromley) withdrawn.

Clause amended by inserting the words "or other destitute person."—Mr. Henley.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, be added to the Bill."

MR. BROMLEY then formally moved his Amendment, stating that he had also been in communication with the police, who had stated to him that their decided opinion was that the clause of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. C. P. Villiers) was not stringent enough, and would be practically inefficient, and that it would not only entail a great loss of time on the constable, but also a great loss of protection to the public; that the system of issuing orders for relief by ticket was far better. He should not, however, feel justified in pressing his Amendment, but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would embody some portion of it in his clause.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, there was a clause of which the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil) had given notice, and to which there was no objection, and he (Mr. C. P. Villiers) would therefore move, in the noble Lord's absence, that the clause be added with an alteration rendered necessary by the Amendment which had just been made in the preceding clause. The clause would, therefore, run thus—

"The Guardians of every union or parish referred to in the said Act shall admit without delay, either to the workhouse or to the wards or places of reception provided under the said Act, every poor and other destitute person who shall apply to be admitted during the hours between six o'clock in the evening and eight in the morning in the months between October and March inclusive, and during the hours between eight o'clock in the evening and eight o'clock in the morning in the months between April and September inclusive, and who shall not have applied in the same parish during thirty days previously; and the Guardians shall cause to be furnished to every poor person so admitted such relief under such conditions as the Poor Law Board, under general order, shall direct."

MR. AYRTON rose to move an Amendment the effect of which would be to make the provisions of the Bill permanent. As long as the Bill was known to be temporary only, he did not believe that the different Boards of Guardians would take any trouble or care to go to the expense which would necessarily be caused by carrying out the provisions of the measure. No doubt the condition of many of the wards was unsatisfactory, but the object of the Bill would certainly not be thoroughly attained unless the Bill were made permanent. They must bear in mind, too, that the legislation of to-day would take some time before it would become known to the community at large. An interesting book had just been published, giving an account of the difficulties which a pauper encountered in his endeavour to find where he could be relieved. He was not aware whether the pauper died before he could ascertain what he wanted, but such a result was not unlikely to happen from the intricacies of the Poor Law administration extending over so vast an area. As long as the law remained in abeyance, it was to the interests of the guardians to invest the system of relief with as much mystification as possible, in order to avoid being overrun by paupers. By the Return laid upon the table of the House, which he could not regard as satisfactory, he found that the labour and relief in different unions were very varied. It was, therefore, exceedingly necessary that there should be uniformity of treatment, because there were a great many paupers who always took care to favour the workhouse where they could either get more or better food and less work. As a proof that this feeling existed very strongly among the lower stratum of society, he might instance the fact that, owing to the absence of work on the Sunday, the applications for relief were always greater on the Saturday night than on any night during the week. He believed that the people who were in a habit of writing to a great journal, complaining of the neglect which the poor experienced at the workhouses, generally did so without first making any inquiry. In support of this assertion, he would allude to a fact which had come under his personal observation. On his way to the House one evening he was asked for relief by a man who, in reply to his inquiries, told him he could not get admission to the workhouse as the ward was already full. He accompanied the man to the workhouse and not only found that the statement was incorrect, but that the man himself was a rank impostor. A person who had believed the man's story without inquiry would probably have written upon the subject to the influential paper to which he had alluded. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving to leave out all after "relief," and insert—

"Of destitute wayfarers, wanderers, and foundlings in the several unions and parishes referred to in the said Act, received and to be received from and after Lady Day, 1865."

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he did not in the least object to the Amendment, as it was in strict accordance with the recommendation of the Committee. It had always been intended to make the Bill permanent; but as the Bill had been introduced at the very end of the Session and was threatened with considerable opposition it was thought best not to make that proposition.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

THIRD READING.

Bill read 3<sup>a</sup> (according to order), with the Amendments.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, that if the Bill were passed in its present shape it might be attended with very injurious consequences. The case of a landowner who in opposing a Bill which affected his property was merely protecting his rights was very different from that of other opponents. Of course it was necessary that the person should be a bond fide landowner, and that his opposition should be bond fide; but if that were so, it was extremely hard that he should run the risk of being made liable to costs while merely attempting to defend his property. He begged, therefore, to move the introduction of a clause to this effect—that no opponent of a Bill which proposed to take away any portion of the property of such opponent should be liable to costs if he failed in his opposition to the Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was sure their Lordships would agree as to the propriety of introducing some such proviso as that proposed by the noble Duke; but his apprehension was that the words suggested would not meet the case of persons who, under the guise of landowners, were put forward by a rival Company to oppose a Bill in the most vexatious manner. He should therefore suggest that, instead of the noble Duke's clause, some such words as these be inserted—

“And that if such opposition has not been made bond fide by a landowner or landowners, then the promoters shall be entitled to recover from the opponents such portion of the costs as the Committee may think fit.”

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, he would readily adopt the words of the noble and learned Lord.

LORD HOUGHTON said that the Amendment suggested by the noble Duke and the noble and learned Lord was perfectly agreeable to his own views; but if the other House should object he would not bind himself to defend it to the extent of risking the loss of the Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR suggested the insertion of the following proviso:—

“Provided always that no landowner who bond fide opposes a Bill which proposes to take any portion of his property for the purposes of the Bill shall be liable to any costs in respect to his opposition to such Bill.”

Amendment agreed to.

WIMBLEDON COMMON BILL—(by Order.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

VISCOUNT BURY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that before the establishment of the National Rifle Association and the establishment of the Volunteers, Wimbledon Common was little better than an undrained swamp; it was not much frequented, and was in a very neglected state. After that time, Lord Spencer, who was the lord of the manor, having given leave to certain Rifle corps to erect butts upon the Common, and to the National Rifle Association to hold their annual meetings there, a great improvement was made in the condition of the Common. The inhabitants of the villas surrounding the Common viewed those meetings of the Volunteers as an encroachment upon their privacy, and at first offered considerable objections to their presence on the Common. But ultimately these objections were considerably weakened, as it was found that practically the presence of the Volunteers was rather advantageous than otherwise. The National Rifle Association laid out large sums for drainage and other improvements, so that the Common presented a far more agreeable aspect than it had ever done before. But the question as to the rights of the lord of the manor, and those of the people in the vicinity having been once raised, it was not easy to set it at rest. A deputation on the part of the inhabitants of Putney and Wimbledon waited upon Lord Spencer to represent to him the irregularities that were occasioned by the meetings of the Volunteers on the Common, in the shape of gipseys who assembled there, and conducted themselves in a manner detrimental to the morals and comfort of the residents of the neighbourhood. Lord Spencer evinced every disposition to discourage those practices, and requested a meeting of the inhabitants of the vicinity at Wimbledon on a certain day. A great number of persons thereupon attended, when Lord Spencer detailed to them an outline of his scheme in regard to the Common. The noble Lord proposed to dedicate a considerable portion of the Common to the use of the public, reserving to himself only the rights which he exercised over certain other parts of the land. The scheme of Lord Spencer received in the first instance the approval of the meeting; but it was subsequently found that great objections were entertained by many of the inhabitants of the vicinity to the way in which Lord Spencer proposed to manage the Common, and to the inclosure of it. Things were in this position when the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Doulton) moved for the appointment of a Committee to consider the question of the open spaces in the vicinity of the metropolis, and the second reading of the present Bill was postponed until that Committee should have had the opportunity of considering the whole subject. In consequence of the illness of the hon. Member for Lambeth, the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) presided over the Committee, and after hearing evidence for several days the Committee agreed to a Report which, in his opinion, the House would not be inclined on consideration to support, as it did not agree with the evidence, and recommended a scheme amounting to something very like confiscation; and it was in opposition to the opinion of that Committee that he now asked the House to read Lord Spencer's Bill a second time. The object of Lord Spencer was to divide Wimbledon Common, which comprised about 1,000 acres, into two parts. He proposed to surrender his rights of lord of the manor over 688 acres, reserving his rights only to two acres near the windmill in the centre of the Common and the remainder of the 1,000 acres. Lord Spencer proposed in respect to those 688 acres to make the necessary roads, to erect a post and rail fence for the purpose of preventing cattle from straying over the Common, and to prevent the commission of nuisances by tramps. That part of the scheme by which it was proposed to put up a fence had been objected to, and Lord Spencer, who wished to dedicate the Common to the public in the way most in accordance with public feeling, would not insist on the erection of a fence if the House thought it undesirable; but it was proposed to compensate the common rights, if any existed, on the part of the Common to be dedicated to the public. The inhabitants of Putney, Wimbledon, and Roehampton very much objected to the common rights being touched, probably because they were conscious that those rights, if examined into, would prove to have merged in Lord Spencer; but the noble Lord contended that the Common could not be fully dedicated to the public and given up to trustees until the common rights were swept away. Now came one of the points to which the opponents of the Bill greatly objected, and which Lord Spencer, with great liberality, was willing to waive. The cost of the improvements on the 688 acres, including draining and putting the Common into a satisfactory state, would amount to a considerable sum, and Lord Spencer, having given up rights of considerable value, could hardly be expected to put his hands further into his pocket and provide the money for those improvements. The noble Lord therefore suggested that the improvements in one part of the Common should be carried out by selling parcels of land in another part, over which he held equal rights. The portions he thus proposed to sell were marked blue, brown, and green upon the map now in the hands of many hon. Members. If the blue portion did not return a sufficient sum to defray the expenditure, then he proposed to sell the brown portion, and in the event of the sum realized being even then found deficient, then to resort to the sale of that portion marked green on the map. Now, those living in the vicinity of those particular lands made grave objections to this part of the proposal, believing that their property would be seriously damaged by the sale of those lands, and they had, on several occasions, declared their intention to raise the necessary funds for the improvements of the 688 acres by subscriptions amongst themselves, or by the levying of a local rate. Lord Spencer was quite willing to waive that part of his scheme, provided adequate means could be raised by subscriptions and a local rate; but it was by no means certain that those proposals of those persons could be effectually carried out; and therefore Lord Spencer insisted upon retaining the selling clauses of the Bill, with a proviso that they were only to operate after the lapse of a certain period, and in the event of the failure of adequate means from subscriptions and a local rate. There were other points of his scheme in respect to which Lord Spencer and some of the inhabitants were at issue; but it was likely that on consideration the opposition to those parts of the scheme would terminate. With regard to the management, it was originally proposed that Lord Spencer should be the sole manager. That, however, being objected to, Lord Spencer consented to waive his first proposal, and to vest the management—first in himself, as lord of the manor, and then with him in a Commissioner of the Crown lands, and one other person to be nominated by the Government. The inhabitants of Wimbledon, Putney, and Roehampton proposed, in addition to those trustees, three others representing the interests of the inhabitants of Wimbledon, Roehampton, and Putney—making altogether six trustees. Now, Lord Spencer objected to so many as six, believing that the three trustees he proposed would be much better able to manage the property in the interests of the public generally than a board of six gentlemen; he thought that by such an arrangement the board would be practically a local board, because the local trustees being always on the spot would probably always constitute a majority. It was, moreover, Lord Spencer's wish not to put the management into local hands, but to dedicate the Common to the public generally, and the noble Lord therefore objected to the change suggested by the inhabitants of the vicinity. There had been opposition shown by some of the inhabitants to the meetings of the National Rifle Association, and Lord Spencer, in a national point of view, thought it essential that the Volunteers should be allowed the use of the Common, and he did not wish to put it out of his power to allow them that use. Lord Spencer, as lord of the manor, was in as good position with regard to manorial property as any other lord of the manor. Indeed, the witnesses before the Committee on Open Spaces showed that, owing to the peculiar circumstances of Wimbledon Manor, Lord Spencer had rights greater than other lords of the manor. It was objected before the Committee that there was no evidence as to the court rolls before them, but it was impossible to produce them, and it was unnecessary to do so, because all that was necessary was for Lord Spencer to show that he prima facie possessed the rights he claimed, it being for the House to decide on the second reading whether or not those rights were good in law. If that evidence was worthless he was willing to throw it aside and treat it as a mere assertion; but then he asked that the same rule should be applied to the evidence on the other side, as all the witnesses who spoke as to custom admitted they had never had an opportunity of examining the court rolls. The lord of the manor was, however, willing to give up his legal rights provided this Bill was passed, and when the Bill got into Committee that question could be further inquired into and decided. The Committee appointed to inquire into Open Spaces around the metropolis had exceeded its duty in the Report it made. It should have simply been for or against the scheme, leaving it to the Committee of that House to deal with it in the ordinary way; but instead of that it adopted a Report which amounted, in fact, to confiscation. He congratulated those who appointed that Committee on the successful manner in which they got together a number of hon. Members who agreed with them in their views, and in this instance the Chairman of the Committee—a Chairman was generally an important person—the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) had made up his mind upon the question before he went into the Committee. ["Order!"] He begged pardon if he had said anything irregular to the House, and he would not allude further to it. The Committee, as he had already stated, reported what amounted to confiscation if supported by the House—namely, that Wimbledon should not be enclosed; and secondly, that there was no necessity for enclosing it. So far Lord Spencer was willing to amend his scheme; but as regarded his legal rights no Committee could deprive him of them. The Committee further reported that the Statute of Merton ought to be repealed—a step which certainly could not be determined upon except after considerable investigation and discussion relative to the legal rights enjoyed under that statute—whereas this Committee had reported adversely to the scheme and for the repeal of the Statute of Merton, after having had only three days' sitting. The opposition, he believed, principally came from the villa owners around the Common, who had no other rights than as a portion of the public. Now, Mr. Wingrove Cooke in his evidence stated that all the right which could by possibility accrue to the public in common was that in every case of inclosure a sufficient amount in proportion to the population should be reserved for the purposes of recreation. In the case of a Common with 10,000 inhabitants in its immediate vicinity, ten acres should be reserved, and so on in proportion. Now in proportion to the population of Wimbledon four acres only could be so claimed, consequently the villa owners in asserting their legal rights would only be entitled to four acres; whilst Lord Spencer, by this Bill, offered to give up his undisputed right of 688 acres for the recreation of the public. With regard to the commoners, Mr. Wingrove Cooke stated in his evidence that commoners were trespassers if they went there for any other purpose than looking after their stock. That was surely a matter of small money value, and might easily be arranged, especially as five to one of the commoners were in favour of the Bill. He asked the House, then, to read that Bill the second time. Lord Spencer had promised to submit the matter to the House and take their decision upon it, provided they did not attack his legal rights. But if they said that he had no legal rights to give, then the noble Lord must consider himself absolved from the promises he had made, and at liberty to act as he might be advised. But seeing that Lord Spencer was willing to give up to the public rights for which a large sum had already been offered—seeing that four or five railways and two or three hotels had been before Parliament during the last few Sessions, seeking for land in that locality, and seeing that it was very difficult for Lord Spencer to resist these claims, and that it might be impossible for him to resist them with effect for a length of time, he thought a case was made out for reading that Bill the second time; and he begged to move its second reading accordingly.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Viscount Bury.)

MR. COX, in moving that the Bill be read the second time that day six months, said, that the Committee on Open Spaces near the metropolis had gone fully and fairly into the subject referred to by the noble Lord (Viscount Bury), and had decided that it was not expedient that Wimbledon Common should be fenced round or inclosed. The noble Lord said that Lord Spencer would be willing to do away with the fence, but still he asked the House to read a second time a Bill which gave power to fence and inclose. Moreover, the Bill would extinguish the rights of common, and if those rights were put an end to, then the public would cease to have any right over the Common. He opposed that scheme, not in the interest of any villa owners, but in behalf of the three-and-a-half millions of persons living in the metropolis. Not a single witness came before the Committee who did not answer that from time immemorial the public had gone over that land when and where they liked, without interruption from anybody. The land was thereby brought within the description of a village green, and Mr. Wingrove Cooke did not deny that in that case it was out of the power of the lord of the manor to inclose or touch it. He asked the House, therefore, to support its own Committee, and reject the second reading of the Bill.

MR. DRAX, in seconding the Amendment, contended that Lord Spencer's rights were not so large as had been assumed. In 1860 that noble Lord attempted to inclose a portion of Wimbledon Common adjoining his (Mr. Drax's) property, and a fence six feet high was put up there. He brought an action against the noble Lord, which was to have been tried at Croydon Assizes; but after putting the trial off as long as he could the noble Lord at last allowed judgment to go against him by default, and the fence had to be pulled down again and the land thrown open to the public. That was conclusive proof that Lord Spencer and his tenants had no right to inclose without an Act of Parliament. He knew something of the rights of lords of the manor, and they were very trifling. Lord Spencer had been allowed to cut turf and sell it for his benefit and to the injury of the freeholders and copyholders. He had also sold sand and gravel; the only other right which a lord of the manor had was to timber, and of that there was very little on Wimbledon Common. Lord Spencer had not an inch of land on the Common.

Viscount Bury

He thought Sir Thomas Wilson had a greater right to inclose Hampstead Heath than Lord Spencer had to inclose Wimbledon Common.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Cox.)

MR. LOCKE said, that having been Chairman of the Committee referred to by the noble Lord (Viscount Bury), he thought it necessary to make one or two observations upon what had fallen from the noble Lord. He denied that he had given a partial judgment in this case. He had failed on this as on former occasions to understand exactly what it was the noble Lord meant. The noble Lord had appeared in the Committee with a large brief, and conducted the examination of the witnesses, prompted by Lord Spencer, very much as if he were Lord Spencer's counsel. Lord Spencer's solicitor gave to his (Mr. Locke's) mind the most ridiculous evidence with reference to Lord Spencer's rights, and in addition the Committee were asked to receive the opinions of counsel, without the cases being put in upon which those opinions were founded. The Committee offered to receive them, provided the cases were put in; but the noble Lord declined to do so, and the Committee declined to receive the opinion without the case. That was the course that had been pursued throughout. He was willing to have voted for the second reading of the Bill if he could have placed any reliance upon the noble Lord's (Viscount Bury's) statements; but having listened attentively to him, he was unable to discover that he pledged himself to anything. It was said that Lord Spencer was giving up a great deal, but after all the attention he had paid to the evidence he was unable to find it out; and he confessed that after applying his mind to the subject he honestly believed that Lord Spencer intended to retain those acres which the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins) pointed out, and what the noble Lord intended to do with them was best known to himself. The case had been mixed up from beginning to end in the most extraordinary and complicated manner, and no Member of the Committee could for five minutes together clearly see what the noble Lord intended to do. Lord

Spencer's solicitor, when he came to give his evidence, painted a lord of the manor such as a lord of the manor had never before been painted on the face of the earth. He was, according to that gentleman's evidence, the most powerful lord of the manor it was possible to conceive, for he was able to do anything and everything with everybody; and that if he was not allowed by Parliament to do what he liked, he could take the Common and act with it as he pleased. If the noble Lord was not prepared to abide by the Report of the Committee he should vote for the Amendment.

MR. LOWE said, he was afraid the House might be led unintentionally to do some injustice in this matter; he therefore begged their attention while he very briefly stated what he believed to be the facts of the case. Lord Spencer was the lord of the manor of Wimbledon, and the Common belonged to him in fee simple, subject to the rights of commoners, and subject to certain roads and rights of way. Wimbledon was resorted to by the public for purposes of amusement, but the lord of the manor could by his mere will exclude the public from it. In this position he offered to surrender the use of 688 acres of this valuable suburban land, of which he was the owner in fee simple, subject only to the rights he had described. He wished the subject should be inquired into by the Committee on Open Spaces. That Committee had inquired into it, and the Committee had decided by the casting vote of the Chairman—"No, no!"—that this Common should not be enclosed, and that the common rights ought not to be extinguished. Surely, when a gentleman came forward and offered to give up 688 acres of valuable land for the amusement of the public, it was for the House to inquire whether it was desirable that the offer should be accepted. Surely it should not be rejected without inquiry? The hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) said the Committee had reported on the case; but he had omitted to mention that they reported with reference to this particular case of Wimbledon Common that the Act of Merton, which had been in force for 630 years, should be repealed. That Act said that a lord of the manor might enclose, if he could do so without prejudice to the rights of commoners; and to punish Lord Spencer for offering 688 acres of his land for public amusement, the Committee proposed not only to repudiate the offer but to deprive him of the right he had of enclosing any part of the Common without prejudice to the commoners. He said that was not a question to be decided in that off-hand way. The Committee had exhibited much animus, and had decided by the casting vote of the Chairman that Wimbledon Common ought not to be enclosed; and he thought that if the House really wished to do justice in this matter they would send it to be inquired into by a Committee upstairs.

MR. ROEBUCK thought the House was at present incapable of giving any opinion on this matter. They were totally unfit to decide the question, and ought to send it to a proper tribunal. The noble Lord had unwisely entered into the matter of the Bill. They had nothing to do with it. In common sense and common decency they were bound to send it to the ordinary tribunal for such inquiries—a Select Committee. He knew nothing of Lord Spencer, but private rights could not be dealt with in an off-hand manner.

MR. LOCKE KING thought it was desirable, in the interests of the public, and of those residing in the neighbourhood, that the Bill should be read a second time. He was not willing to discuss the speech of the noble Lord (Viscount Bury), but he wished the House to bear in mind that several objectionable parts of the Bill had been withdrawn. The proposal to enclose a portion of the Common formed no longer a part of the scheme, and the power of selling the 300 acres only remained part of the Bill, upon the condition that the inhabitants were unable to raise sufficient funds for the contemplated improvements. It would be a great boon to the public to obtain something like 1,000 acres for ever; and if this Bill were not passed there was a possibility that future lords of the manor would deprive them of it. He thought the Bill should be read a second time, and sent to a Select Committee.

MR. PEACOCKE said, that having sat in the Committee upon this Bill, he had formed the highest opinion of the motives of Lord Spencer in bringing it forward, and fully believed Lord Spencer was convinced that he had a full and good title to the Common. At the same time, however, he thought the noble Lord had been badly advised. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), who was always prepared to give an ex cathedra opinion on any subject, appeared to entertain the opinion that Lord Spencer could deal with the Common precisely as he pleased; but he could tell the right hon. Gentleman that if he had known a little more of the case and had sat in the Committee, he would have found that the rights of Lord Spencer over the Common were very doubtful and questionable. If Lord Spencer were prepared to abandon the inclosure and the sale of the land, provided a rate could be raised for the object in view, he would advise the House to agree to the second reading of the Bill, and would earnestly entreat the hon. Member for Finsbury to withdraw his Amendment, because, if that were adopted, it would give to the country a false impression as to the feelings of the House on the subject. Every opportunity should be given for arriving at a fair and impartial conclusion on the matter.

LORD ELCHO supported the second reading of the Bill, and said he had been in communication with his noble Friend Lord Spencer on the subject, and he thought that very great injustice would be done to Lord Spencer, and to his motives if the Bill were rejected, and not brought under the consideration of a rightly constituted Committee. He had no interest in the scheme proposed by the Bill, and his evidence before the Committee would show that he was perfectly impartial. His own sympathy had always been in favour of keeping this and other commons uninclosed. The mere post and rail might not be much obstruction, but there was a strong feeling against inclosures. He was authorized by Lord Spencer distinctly to state that he was prepared to allow the Bill to go before a Committee on the clear understanding that he gave up all idea of inclosing the Common, and that he would postpone the operation of the sale clauses so as to give time to ascertain whether a rate would be raised. He would, therefore, join in asking the hon. Member for Finsbury to withdraw his Amendment and allow the Bill to be read a second time.

MR. ALDERMAN ROSE thought he was speaking for the majority of the Committee when he said they were not prepared to offer any opposition to the second reading of the Bill. He believed, when the Bill went before a Select Committee, there would be formed a very different impression of the motives or public spirit of the noble Lord who had brought the measure forward than was now entertained. He thought that the further the inquiry was pushed the more clearly it would appear that Lord Spencer was not giving up any rights for the benefit of the public; but that, on the contrary, under this Bill, he would obtain a right to 300 acres of the Common, of which at present he had no right to dispose. The rights which had been assumed were of a very questionable and doubtful character. Instead of the Report of the Committee being carried by the casting vote of the Chairman, as represented by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne, there were only four voted against it, all the other Members being in its favour. It was true that the casting vote of the Chairman was once taken, but it was only on a technical point.

MR. COWPER said, it was a good maxim that we should not look a gift horse in the mouth; but, in this instance, he thought the more the proffered gift was looked at the more valuable we would find it to be. He thought the House would make a great mistake if they did not allow the Bill to be read a second time. The object of that Bill was to secure to the public for ever the unrestricted use of Wimbledon Common. Whatever might be Lord Spencer's rights over the 688 acres offered to be given up to the public by the Bill, those rights had been freely given up. A combination might possibly hereafter be made between the lord of the manor and those having common rights, by which the public would be deprived of the use of the Common; but this Bill would prevent the possibility of that. There were details in the scheme which had met with great objection, and he thought that in the framing of the scheme Lord Spencer had not been well advised; but the objectionable parts of the original scheme had been withdrawn. The Committee had come, by a majority, to the conclusion that there were three objections to the scheme. The first was the proposal to place a fence round the Common; the second, the selling of land; and third, the extinction of common rights. The noble Lord who had moved the second reading of the Bill, and the hon. Member who had seconded the Motion, both said that Lord Spencer had agreed to withdraw his proposal for fencing the Common; and to abandon the power of selling land, if the necessary funds could be obtained, either by means of voluntary contributions, or by a rate levied upon the residents in the locality. They had been told that the residents were perfectly able and willing to provide the money, and they might, therefore, safely conclude that no sale would take place. The third point

SIR GEORGE BOWYER thought that the scheme embodied in the Bill ought not to be discussed or settled by a large popular Assembly, but that it ought to be referred to a Committee, for the purpose of being subjected to that research and legal acumen which were always necessary in cases involving questions of common rights and rights of lords of manors. It would, therefore, be very imprudent and injudicious on the part of the House were they to refuse their assent to the second reading in order that the Bill might be referred to a competent tribunal. The Committee had reported that the Statute of Merton ought to be repealed. Now he did not believe that there were ten Members of the House who had ever read that statute.

INDIA—THE BHOOTAN EXPEDITION.

QUESTION.

LORD DUNKELLIN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether the present invasion of Bhootan has been undertaken with the consent and sanction of the Home Government; whether it be true that two of Her Majesty's European Regiments have been ordered up to support the invading force; and whether it be the intention of the Indian Government to keep the Troops in the unhealthy country of Bhootan during the coming rainy season; and, if so, what, if any, arrangements have been made for putting them under cover?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, in reply, that when the failure of the mission that had been sent to Bhootan was known, three courses were suggested for the Government to follow. One was permanent occupation of the country; the second was a temporary occupation; and the third was to take possession of a small portion of the country, including the passes leading into the hills, through which the plundering bands came down into the plains. He was averse to a permanent occupation of the whole country, and equally so to a temporary occupation, because he did not see how it would be possible to withdraw when we had once taken possession, and therefore the Government of India and himself were of opinion that the third course he had mentioned was that which they ought to adopt. At the end of December all the passes had been occupied, and our loss, except by one unfortunate accident, had been only five men. We remained in peaceable possession until the end of January, when the Bhootanese assembled in great force and attacked our troops. He would not express any opinion upon what happened then, as it was a subject of pending inquiry, but the result had been that it had been thought desirable to send forward a regiment and a half of British troops. He could not say what arrangements had been made or would be made for ensuring protection against the effect of the weather, but in the last despatch he had received there was this statement, "We shall spare no pains to provide shelter for the troops and to secure their health as far as possible."

ENGLISH SUBJECTS IN CHINA.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to put a question to Mr. Attorney General, but in order to make it intelligible he would state the circumstances which had rendered it necessary. A mercantile house at Ningpo had long been in the habit of sending up the river a boat laden with dollars for the purchase of silk. During the occupancy of that region by the Taepings the boat had never been molested, but lately the boat was attacked and plundered by Europeans in the Imperial service. The men were traced—one to Shanghai and two to Hong Kong, where they were seized and committed to prison. Mr. Kent, the merchant, now informed his partner in this country that the Judge at Hong Kong had released the prisoners, upon the ground that there was no law to punish Europeans who committed crimes in the interior of China. He therefore wished to know from Mr. Attorney General, Whether it is true that the state of the Law is such that Europeans may with impunity commit robberies or murders in China?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, said, the only answer which he could give the hon. and gallant Member was, that under the present state of the law in China any European committing any act which would be a crime by the law of this country was amenable, if he could be caught and the facts proved against him, to the Consular authorities in China, and also to the Criminal Court at Hong Kong. The difficulty in the case which the hon. and gallant Member had referred to was, he supposed, that of getting up the evidence, and without any evidence there could not in China, as in this country, be any conviction.

SCOTLAND—PORT PATRICK HARBOUR.
QUESTION.

MR. TORRENS said, he rose to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the works at Port Patrick Harbour are still going on, or whether they are in abeyance; in the event of their being stopped, when it is intended to resume them, and when it is supposed they may be completed; and whether he will state what sum up to the present date has been expended on the Port Patrick Harbour works, and what further amount it is estimated may be incurred for their completion?

MR. MILNER GIBSON, in reply, said, the works at Port Patrick Harbour were going on, and it was believed that they would be completed by October next. It was believed also that steamers would be able to use the harbour. The sum expended up to the 1st of March last was £35,733. A further expenditure would be necessary to complete the works of £9,882, and in addition to that there was a claim made by a contractor which, though not admitted, might be the subject of litigation, and which might lead, if the decision were against the Government, to a further payment of £5,000 or £6,000.

COLONIAL BISHOPS.—QUESTION.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If the Government intend to take any steps to amend the Patents of the Colonial Bishops, defining their jurisdiction?

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that the Patents which had been issued by the Patent Office were now undergoing careful examination with a view of submitting a case for the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown. It was the intention of the Government most carefully to examine the late decision of the Privy Council before any further Patents were issued.

INDIA—THE PEGU PRIZE MONEY.
QUESTION.

MR. H. COLE said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, When the extraordinary delay in the distribution of the Pegu War Prize Money is likely to terminate, and why the Prize Rolls of the 51st Foot, which served in that war, have not been yet received at the Royal Hospital, Chelsea?

SIR CHARLES WOOD, in reply, said, the Prize Rolls for Her Majesty's 51st Foot had been sent to Chelsea Hospital for payment. The rolls of the 102nd late 1st Madras Fusiliers, had been received, and the prize money was now in distribution; the remaining Prize Rolls of the Madras portion of the force were expected shortly.

THE EPIDEMIC IN RUSSIA.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been directed to the disease now prevailing in Russia and some parts of Prussia; and whether the Government propose to take any steps to ascertain the true nature of the disease, and to avert its introduction into this country?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, the attention of the Government was directed to this subject by a statement which appeared in one of the daily papers on the 29th of March. Instructions were immediately sent by telegraph to Sir Andrew Buchanan, at St. Petersburg, to make without delay the fullest inquiries into the subject, and to send from time to time all the information he can obtain as to the origin, nature, and progress of the disease, and the mode of treatment of it at St. Petersburg. Instructions were also sent to Her Majesty's Representatives at Berlin, Vienna, Copenhagen, and Stockholm, and to our Consuls at the Baltic ports, to send full information as to the disease, should it appear in any of those parts of Europe. A medical officer has also been directed to proceed at once to St. Petersburg to investigate and report upon the disease, and the officers of Customs have been directed to exercise the utmost vigilance in the examination of vessels coming from the Baltic. The information we have as yet received has been by telegraph, but Sir Andrew Buchanan says that he has forwarded by post a printed medical report on the disease, which is stated to be a fever new in Russia, but not unknown in other parts of Europe, and that the mortality—which had been up to eighty per day—was said to be diminishing at St. Petersburg. Lord Napier states that the Minister of the Interior had told him that an unknown disorder had appeared along the valley of the Vistula, but that he was not aware that it came from Russia. The Consul at Dantzic, in a telegram dated to-day, says that a disorder prevalent in that district is a complaint of the brain, chiefly affecting children, but that it had no connection with the disease existing at St. Petersburg. The Consul at Warsaw, in a telegram also received to-day, says that some cases of typhus have occurred there, but no disease having the proportions of an epidemic disorder has up to the present time appeared in Poland. The Consul at Königsberg reports that no particular epidemic disorder exists there, and the Consul at Memel says that no symptoms of the disease have appeared in that district nor in the adjacent Russian provinces; and a telegram just received from the Consul at Stettin reports that no epidemic has exhibited itself there.

RENEWAL OF HOSTILITIES IN NEW ZEALAND.—QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Government have received any information of the renewal of the New Zealand War, and of a battle having taken place in which thirteen of our troops had been killed?

MR. CARDWELL replied, that the Government had not received any information of the sort. The only information which had reached them was the telegram which had appeared in the morning papers.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY (IRELAND) ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendment." — (Sir Robert Peel.)

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he wished to call the attention of the House to an important Amendment which had been made in this Bill by the House of Lords. According to the present state of the law in England, no railway company could be declared bankrupt, and no shareholder could be rendered liable for more than the unpaid amount of his shares. He believed that was also the law in Scotland. Up to the end of last year it was believed that the same law prevailed in Ireland; but it was discovered about that time by some ingenious gentleman that railway companies could be made bankrupt in Ireland, and the result was that one railway company had been made bankrupt. A doubt had also arisen as to whether shareholders in railways in Ireland could be rendered liable for more than the unpaid amount of their shares. Under these circumstances the present Bill, with the sanction of the Law Officers of the Crown, was introduced. It consisted of two clauses, the first of which prohibited any railway company in Ireland being made bankrupt; and the second prevented any shareholder being rendered liable for more than the unpaid amount of his shares. The Bill passed that House; but a Select Committee of the House of Lords, to whom the Bill was referred when it got there, struck out the second clause. When the Bill was returned to the House of Lords, a Motion was made to re-instate the clause, and was lost by a majority of three only. He considered it would be a most unfortunate proceeding if that House should agree to the Amendment of the House of Lords, as the result would be that the assets of the railway companies to be made bankrupt would be lost in litigation, and the shareholders would be harassed by legal proceedings. He moved that the House disagree with the Lords' Amendment.

MR. BAGWELL said, it was very desirable that the Attorney General for England should give his opinion upon this question, which had created a large amount of fear in Ireland, where railways were required, but where they would not be made if the law should continue to be that shareholders must be held to be liable beyond the amount of their shares.

COLONEL SYKES said, it was clear that there ought not to be one law for England and another for Ireland in this matter. He thought it desirable that the Government should declare its view on the subject.

COLONEL FRENCH said, that there ought to be some expression of opinion on this matter by the legal advisers of the Crown. Persons who bought shares in Irish railways certainly imagined that their liability was limited to the amount of their shares; but if these Amendments were agreed to no man would be secure.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER thought it a little extraordinary that when so important a legal question as this was being discussed the legal advisers of the Government were not present. He did not, however, think their advice very material, because in his view there could be no two opinions about the matter, for the simple reason that if the holders of Irish railway shares were made liable to the full extent of their property in case of the bankruptcy of the railway company, no one would hold shares in them, and thus railway enterprise in Ireland would be put an end to altogether. If such a question arose in respect to railways in England, the House would be up in arms, the Standing Orders would be suspended, and they would not separate until the matter had been placed on a proper footing. It would be an instance of inexcusable supineness on the part of the Government, if there was not an immediate expression of opinion on the question.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN thought that disagreeing with the Lords' Amendments would tend rather to complicate the question, because the settlement would be thrown over the Easter holidays, and before the House met more than one railway company in Ireland might be made bankrupt.

COLONEL GREVILLE said, that as the legal advisers of the Government were absent, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Board of Trade would give the House the benefit of his opinion. The right hon. Gentleman's name was on the back of the Bill.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that the question being somewhat of a legal character, he was not the proper authority, but as he had been appealed to he had no objection to give his opinion on it. As he understood, the shareholders in the Irish railways in question took their shares with limited liability, which was the undoubted law at the time they took them, and therefore they could not be called on for anything beyond the amount of the shares. That was the position in which they stood in 1857, when the Bankruptcy (Ireland) Act passed for the purpose of providing for the winding-up bankrupt companies. Railways were not excepted from that Act, and it had been held, from certain language in that Act, that the shareholders in any railway which might be made bankrupt could be called upon to contribute until the whole of the debts of a bankrupt railway were paid. He could not conceive it possible that any court of law would come to such a conclusion, or that an Act which was passed merely for the purpose of winding-up companies could alter the extent of liability falling on shareholders. All that it could do was to provide a mode of collecting the contributions which it was just that the shareholders should severally pay. The question was whether the House was to declare that it was not the intention of the Legislature, when it passed the Bankruptcy Act, to put an end to that limitation of liability which shareholders legally enjoyed by the constitution of their company, or to leave shareholders subject to the litigation that might arise in consequence of the ambiguous language of the Act. In his opinion it was but fair and reasonable to relieve the shareholders from the consequences of an ambiguity in that Act; for whatever might be said about injustice to creditors being inflicted by an ex post facto law, it must be recollected that the creditors acquired the rights they claimed by the operation of an ex post facto law—if the Act of 1857 had the effect which it was pretended; who ever heard of a general law directly taking away the private property of persons, or exposing to liability persons who never heard of it, who were never consulted, and who most certainly were not in the mind of the Legislature when the Act of 1857 was passed? It therefore appeared reasonable and just to re-insert the clause, and disagree with the Lords' Amendments.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he did not think any difficulty would arise from the delay in the Bill which would be caused by disagreeing with the Amendments.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment disagreed to.

Committee appointed, to draw up Reasons to be assigned to the Lords for disagreeing to the Amendment to which this House hath disagreed :—
—SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLIN, SIR ROBERT PEEL, MR. MILNER GIBSON, COLONEL FRENCH, and COLONEL GREVILLE :—To withdraw immediately; Three to be the quorum.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

THE STATE PAPERS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the publications entitled the State Papers and Hertslet's Commercial Treaties. He had taken the liberty last year of bringing the former publication under the notice of the House. The State Papers were issued every year, but sometimes they had been as much as twenty years in arrear, and the volume issued in 1864 was about twelve years in arrear. This publication was issued at the public expense, and was sold at such a price as put it quite beyond the reach of the great majority of the people. His hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had undertaken to get the price reduced, and, as he understood, also to look into the contents to see whether matters were not printed as State Papers which ought not to be put in that category. The hon. Gentleman had got the price reduced from 30s. to 10s.; but he did not think that the contents of the volume had received his attention. The book contained 1,400 pages of a most miscellaneous character, and he ventured to say that five-sixths of the contents were not State Papers at all. If he understood the meaning of the term, Correspondence laid on the table of that House, Acts of Parliament, and French Budgets twelve or fourteen years old, hardly came under the title of State Papers. One of the first matters in the volume for 1864 was "Austria — Correspondence about the Affairs of Italy, 1848." He then found under "Belgium" the law, modifying law of 1835, relative to Foreigners, 1841; Budget, 1852; Finance, Receipts, Dotations, Public Debt, &c. Under "France" — Correspondence relating to the Affairs of Italy, 1852. Next came "Germanic Confederation" — Correspondence about the Affairs of Italy, 1852. And then they had "Great Britain" — the whole of the Finance Accounts of 1853. The work also contained the correspondence of fourteen years ago relating to the Slave Trade, the French Budget of an equally ancient date, foreign Correspondence of 1852 relating to obscure British subjects, Correspondence on Italian affairs, Treaties made with Indian chiefs by the American Government, and so on. The House would agree with him that a great portion of the work was perfectly valueless, and ought never to have been printed at the public expense. He did not know whether the particular item for printing the work appeared in the Votes, but he was informed that it was included in the expenses of printing for that House under the head of Stationery Votes, instead of being placed under that of the Foreign Office, to which it properly belonged. The publication entitled Hertslet's Commercial Treaties was also edited by the Librarian to the Foreign Office, and he (Mr. Henry Seymour) was desirous of knowing whether that work was published at the public expense; and if not, what were the peculiar relations subsisting between the Foreign Office and their Librarian with regard to work, of which thirteen tons lay at the Stationery Office unsold. In his opinion this book ought not to be printed at the expense of the nation. He begged to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Layard), as an administrative reformer, to the fact that by eliminating such items from the Stationery Votes a considerable reduction might easily be made under that head.

MR. LAYARD said, the two works were entirely distinct, the State Papers being compiled by the librarian to the Foreign Office, and printed at the public expense, while Hertslet's Commercial Treaties was a purely private work, the Government merely taking a certain number of copies for the use of the public offices and foreign missions. He entirely differed from the hon. Member as to the value of the State Papers, although he agreed with him in his expression of regret that they were so far in arrear. Mr. Hertslet, with whom he had communicated on this subject, was not responsible for this delay, and was anxious to exert himself to the best of his ability for the public service. He intended for the future to publish three instead of two volumes a year; so that by 1870 the arrears would be cleared up. The work was in his (Mr. Layard's) opinion most valuable, and he was in the habit of constantly referring to and quoting the volumes, which contained résumés of British and foreign treaties and digests of the most important public documents published in this country and elsewhere. Mr. Hertslet had just completed a very important addition to the work—namely, a double index—an index of subject and an index of date—which would be of the greatest service to those having the conduct of public affairs. The price at which the work was sold had been reduced from 30s. to 10s. per volume, which did little more than repay the cost of its production, and was very little for a volume of 1,400 pages. However, Mr. Hertslet thought he should be able still further to reduce the price.

MR. WHITE quite agreed with the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Henry Seymour) with regard to our State Papers, and their almost absolute worthlessness for practical purposes, and instanced the fact that in 1863 he found the Danish Succession Treaty of 1852 had not then been published in that collection, and he had been compelled to refer for it to the Austrian State Papers, which were brought down eleven years later than those printed by our Foreign Office. The work whose merits, or rather demerits, they were discussing, did not contain many important State documents, whilst it was stuffed with details of palavers and agreements in reference to the slave trade, made ten years previously with certain illustrious personages, such as King Will, Sam Tory, Black Foobra, Old Jack Brown, and other petty chiefs on the West Coast of Africa; not one of whom was able to write his own name. His experience had taught him that for special treaties made by Great Britain, it would be a waste of time to expect to find them in our own State Papers, and he habitually referred for such documents either to Martens' Recueil, published at Gottingen—a German work of deservedly high reputation, or to the Archives Diplomatiques—an admirable French periodical which furnishes, by authority, the very latest information with respect to all international treaties, conventions, or correspondence. He hoped the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs would impress on the librarian of his office the necessity of making a better selection of documents, and of publishing them within a shorter period of their dates than twelve or fourteen years. Such an extraordinary delay justified the suspicion that the Foreign Office did not desire to furnish that full and complete information upon State affairs to which the House and the public were entitled. Seeing how closely the financial condition and well-being of the country were bound up with our Foreign policy, the amplest information ought to be placed within the reach of every hon. Member who desired to make himself acquainted with our treaty obligations; and it was a reproach to our Foreign Office that such knowledge was not

OFFICERS SERVING IN INDIA.

QUESTION.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether it is necessary to retain the present Regulation by which Officers serving in India forfeit their Indian allowance if they quit Asia and come to Europe while they are on furlough of six months; and whether he will direct that where non-commissioned officers of regiments in India are sent home on the completion of their first period of service, and others are appointed in their places, the acting non-commissioned officers shall receive the rates of pay due to the rank they filled from the date of their appointment, without waiting until the discharge of the men in England is notified? Although the Regulation mentioned in his first Question might have been a proper one when the journey from India to this country occupied six months, he did not think that it was reasonable to retain it now that the transit could be made in five weeks, so that an officer having six months leave might come home and spend three or four months of it with his family. At least the Commander-in-Chief in India ought to have power to permit officers to come home if he thought proper. The subject to which his second Question referred was a mere matter of justice. He had received a letter from an officer commanding a regiment in India, who informed him that he had under his orders ten acting sergeants and corporals who would not receive the pay belonging to their respective ranks until the discharge of the non-commissioned officers whom they had succeeded had been sent to India. He thought that this was very unfair, and hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would promise that the system should be changed.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that Indian pay and allowances were given to officers in consideration of the danger which they incurred and the hardships which they suffered while serving in India, and he did not think that it would be fair that the India revenue should be charged with extra pay for a gentleman who was amusing himself in London. As to the second Question of the hon. Baronet, the regulations in force in India were the same as those which were observed in this country, and he saw no reason for altering them. The result of the change suggested by the hon. Baronet would be to create a double establishment of non-commissioned officers when only one was required for the performance of the duty.

DEFENCES OF CANADA.

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

MR. HALIBURTON said, he rose to appeal to the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) to postpone the Motion upon this subject of which he had given notice. A deputation from Canada was at present on its way to this country, and probably one of the objects of its visit was to make some arrangements with reference to this very question.

LORD ELCHO, in rising to move an Address for Copy of Papers and Extracts of Correspondence relative to the proposed Canadian Defences and the share of the total cost which is to be respectively borne by Canada and the United Kingdom, said, that the very reasons which had been assigned by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Launceston (Mr. Haliburton) for asking him to postpone the Motion were those which had induced him to bring it forward. In doing so, he felt that some apology was necessary for again bringing the subject of the defence of Canada before the House. In what he was about to say he should be careful not to infringe those rules which had been wisely drawn up for the guidance of Members in debate, and would not quote from, or refer to, the speeches which were made in a previous discussion upon this subject, nor should he question the policy of the Vote to which the House came upon that occasion. He then voted in the majority, and he only regretted that the amount granted was not larger; but he then voted, as he believed most of the majority did, under a false impression. His only reason for renewing the debate upon this subject was that since the last discussion circumstances had been made public which indicated the existence on the other side of the Atlantic of a state of things which not only justified but rendered absolutely necessary their reconsideration of this very grave question. From the first he had entertained a very strong opinion with reference to the policy which the Government were pursuing towards Canada; and he could not but think that of the two courses which had been presented to the House the true policy of this country was to be found rather in the path which had been marked out by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe)—although he was not disposed to go so far as that right hon. Gentleman—than in what he might call the trail of Colonel Jervois which was being followed by Her Majesty's Government. The opinion of the majority of that House had been clearly indicated by its vote, and he should not have again raised the question had it not been for the news which had recently been received from Canada. Without infringing the Rules of the House, he might say that the impression under which they voted the money for the fortification of Quebec was that the share which England was to pay and the part which Canada was expected to take in the defence of her own frontier had been definitively settled between the Governments of the two countries. He was, however, now in a position to show that those who voted under that impression voted under a very wrong impression—that so far from anything having been settled, everything was unsettled, that the whole question was the subject of negotiations between the two Governments, and that the deputation alluded to by the hon. Member for Launceston was now on its way to this country in order to endeavour to bring about some arrangement. The first hint of the existence of this difference of opinion between the Imperial Government and that of Canada he obtained immediately after the last division upon this subject. He repeated that it was the general impression of the House when it was asked to vote this money that everything had been settled, and that there was no difference of opinion. Immediately after the division, on his way home, he went into the reading room and happened to take up The Sun, and the first paragraph that caught his eye was a telegram to this effect—

“Quebec, March 10.

“The news that £50,000 has been recommended to be voted by the Imperial Parliament for the defences of Quebec has been very ill received here. Mr. J. A. Macdonald stated in the House that there must be a mistake in the figures, and that £500,000 doubtless is intended. Upon the hon. Mr. Moore inquiring of the Government if the fortifications recommended by Colonel Jervois to be built at a cost of £1,343,000 were to be erected, and what proportion of the cost would fall on Canada, Sir E. T. Tache replied that he hoped all necessary fortifications would be built; but as the matter was now the subject of negotiation between the Imperial Government and that of

That clearly pointed out that everything had not been so satisfactorily settled between the two Governments as the House had been led to believe. That telegram had been confirmed by detailed reports which had been received from Canada of what had taken place in the House of Assembly. He found that Mr. Macdonald, referring to what had been reported by telegram as having been said in the House of Lords by Earl De Grey, stated that the figures must have been intended to mean £300,000 or £500,000, instead of £30,000 or £50,000, and that negotiations were going on between the Provincial and the Imperial Governments. Now, as he had before observed, it appeared that there was no understanding between the two Governments, and he hoped the House would bear patiently with him while he read a few extracts from the Canadian papers which had an immediate bearing on the question at issue. The extracts which he was about to quote he had taken from the summary of the proceedings of the House of Assembly in the Toronto Weekly Globe, and from that journal he learnt that Mr. Galt, the Finance Minister, in moving a Vote of 1,000,000 dollars for defences, used the following words:—

"I may state that in the communications which have passed between the Government of Canada and the Imperial Government on the question of defence, the subject of what the colonies and the mother country should each do in this respect has been postponed. . . . Those points in reference to the general relations which the colonies should bear towards the mother country in the matter of defence have, owing to the anticipated delay (the Confederation) which may arise, assumed an appearance that requires the Government of this province to approach the Imperial Government in order to obtain a decision on this very important subject."

Then came a passage to the announcement made in which the attention of the House of Commons had not been invited during the discussions on the subject—for it appeared that after all this 1,000,000 dollars was to be raised on English credit. Mr. Galt added—

"Any expenditure which Canada may feel called upon to assume must be on the understanding that this will be sustained by the Imperial credit. . . . We have a right to ask that the credit of the country should be sustained by the Empire."

The House would now, perhaps, like to have some information on the same authority as to the opinion which prevailed in Canada in reference to the extent to which she ought to be defended, and the part the mother country was to take in that defence. Mr. Galt said—

"The Government feel that their responsibility extends much further than this Report of Colonel Jervois comprises. The responsibility rests on the Government of giving protection not to one part of the province or the other, but to every man in this country. It has been asked why no answer has been made to the Report. Answers have been made, and negotiations are going on, and it is because they are still going on that the Government are desirous of proceeding to England to press them to an issue. . . . The Government take this ground—that the expense should be assumed in part by the Imperial Government, and under an Imperial guarantee. I have no hesitation in saying that difficulties have arisen in obtaining that guarantee, and unless these difficulties are removed the Government are not prepared to say that this million of dollars will be expended on these works."

An hon. Member (Mr. Dorion) on hearing that statement made seemed to have been as much astonished as he was himself when he had read it and asked—

"Am I to understand that no part of this money will be expended until the Government mean again? Mr. Galt.—Certainly not."

But let the House mark what it was that they were called upon to do—

"The question of defence (said Mr. Galt) is not merely confined to the erection of certain works. That is only one means of defence. The great lakes will have to be defended. The defence of that portion of the country requires that gunboats should be placed on the lakes. Well, the province of Canada is not able, and cannot be expected, to place gunboats on those lakes. But the Empire is. All these points have to be met and considered with the Imperial Government. If for defence this country is to depend upon a petty Vote of £50,000 a year, then it may be better to adopt the words of one who is no longer among us, but who occupies a seat on the Bench, and say that the best armament for this country is no armament at all."

Now, he confessed that he, for one, was very much disposed to concur in that opinion. The extracts he might add, which he had just read, were taken from the papers of the 17th of March; but another mail had arrived last night, in which the subject was continued, and the authority which he was next about to quote was one he felt sure to which his right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Colonies would not object, for he quoted the same gentleman himself. He found that Mr. Rose—not the gallant Alderman opposite—in speaking of the Vote of 1,000,000 dollars, said—

sive works, but this—that the Government on going home can say the people of Canada are serious in this matter, and as an earnest of what they are prepared to do for defence they have armed us with authority at once to spend money for this object on condition that a correct understanding be come to with reference to the future entire system of defence, and that all those anterior misunderstandings which have existed between the two countries should be brought to an end. . . . They (the Imperial Government) should be told even more strongly than Colonel Jervois has told them, that danger is imminent, that the country is utterly defenceless, and that Canadians could not hold it twenty-four hours. They should, above all, be told that in case of war we shall need the whole strength and all the resources, not of Canada only, but of the whole Empire; and that these must be given ungrudgingly, as before; they should be asked at once to take care of the lakes, and to send a flotilla of the small class of gunboats that are now laid up useless at Portsmouth.”

Now, these extracts afforded, he thought, a sufficient justification for his having brought the subject before the House. He was of opinion that every step we took upon so grave a question—the gravest by far which had been brought under the consideration of Parliament in his time—should be taken only with the fullest information which we could procure, and that we should take care by no rash course of proceeding to enter into engagements with Canada which we might find it impossible to fulfil. And it would, perhaps, be well, seeing what was the state of feeling in Canada on the subject, to take into account what it was she had already done and was capable of doing. In a letter which had appeared the day before in The Times newspaper from “A Member of the Canadian Parliament,” the writer, in drawing a comparison between the relative resources of Canada and this country for the purposes of military defence, said—

“Within the last three years the Canadian Parliament has voted nearly 2,000,000 dollars for our defence, and some 20,000 volunteers have enrolled and organized themselves more or less effectively; that is to say, we have done as much relatively to our population and financial resources as you would in England if you had organized 240,000 volunteers and voted £20,000,000 sterling for military purposes.”

He went on to say—

“The extreme limit to which any one has ventured to go on this side of the Atlantic has been to propose an expenditure of 10,000,000 dollars on the organization of the militia, and even that only on the supposition that the Imperial Government would lend us the money at the lowest rate of interest at which they could obtain it themselves. And this is precisely equivalent on our part to your undertaking to organize 1,200,000 men, and to expend £100,000,000 sterling of money. It is by no means improbable that some such proposition may be made before this communication reaches you. Will the people of England permit their Government to lend us the requisite funds?—will they undertake to provide a flotilla, and to build the fortifications deemed necessary, whether they cost £1,000,000 or £2,000,000 sterling?”

It was, in his opinion, most desirable that we should come to a distinct understanding with Canada as to what England could and could not do in reference to the present question. The course which he thought we should take was to say that so long as Canada stood by England, England would stand by her, but that we were not prepared to attempt to do that which was not possible. We should deal with the question, bearing in mind what could be done, taking into account the resources at our command and also what was politic in regard to Canada herself. Now, the question of what was possible turned so completely on military considerations that he, as a civilian, was not presumptuous or foolish enough to pronounce any opinion of his own on that point. He, therefore, looked to the opinions of military men, and he should, he confessed, be prepared to rest the point on the views to which an hon. and gallant relative of his (Major Anson) had a few evenings before given expression; for, though the hon. and gallant Gentleman did not belong to the scientific branch of the army, he would not, he felt sure, be deemed to be exceeding the bounds of what was right when he said that no man for his age had seen so much service, or had served with greater distinction in all parts of the world. The career of his hon. and gallant Friend begun in the Crimea; he then went to India, and from the first shot fired at Delhi to the last on the frontiers of Nepaul he had been in all the military operations in that country. Again in China he was one of the first to enter the Taku forts; and after his return from the East, he was for a time present with M'Clellan's army (so that he well knew what an American army was), and afterwards visited Canada, with the position of whose frontier he was well acquainted, so that he could speak of its capability for defence from personal knowledge. There were good grounds, then, for placing reliance on his opinion on such a subject as that before the House; but his hon. and gallant Friend, as well as himself, had since he made the speech to which he referred deemed it to be their duty, to collect upon the question the opinions of practical military men, and he would state without fear of contradiction that, going beyond the narrow circle of official military authority, for every one such man who would say that it was possible to defend Canada there were ten who maintained that she could not be defended. His hon. and gallant Friend had written for the best practical military opinion in the country, and the substance of the reply he received was that Canada in a military point of view and in the sense pointed out by Colonel Jervois, and adopted by the Government, was utterly and entirely indefensible. But this question of the defence of Canada was not so much a military question as one of common sense. There was an instinct which told every one that such a country as Canada, with a population of 2,500,000 persons and an extended frontier could not be defended by England, which was 4,000 miles distant, against America, furnished with all the munitions and requisites for war, and also with railways capable of transporting at any moment those munitions to the Canadian frontier. Not even with the assistance of England was it possible for Canada to defend herself against America. That appeared to him to be a self-evident proposition, and one more of common sense than of military science. What was the opinion of persons on the Continent looking dispassionately at this question? A letter from the Paris correspondent of The Morning Post—a journal said to be in the especial confidence of the noble Lord at the head of the Government—appeared in that newspaper on the 27th of March, and the following was an extract from it:—

“The discussion which is taking place in the British House of Commons concerning the defence of Canada attracts much interest and suggests a considerable amount of speculation on this side of the water. The conviction here is that Great Britain cannot hold Canada; and to throw up defences is an invitation, some urge, to war. Are these observations worth the consideration of Her Majesty's Government.”

He did not know whether they were worth the consideration of the Government, but he thought that the House of Commons, instead of indulging in buncombe and “tall talk,” which deceived nobody—not even themselves—and least of all those whom it was intended to deceive, the Americans, who were masters of that sort of language. Instead of indulging in bombast they should look the question in the face and say what they meant and would do in this matter. After conversing with military men on the subject he found their opinion to be that the utmost it was wise or politic for England to do was to defend Quebec and Halifax, especially the latter. In their opinion Halifax ought to be made impregnable—our Gibraltar in that part. This it was possible for England to do; and it was very evident what England could not do. He did not think England could or should enter into any engagement to furnish by her credit or give herself to an unlimited extent her money for the erection of defences at Montreal, Kingston, and along that line, which he believed would be perfectly useless. He believed that England would not send an army of 30,000 soldiers to man those defences; and England would not and could not compete with America in the construction of gunboats on the Lakes. He had spoken of what he believed to be possible, and he would now say what he thought politic. He thought that in the interests of Canada it was not wise for that country to burden herself with debt to erect fortifications which it would be difficult, if not impossible to defend, and to make that country a hopeless battlefield in the event of a war with America. They had always been taught to consider that the greatest misfortune which could befall a country was to be made the seat of war, and he believed that all that these defences would do would be to bring down in an aggravated form on Canada, in the event of a contest with America, all the horrors which accompanied war. In the interests of Canada, therefore, he asked the Government to re-consider the policy they were disposed to pursue with respect to Canada. His impression was that the wise policy for Canada to pursue would be, instead of building these useless forts and encumbering herself with debt, to endeavour by freedom from debt, and by every attraction which could be held out to settlers, to increase her population, so that the rich wastes in her territory might be occupied. That was a policy which England ought to encourage. Having stated what he believed to be possible and politic with respect to Canada, he would now say a word on the question which had often been raised in the course of these discussions, and that was the point of honour. He denied the right of those who took a different view from himself on this question to assume that they had a monopoly of proper national feeling and pride in respect to it. He believed that the course he suggested was strictly consistent with national honour; and far from deserting Canada, he accepted the dictum of the right hon. Secretary for the Colonies that war with Canada was war with England. He did not suggest that England should desert Canada, but this country should pursue the policy which she adopted with respect to Turkey and the Danubian Provinces. What was that policy? The Danubian Provinces lay between a great military Empire and a river, the possession of which that Empire was anxious to obtain for the purpose of its commerce. The provinces were defenceless, and on more than one occasion Russian armies had crossed the Pruth and occupied them. The Russian hordes were swept back again; but was that result produced by war carried on in the Provinces? No, but by a totally different means; by war made upon Russia in a different quarter. It might be said that England had the advantage of attacking a vital point to Russia at Sebastopol, and that a similar vital point was not to be found in America. The basis of all reasoning on this subject rested on our having the supremacy of the sea—for if we had not that supremacy of what use were our fortifications? But if we had the supremacy at sea we could inflict immense damage on America. That was the only way in which England could deal an effective blow at America. It appeared to him that to make Canada the battlefield in a war with America would be similar to a man engaged in a duel taking up a position so that his eyes faced the sun. He only hoped that in bringing that subject before the House he had not exceeded the legitimate bounds of debate. He believed the facts he had adduced would show that there were some grounds for asking the House to re-consider that question, for it stood, he maintained, in a totally different position from that which they had been led to suppose it occupied. He knew not what the result of these discussions or of the negotiations pending between the Canadian and the Imperial Governments might be, but for his own part he never should regret having raised his voice against a policy, which, if not tested by war, might doubtless prove successful, but which if tested by war would, he firmly believed, prove fatal to this country. He should ever rejoice that, however feebly, he had raised his voice against a policy which might be preparing in Canada the grave either of the honour or the power of England.

VOL. CLXXVIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

Motion, said, that he had been unable to give his vote on the late occasion when the fortifications for Canada were discussed in that House. He had felt that to oppose the Vote then proposed by the Government might have seemed indicative of that which he would be the last to entertain—namely, a wish to desert Canada should she unfortunately be engaged in hostilities with the United States. On the other hand, he had felt that if he had supported the Motion he should have given his vote in favour of a system of defence which he believed to be indefensible and not calculated to afford that support to those Provinces which it was, he was sure, the desire of all classes in this country to afford them. Having had the advantage of travelling in Canada and serving in those seas, his attention had been in some degree turned to these matters; and having formed some plan in his own mind as to how Canada should be defended in the event of hostilities, he had thought it would not have been dealing fairly with the House to have given a vote in favour of a policy which in his conscience he disapproved. He must bear testimony to his entire concurrence in the views so ably stated by the gallant Member for Lichfield on the previous discussion. Canada had for the greater part of its frontier a series of lakes, two-thirds the size of the Mediterranean. The upper lakes above Niagara were cut off entirely from Lake Ontario and the River St. Lawrence, and Lakes Huron, Michigan, Erie, and Superior, were entirely commanded by the American navy or the mercantile marine which had Chicago for its headquarters. The Western Provinces of Canada were, at present, utterly indefensible, because it would be impossible, even if England were inclined to do so, to place a naval force on these Upper Lakes in good time, by reason of the physical obstructions which would prevent her sending vessels to occupy them. The forces of America, assembling at Chicago, could advance upon Western Canada and landing at Collingwood, in Georgian Bay, could turn all our defences; and it would be impossible either in a naval or military point of view to defend those Western Provinces against any forces which might attack them either from Detroit or from the shore of Lake Erie. The only portion of the frontier which it might be possible to defend was the eastern portion—namely, Mon-

were, however, strong reasons for anticipating that if the question were formally submitted to the people of Canada—if it were fully discussed and deliberated upon by them—they might come to the conclusion that the most prudent course would be to decline the plausible, but dangerous aid offered them by the mother country. It was possible, in the first place, that they would not believe in the likelihood of any war with their American neighbours. They had shown what to us seemed a surprising apathy on this point. Our Government and press during the last three years had been doing their utmost to awaken them to a sense of their danger; but it was only after bullying them and pushing them that they could be induced to arouse themselves to even a moment's alarm. A slight and short panic had no doubt seized them last January; but the circumstances had already passed away which led to that transient feeling of alarm, and symptoms were already visible of their relapsing into their former state of confident repose. Now, should that be their feeling—be it or be it not a well-grounded one—in that case it would naturally strike them that if there really were no great risk of war, then it would be folly for them to lavish, in warding off an imaginary danger, that capital which was so urgently needed for the development of their great natural resources—for railways, for canals, for roads, for bridges, for harbours, and a thousand other enterprizes for which a country like Canada would be ripe could the means only be forthcoming. They would feel—they would justly feel—that for a young and growing country to have its savings buried in dykes and melted in guns, when every farthing was so pressingly needed, would be nothing less than a calamity. The increase of taxation would not only weigh down the springs of their commercial energy, but it would discourage immigration, it would tend to keep away from their shores that population who otherwise might seek a home in their boundless, fertile plains. But it might be said, what would be an outlay of a million and a half of money to a country with such prospects? Now, could any rational being suppose that if Canada were really to be put into a thorough state of self-defence against, perhaps, the greatest military and naval Power in the world, this could be done by an outlay of a million and a half? In fact, that was the bare estimate of the first outlay on the fortifications alone. Then they would have to arm them with costly ordnance, to maintain a large army to man them, there must be barracks and bomb-proofs, besides vast preparations for warfare on the lakes as well, including especially an enlargement of the Rideaux Canal. It was impossible not to perceive that the outlay of this sum upon fortifications involved the expenditure of at least another million and a half in general military appliances. The Canadians would surely shrink exceedingly from their share of this outlay, unless they were under strong and serious apprehension of the approach of war. But let them take the other supposition—let it be granted that they would regard it as probable that war might arise between England and the United States. Perhaps they would take this view; in fact, though he himself was persuaded that there was no valid ground for panic, it would be reasonable to regard it, not, indeed, as probable, but yet as more than possible, that such a war might arise; for, whatever theoretical arguments might seem to prove that the Americans would never fly to arms if they could possibly avoid it, actual experience had shown, and that not once, but on three mighty occasions, with what fiery impetuosity that proud and gallant people would fly to arms, with a reckless disregard of the calamities that might befall them. Ninety years ago they plunged into the War of Independence. Fifty years ago they plunged into a second war with this country when she was in the pride of her power, and they actually had only four frigates and six sloops of war. Again, within the last five years we had seen how eagerly they rushed into a tremendous civil contest, from which, in the opinion of most bystanders, it would have been honourable as well as prudent to abstain. Remembering all this, the Canadians might, perhaps, contemplate the contingency of a war between England and the Federal States. But even in that case it would not follow that they should think it desirable that a detachment of the British army should be quartered within their borders. On the contrary, the Canadians might reasonably conceive that the presence of some 10,000, or even 20,000 British troops in Canada, so far from securing her from attack, would inevitably act as the most powerful inducement that could possibly be held out to the enemy to pour his armies into that province, in hopes of inflicting disaster and disgrace upon England at the one vulnerable point so luckily presented to them. They all knew well what a vain, proud, self-confident people our American brethren are. In all likelihood the result of the dreadful war in which they were now engaged would be such as to leave them in a state of the highest elation, fully believing, and not without some reason, that their country had become the mightiest military and naval Power in the world. The Canadians would surely feel that to the Americans thus inflamed and exultant not a shadow of doubt would suggest itself that if they poured into Canada with, perhaps, 200,000 or 300,000 men and an unparalleled artillery they would sweep all before them, and that the little British army would fall into their hands as a glorious prize. The Americans would assuredly be fired by what would seem to them the sure and certain prospect of such a triumph. Surely it stood to common sense that a little British army stationed there, 3,000 miles away from its base, would seem a glittering bait to American ambition. So far from terrifying their powerful neighbours, this mere handful of men would rouse all their energies, would kindle their courage, would fill them—

“With that stern joy that warriors feel
“In foemen worthy of their steel.”

In fact, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Ad-derley) said the other day, our keeping these troops in Canada was like waving a red flag in the face of an enraged bull. The right hon. Gentleman concluded thence that we ought to protect them by fortifications; and he (Mr. Buxton) cordially agreed that if the troops were to be retained there, then the fortification scheme was inevitable; but could the Canadians or any one else suppose that the Americans would be restrained by a few forts on Point Levi or elsewhere from making an ugly rush at the red flag thus waved before them? On the contrary, they would probably consider that the fortifications would also fall into their hands, and thus only add to the splendour of their success. They had shown again and again in the course of the present civil war how little they would shrink from the most lavish expenditure of life in assailing fortifications, and how little fortifications would withstand them. The Canadians, then, might very likely come to the conclusion that the presence of our troops would inevitably cause their provinces to become the theatre of war, should hostilities break out—and this, too, a war which might last for years and years, and fill their now happy country with ravage and ruin. He believed the Canadians would feel all this very strongly. But then the question naturally suggested itself whether, even if we had no troops or forts to tempt attack, still the Americans would not invade Canada in order to annex that country to their own. Now, he felt sure that those who were most intimate with the feelings of the Americans would tell them that it was no longer any part of their policy to annex Canada by violence. Some years ago they were eager to induce those Provinces to join them; but he did not believe that they had any ambition to subjugate the Canadians and to compel them into union by force of arms. The war they were now waging was no precedent that way. It was not waged for the conquest of a foreign land, but for the maintenance of the unity of their own country. Surely, too, the work they would have for many and many years in keeping on the shoulders of the South a yoke forced upon them at the point of the sword would render it absolutely impossible for them to attempt at the same time to seize and hold a vast country containing 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 inhabitants, who would regard their dominion with ineffable hatred. But suppose for a moment that they should resolve on such an outrageous and preposterous enterprize as that of the conquest of Canada—in such a case would this fortification scheme be of the least shadow of avail to stop them? Why, of course, as the hon. Member for Launceston (Mr. Haliburton) said the other day, their main object would not be to seize the rugged and comparatively valueless province of Lower Canada; their aim would be to seize the fertile and prosperous plains of Upper Canada, to annex the territory adjoining their own along the line of the Lakes. Our defences of Quebec and of Montreal, therefore, would have no effect in resisting such an enterprize as that. No one proposed that Kingston and Toronto should be defended by our troops, but only by the Canadian militia. Would any one venture in that House to say that if the Americans concentrated an army of, perhaps, 200,000 or 300,000 men at the western corner of Lake Ontario and invested Toronto by land, while innumerable gunboats, brought in pieces by the railways, assailed it from the water, that town could possibly hold out against them?

Would not the same fate inevitably befall Kingston? Would not our having induced or rather compelled the Canadians to fortify those towns simply be an attraction to the Americans to attack them, and be a help to the Americans in afterwards holding them, should we endeavour afterwards to drive them out? This supposed attempt at annexation would not be delayed even for a week by our having persuaded the Canadians to fortify their principal towns. Considering all these points, his conviction was that if the question were deliberately submitted to the Canadians, whether they wished to retain our troops among them with the inevitable corollary of the fortification scheme, they would probably come to the conclusion that it would only aggravate their danger and tend to involve their country in all the horrors of war. He thought they would probably hold that we could far more effectually aid them by a direct assault upon the enemy, and especially by aiding an uprising of the South. At any rate, it seemed to him that the Canadians had a right to be consulted, and to let their voice be decisive on this question. They were not children to be dandled and done for by the mother country; they ought to be allowed to deliberate and decide for themselves; and if their conclusion should be the one which he anticipated, he was sure that in that case every sensible man would think that we might heartily congratulate ourselves on having got, with perfect honour, out of a very embarrassing position.

COLONEL SYKES said, that half a century's military experience had given him some ideas on military matters, though they might not be worth much. He had asked himself three questions on this subject of the defences of Canada. The first question was whether it was possible to defend a country like Canada, which was larger than Europe, and possessed a frontier of 1,500 miles, had an overwhelmingly powerful neighbour, and was far distant from this country. The second question was, whether it was politic to defend Canada. And the third, whether we should be justified, so far as the interests of the great mass of the people of this country were concerned, in involving them and their children in prospective responsibilities, which must greatly enhance the burdens this country has to bear. With regard to the first question, there was no doubt in his mind that the country which had not within itself a sufficient military force to meet an enemy who would enter it at any point along a line of 1,500 miles, could not be successfully defended. Was it possible that Canada, with every assistance we could render her, could raise a force to withstand 100,000 men, which would be the smallest number that America would send over the frontier? Could the Canadians keep the field against such a force? Certainly not. Then they would have to fall back upon those fortifications named in the Report from Colonel Jervois. All experience and military history taught us that if a country could not keep the open field against an enemy it could not hold its own in a fortress. Engineers informed us that a fortress could be reduced, with a garrison inferior to the besiegers, within a certain number, not of months, but of weeks even. Was it rational, therefore, with the prospects which we had before us of the military aid which Canada could give, to attempt to defend that country? Was it politic to pretend to defend it by laying out £50,000, for fortifications? That sum would do very little for providing adequate fortresses, even were £150,000 added to it next year. Was it creditable that we should expose our troops in such a position as they would be placed in should a war break out? They would inevitably be shut up in a fortress and be obliged finally to retire down the St. Lawrence and return to England. Then, in respect to the second question, admitting that we could not defend Canada, was it politic to show the Americans that we distrusted them by offering menaces such as had been used in the debate? He believed there could be no wisdom in such a course of proceeding. As to the third question, what would the consequences, in a financial point of view, be of a war with America in the defence of Canada? Colonel Jervois, in his Report, stated—

“That efficient communication should be established with the western districts; that the country between Lake St. Louis and Lake Ontario should be protected by naval in combination with military means; that a naval depot should be provided at Kingston, which place should be fortified so as to form a secure harbour for gunboats on Lake Ontario. With the naval command of that lake troops acting for the defence of the western peninsula of Canada might be maintained, fall back upon its shore at T. were constructed, with the naval fortification, either until

The whole programme resolved itself into a succession of "ifs,"—a mere myth. As to the question of costs, Colonel Jervois said—

"I regard the works for the defence of Montreal and Quebec as being of the most pressing importance. I estimate the cost of those for Quebec at £200,000; those for Montreal at £443,000; and that the armaments for the works at those places will cost about £100,000. The works of fortification recommended at Kingston, Toronto, and Hamilton will cost about £500,000, and the armaments for those places about £100,000."

But this outlay would only initiate the great scheme, and it must be admitted that there would not be afforded by the plan proposed anything like a sufficient defence of the country. Why, then, spend the money and run the risk of being beaten and degraded in the eyes of the world? Why not retire from Canada while we could do so with honour? As long as we had fortifications in Canada and kept adding to them and maintained troops there, the Canadians as well as ourselves would be constantly apprehending imminent war with America. If we withdrew our troops and reposed confidence in the American people and in the Government of the United States, there was not much probability in the present and prospective condition of the Federals that they would desire to acquire Canada. We can now retire with honour, and leave the Canadian people to make their own arrangements. Supposing we undertook the defence of Canada, which it has been said we were bound to do, the financial condition of that country was such that she could give us very little assistance. Those gentlemen who read The Times newspaper would learn that Canada had no less than five loans open in England, three at 6 per cent, and two at 5 per cent, the stock of every one of which was at a discount, the 5 per cents as low as 82 to 84. Canada was obliged to levy a heavy tariff against England on account of the depression in her finances, not in a hostile spirit, but really from want of money. What, then, was the likelihood of Canada being able to raise and pay a force commensurate with the necessities of a war with America, and what would be our responsibilities if we undertook her defence? England had prospective responsibilities enough for her public works, which must necessarily operate against the Chancellor of the Exchequer's freedom of action for many years to come in the arrangement of his Budgets. No fewer than seventy-two fortifications and batteries were now in progress in various parts of this country, and there was a large prospective liability in respect of them. According to the hon. Member for Finsbury (Sir Morton Peto) the armaments of these forts alone would cost something like £14,000,000. Then, on looking into the Army Estimates of this year he found large prospective demands, which would stand over after these Estimates were voted, in respect of works at Dover, Alderney, Chatham, Aldershot and Colchester, defences of Bermuda and Nova Scotia, commercial harbour defences, and other similar purposes. Taking the cost of these works and making a moderate estimate for the outlay upon the proposed defences in Canada and at home, he believed that the total amount of these prospective demands, which hung like a millstone round the neck of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was about £29,812,201. He asked the House whether they would deliberately continue to involve the taxpayers of this country by augmenting these heavy responsibilities? His advice would be to withdraw our troops from Canada, to keep on good terms with her, and, if possible, with the United States; and if America resolved to attack Canada and we resolved to defend her, he agreed with those who thought that we could only do so effectually by operating with our navy on the American coast.

MR. ADDERLEY said, that when he listened to the speech of the noble Lord who made this Motion (Lord Elcho) he had been under the impression that the noble Lord was asking the House to re-consider its Vote on this subject the other day upon the ground that the Canadians were not so ready as we had supposed them to be to take part in defending their own country. He understood, however, that this was a wrong impression and that the noble Lord did not wish the House to re-consider this Vote, and desired we should proceed at once with the fortifications at Quebec, but was of opinion that we should not encourage the Canadians to take the further steps we were then anticipating they would take for their own defence. Now, if this were the noble Lord's view, it was surely an inconsistent and an indefensible one; because if we were not to encourage the Canadians to contribute to their own defence, cui bono the fortifying of Quebec? The only reason why we should undertake to fortify this city was to enable the Canadians to elaborate their own defences. The noble Lord said that this defence would be impossible, and that, if possible, it would be impolitic. But a contrary opinion had been maintained by eminent military authorities, and he believed that no country in the world was indefensible if the people were free and were determined to preserve their independence. He saw nothing in the position of Canada to distinguish it from other countries, and there was nothing absurd in the proposition of Colonel Jervois that the Canadians should be encouraged to make strongholds along their frontier which they might themselves garrison. Neither was it absurd to suppose that such strongholds might be garrisoned by Volunteers. We expected that in case of invasion the fortifications lately made around Portsmouth and Plymouth would be held by Volunteer forces; and it was not unreasonable to expect, in the same way, that the Canadian Volunteers would, if attacked, be able similarly to hold the fortifications now proposed. But the noble Lord thought it would be better if they allowed Canada to be overrun, citing, as an analogous case, the Danubian Provinces, the safety of which was maintained not by fortifications but by dependence on the intervention, on occasion arising, of an exterior force. But who was to supply the exterior force in case Canada were attacked? [Lord ELCHO: England.] England? But he thought that part of the argument of the noble Lord was that it was not the interest of England to defend Canada. The two opinions seemed to be inconsistent. If it were the interest of England to defend Canada, then one part of the argument failed; and if it were not the interest of England, then the other part of the argument fell to the ground. He thought himself that it was the interest of England to maintain the North American Provinces as an independent Power. England was a great maritime nation, and in that quarter of the world would gain a great accession of strength by an alliance with the maritime Provinces of North America, which we ought not to allow to accrue to the United States. The reason why the North American Provinces were at present a weakness to England was that they had been prevented from properly developing their own resources. But if the whole strength of Canada

was drawn out and organized, instead of being an embarrassment and a source of weakness and anxiety at such a moment as this, she would add tenfold to the strength of this country. If the noble Lord had not made out that it was either impossible or impolitic that Canada should develop her own means of self-defence, then the sooner she was both encouraged and enabled to do so the better. But how was that to be done? No one had made any other proposition—even the noble Lord himself had not done so—than that England should assist her. If Canada was to raise militia and Volunteers, how was she to do it? Simply by the aid of the veteran troops of England. [Lord ELCHO: Hear, hear!] So far the noble Lord went with him, English troops must be kept at present in Canada to teach the Canadians; and if that were so, they must have fortifications for them, in case of need, to fall back upon;—and what fortifications should they be? [Lord ELCHO: Quebec.] Well, then, they were both agreed that Quebec must be fortified. But the noble Lord had said that from what he had read in the papers there appeared to be some doubt whether the Canadians were really in earnest in taking steps to defend their frontier. But if the noble Lord drew one inference from that circumstance he (Mr. Adderley) drew another. He allowed there was some uncertainty about the matter, and he was sorry for it, as delay at that time might be very disastrous. But what was the reason for that uncertainty? It was simply this, that the great question of Federation was still undecided. The two Canadas were perfectly prepared for Confederation, but the maritime provinces were not, and until they were, the question of Confederation and of united measures for defence could not be fully determined. In New Brunswick the general election had resulted in the defeat of several of the most prominent advocates of union, but not by large majorities. In Nova Scotia the supporters of union seemed to be paralyzed by the effects of the election in New Brunswick. In Prince Edward's Island the local influence had been always opposed to the union; but it was to be hoped that the opposition might be overcome. In Newfoundland the proposal had been postponed. In New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, however, which were the most important, and which guided the rest, there was a strong and active party in favour of Confederation.

tion. It might be hoped, therefore, that all opposition to the scheme would soon be removed. He had not the slightest doubt that what made New Brunswick and Nova Scotia hang back was partly because they thought, that by Confederation, they would be swamped by the greater Provinces of Canada, but still more because they could not make up their minds to give up the good things which they were accustomed to get from England, and they feared that they would be thrown more upon their own resources. But he begged to tell them—and in doing so he knew he expressed the feelings of the House—that these Provinces were very much mistaken if they thought that by holding back from Confederation they would continue to receive from England the same support in men and supplies as before. He would tell them plainly that there never would be a Minister in this country strong enough to induce the House of Commons, after an opportunity of independence had been offered, to vote supplies for their special purposes, and the sooner they gave up any such idea the better. He was convinced that the time was at hand when the proposed federation would be accomplished, and that then the defence of Canada, by the Confederated Provinces, would soon be undertaken. He could not at all agree with his noble Friend that the House of Commons should attempt to check the Canadians in their present efforts at defence. On the contrary, they should be encouraged and aided. If the delegates now on their way to England should ask for an Imperial guarantee to raise the sum of money that would be required for their fortifications, he for one would be ready to vote for it. The Government might not be prepared at present to express an opinion upon that point; but so strongly was he convinced that it was the duty of this country to encourage and assist the Canadians in self-reliant efforts that he had no hesitation in saying even beforehand that he should be ready, if the Government were to make such a proposal, to support them in giving the guarantee requisite to enable the Canadians to raise a loan on easier terms for the cost of their own defences, and which he did not believe would involve this country in any serious risk. In conclusion, he deprecated any debates in that House which should lead to remarks in France or other countries that England considered Canada indefensible. He believed it was the opinion of that House that Canada was perfectly capable of defence, and therefore, so far from reconsidering their previous decision upon the subject, he held that the Canadians should be encouraged without hesitation or delay, and assisted by Her Majesty's Government to do everything in their power to defend themselves.

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, I am going to offer only a very few observations, as I am under the impression that it is not the wish of the House that the debate should be much longer continued—indeed, after the able speech just addressed to us by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Adderley) there is not much to be said upon the question raised by the noble Lord. My noble Friend (Lord Elcho) has entirely disclaimed the wish that we should recede from the decision to which we came in the former debate upon this subject, and I think that the gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir John Hay) also told us that in his opinion Quebec ought to be fortified. But my noble Friend says that on the former occasion he voted under a different impression from that which recent intelligence is calculated to make. But if my noble Friend is satisfied that Quebec should be defended, and does not wish that we should reverse our former decision, what does it signify under what impression he gave his vote on the occasion referred to? It is a settled point, then, that Quebec should be fortified—that, at all events, is undisputed; and when my noble Friend says that he gave his vote the other night under the impression that arrangements had been made with the Canadian Government for the defence of the frontier, I must be permitted to say that neither my noble Friend who moved the Vote (the Marquess of Hartington) nor myself said anything to create that misapprehension, and the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bentinck) who moved the rejection of the Vote commented upon the fact that no such statement had been made on the part of Her Majesty's Government. My noble Friend, however, brings forward this Motion on account of intelligence which has reached us since the last discussion. But I should have thought if there was anything which made it demonstrably unfit to bring forward this Motion, it was that intelligence. Why, what is the intelligence? Is it that the Canadian Government have prorogued their Parliament, and have deputed four Members to come over here in order to confer with Her Majesty's Government on this matter. But does my noble Friend suppose that we are going to produce papers in an imperfect state—that we are going to anticipate what these gentlemen may say, or by a statement rashly made to prejudge the question at issue? Manifestly not. These gentlemen have already left their own shores and are now on their way to hold discussion with the Government of this country; and when that is the case it would be a great mistake for us to anticipate the proposals which they may have to make. My noble Friend has read extracts from the debates which have taken place in the Canadian Chambers of Legislation. I believe it would be possible to extract passages which might create an impression which would not be altogether satisfactory; but, then, it would be most unjust to these gentlemen to say that the general spirit in which this subject has been discussed in the Canadian Chambers has not been eminently creditable both to them and us. [Lord ELCHO: Hear, hear!] I am glad my noble Friend cheers that remark. Well, if such be their spirit—if there be but one feeling among them of loyalty to the British Crown, of attachment to British connection, and but one earnest and evident desire to secure the defence of their country, why should those doubts be now thrown upon their disposition at this moment? I shall not quote extracts from the Canadian debates, but I think it only just to Mr. Galt that I should read to the House the concluding passage of his speech. After having alluded to the feeling of the people of this country, to what we should require from the Canadians, and to the spirit which we should expect to be shown, he goes on to say—

“I trust the taking of this Vote—I speak of the million of dollars on account for defence—will show to the people of England that now, when the danger is before us, we are ready to bear our share of it; that we clothe our Government with power to ask them to unite their resources with our resources, and with these means, united in the defence of this country, I am perfectly certain that we can resist any attack that can be made upon us, from whatever quarter it may come.”

Well, Sir, that is the spirit in which the Canadian Minister addresses the Assembly. I sincerely trust that when he lands upon these shores that spirit shall not be damped by finding that this House has concluded the question in another sense, that we have determined that it is no use for them to have exerted themselves, to have drawn upon their resources, to have exhibited a loyal spirit to the Crown, or devoted attachment to British connection—no use to have increased their taxation, to have called out their Volunteers, to have exercised their militia, because we, in our superior wisdom, have determined that it would be impossible to defend Canada, and impolitic to do so if it were possible. I trust that the spirit to be found here will correspond with that which they have exhibited, and that, after we have been engaged for years in calling out the energies of the Canadian people, we shall not turn round on them at last and desire to recall the proposals which we have made. I trust we shall take no such retrograde step as that. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Adderley) said that Canada could be defended, but that the defence could be undertaken by its own people. As I stated the other evening, there is no doubt that the primary defence of Canada consists in the knowledge on the part of every foreign country that war with Canada implies also war with England; but the second defence of Canada is to be found in the spirit and energy of its own people. To evoke that spirit and energy has been the aim of Her Majesty's Government, and that it has been evoked in a manner heretofore seldom witnessed I certainly believe. I perceive in their discussions a desire not merely of defending themselves, but of increasing their power to a point which will render them a valuable adjunct to the whole Empire if any danger threaten it; and I trust that the day is not far distant when, in spite of momentary discouragements, the great scheme of federation shall be carried into effect, and when a country, greater than many of the countries of Europe, shall be established in British North America—a country not destined to be great and powerful for its own defence and security alone, but for the support of Great Britain in those times of adversity when the alliance of so great a State will be of infinite advantage to her. Believing, then, that this is the spirit in which these gentlemen are coming to this country, I submit to this House that it is undesirable to continue a discussion which must have the effect of casting doubt upon the intentions of the Canadian people. I think we ought rather to adhere to the policy determined upon by a large majority of this House, and welcome those gentlemen on their arrival in the spirit in which they left their own country.

MR. KINGLAKE said, that he should follow the suggestion thrown out by his right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Colonies, and

ing any doubt upon the possibility of defending Canada. He was one of those who voted the other evening with the majority in favour of the Vote for the defence of Canada, and the intelligence afforded to the House that evening by his right hon. Friend was not such as to cause him to desire to retract the Vote he had given; for when the question was one affecting the solemn duty of defending a part of the Queen's dominions there ought to be no faltering, or semblance of faltering, on the part of either the Parliament or the country. He could not, however, agree with the arguments employed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Adderley) when he endeavoured to deal with the propositions of his noble Friend (Lord Elcho). The right hon. Gentleman asked which would be the country that would come forward to defend Canada in time of need? And his noble Friend answered "England." The whole spirit and meaning of his noble Friend's remarks were, not that he more than any other Member of the House would acquiesce in the invasion of Canada, but that this country should in such an emergency make choice of her own theatre of war, whether in Canada or another part of the globe. He believed that they would all agree that in case of our troops being exposed to a conflict with a vast superiority of forces there was no necessity for any wild sacrifice, and that our troops should therefore if necessary be withdrawn. But at this point he differed from his noble Friend, and also from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), because his opinion was that if we were driven to that painful necessity, the duty of withdrawing our troops was a military duty, and not one to be undertaken beforehand by the State—it was not a duty to be undertaken prematurely upon the suggestion of an imaginary war with another country—a war which had not yet commenced, and with a country which as yet had not even quarrelled with us. But as one who voted with the majority on a previous evening, he must say that, rightly or wrongly, he and others around him had recorded their votes under the impression that Her Majesty's Government had already arrived at an understanding with the Canadian Government. He did not now, as it were, ask to retract that Vote, because they found only too clearly that that impression was unfounded. He only stated it as a fact. They knew that negotiations had been going on for years, that negotiations were still going on, and that these negotiations were of such a character as absolutely to force upon us the considerations of what were to be our relations with Canada, in case of the lamentable contingency of a war with the United States. When a State had determined the limits of the duties it was to perform, he imagined that there was no better test for measuring the extent of those duties than the endeavour to ascertain the correlative power possessed by that State—because, in such a case as this, duty and power were inseparable. Now, it appeared to him the negotiations which had been going on between Canada and the parent State would show that we had not the power—not the unlimited power—of dealing with the resources of Canada which was implied in the argument that it was the obvious and unquestionable duty of every State to defend itself. If the Isle of Wight were invaded it would be competent upon the State and Legislature to deal as it might think fit with every man on that island, to employ its resources as might be deemed proper, and to make use of every acre of its land that might be thought necessary for its defence. But could we deal with Canada in that manner? If he understood the question aright, since the concession to that country of a responsible Government of its own, we were with regard to Canada exactly in the same position as we should be with regard to any foreign and minor Power which we were desirous of protecting. The negotiations which had been carried on appeared to partake exactly of that character. It was very true that these negotiations were conducted by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies instead of by the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office, but in the end it amounted to the same thing, and the question ought, therefore, to be treated upon the same footing. Now, if we were dealing with a foreign and minor State apprehensive of invasion from a great Power, one of the things we should most carefully abstain from would be advising the lesser State with regard to undertaking hostilities, which we might not be certain of conducting to a triumphant issue:—because no lesson of modern times had been more strongly impressed upon us than that responsibility, and that, too, of the most tremendous kind, must result from our giving advice to a minor Power. When a nation had
